county, on March 29, 1911, was found to be legal and the decree of divorce obtained against her by respondent in the chancery court of Tennessee on November 17, 1914, was found to be void and of no effect upon the sole ground that said respondent was not at the time of the commencement of the action or at the time of the rendition of the said decree a bona fide resident of or legally domiciled in the state of Tennessee. The court also found that at the time of each of the marriages attempted to be solemnized pursuant to marriage licenses issued by legally constituted authority to said Jared H. Miller and Mary E. Moore, to wit, November 20, 1914, and October 13, 1915, respectively, there was a valid, subsisting marriage existing between respondent and Irene Ayers Miller, which continued in force and effect until October 5, 1916, on which day a final decree of divorce was duly filed and entered in the superior court of the county of Alameda, fully and finally divorcing said respondent and Irene Ayers Miller; that the marriage ceremony solemnized at the city of Fresno, state of California, May 11, 1918, was in all respects valid and without legal objection, and from that day hence Dr. Jared H. Miller and Mary Moore became and remained husband and wife; further, that Mary Moore was not at the date of the Memphis marriage, October 13, 1915, ignorant of the fact that said Jared H. Miller was a married man, nor did he falsely or fraudulently represent to her with intent to deceive her that he was legally capable of entering into marriage with her, nor did he report to her falsely or represent to her that he was a man of substantial means or possessed of large properties in the state of California or elsewhere; that prior to said marriage of November 20, 1914, said Jared H. Miller stated to Mary Moore all the facts concerning his money, property, practice, and current income, and thereafter said Mary Moore knew the respondent's financial condition and that he had no substantial means, money or property; that immediately after the marriage ceremony performed at Memphis, October 13, 1915, to the time of the death of Mary Moore Miller she and respondent lived continuously together as husband and wife, and during said time Mary Moore Miller believed she was respondent's lawful wife and that such belief was not the result of any fraud practiced on the part of respondent, and that no fraud or false representations were as a matter of fact practiced by said respondent as a means of exerting undue influence over her, but that each enjoyed the love, affection, and confidence of the other. The alleged false representations that respondent promised to pay one-half the purchase price of the real estate involved in this action is found to be untrue. It is further found that the full price of said real estate was paid by Mary Moore

Miller with full knowledge that respondent was without funds, and that the title was to be taken in their names as joint tenants with right of survivorship.

The statutes of Tennessee defining the various causes that shall constitute grounds of divorce, among other things, provide:

"Wilful or malicious desertion or absence of either party without a reasonable cause for two whole years." Shannon's Code, § 4201, subd. 4.

"Refusal, on part of a wife, to remove with her husband to this state, without a reasonable cause, and wilfully absenting herself from him for two years." Section 4201, subd. 8.

"A divorce may be granted for any of the aforesaid causes, though acts complained of were committed out of the state, or the petitioner resided out of the state at the time, no matter where the other party resides, if the petitioner has resided in this state two years next preceding the filing of the petition." Section 4203.

The statutes contain a provision that when a marriage is absolutely annulled the parties shall severally be at liberty to marry again, except for existing causes not present in the instant case.

The court impliedly found, and upon the record it is inconceivable how it could have otherwise found, that Mary Moore Miller was at all times in full possession of all the facts and circumstances affecting the marital status of Jared H. Miller, and that she was an active, willing, and persistent ally, at all times co-operating with him, and that she largely directed the execution of devious plans whereby said Irene Ayers Miller was to be put aside by him in order to make room for herself in the marital life and affections of respondent. By no means was she mere clay in the potter's hands, but it incontrovertibly appears that she was aggressively active in her determination to make Jared H. Miller her husband, and displayed no small degree of initiative talent in the furtherance of her purpose, and moved toward her designs with fixed determination. Her many letters and unbroken course of conduct, beginning shortly after she first met the respondent at the city of Los Angeles as his patient and continuing through the period of the pending divorce proceedings which ended with the entry of the final decree of divorce obtained by Irene Ayers Miller in the California court, furnish conclusive proof of her willing and active participation in very much that is chargeable to the respondent in the matter of the dissolution of the Irene Ayers Miller marriage. Mary Moore Miller was not an ordinary person. She was an unmarried woman 62 or 63 years of age at the time she met Dr. Miller in the spring of 1914 at his office at Los Angeles. Dr. Miller was then aged 43 years. Mary Moore Miller was then a woman reasonably well preserved, possessing good features, well-mannered, and retaining a lively interest in current matters. Her home was at Marquette, Mich., and it had been her habit to spend the winters at Los Angeles with companions whom she frequently brought with her from her Michigan home. She was mentally alert, cultured, and well informed as to public men and measures. Her young maidenhood and middle life were spent in close association with an unmarried brother, Frank Moore, who was a man of wide business and financial affairs and a successful speculator. They made their home together for some 35 years, and when he deceased she became his sole heir. He left a large and valuable estate. There were other living brothers and sisters and children of deceased brothers and sisters, most of whom are interested in the three actions herein, which have for their object the acquisition of the estate of Mary Moore Miller.

George William Moore, a lawyer of considerable repute, who practiced his profession at Detroit, while not a nominal contestant, is, nevertheless, interested in this litigation and is supporting the cause of the collateral kindred. For many years after the death of her brother Frank, who devised his entire estate to decedent to the exclusion of Attorney George William Moore and the other brothers and sisters, George William was the adviser of his sister in many of her large business transactions; but it is very clear from the evidence and the numerous letters written by the decedent to George William that she had very positive notions of her own on matters of business and finance, and unless a suggestion made by another met with her wishes or judgment she did not hesitate to reject the same. No doubt she had advised with her deceased brother, whose fortune consisted largely in his investments in iron stocks, and by long and close contact with him had obtained an intimate knowledge of his business affairs. Following the death of her brother Frank, decedent lost much of her interest in the home at Marquette and planned and took many trips by train and automobile to such places as she felt would afford her comfort and pleasure. In January, 1914, she met Dr. Miller at his office in Los Angeles and became his patient in what is known as plastic surgery. His wife, Irene Ayers Miller, was his office assistant. Miss Mary Moore had brought with her two lady companions from Michigan and also her automobile and chauffeur.

It was during the period of treatment above referred to that Dr. Miller and Mary Moore began their intrigue which ultimately resulted in the divorcement of Dr. Miller and Irene Ayers Miller. It was agreed that inasmuch as Mary Moore had planned to take her companions with her on a trip to Yellowstone Park during the summer, Dr.

Miller should meet her at the station where tourists change from the main line to the branch line leading into Yellowstone Park. In order to disarm her companions it was planned that the meeting should appear to be wholly accidental. During their short stay at the park Dr. Miller and Mary Moore met and made plans to dissolve the marriage contract that stood in the way of their intermarriage. Their stay at the park being concluded, she returned to Marquette, Mich., and he returned to Los Angeles. Immediately thereafter a correspondence was established. The letters written by Mary Moore to Dr. Miller before the Irene Miller separation are such effective and complete refutations of appellant's claim that Mary Moore was cajoled unwittingly into her several marriages with Dr. Miller, and that she would not have joined in any of the attempted marriages with him had she entertained a suspicion that he was not eligible to contract marriage, that it will be necessary to quote from but a few of the many that might be collated from her very full correspondence. Immediately upon reaching her Marquette home from the Park she wrote to him as follows:

"Indeed we will consult about everything and I feel that we shall be very happy. If we can keep it from everybody knowing that you were not free when I saw you at the park we will do so. Dr., we are not children and if there was a sad mistake in your life there is no harm for us to confide in each other even before you are free—we are doing nothing wrong, but it is just as well to keep it from the outside world if we can. I don't know how long a time it takes to get your freedom. If it can be arranged out of the state it will be better. I believe the Lord is on our side for he never intended that home should be any other than a place ruled by perfect love and confidence. * * * I wonder if the lady in San Francisco [reference is to Irene Ayers Miller] will object to a separation? One does not know how she will feel. We will both be so relieved and happy when there is no obstacle in the way. * * * Have burned your others [letters]. Hated to do so but knew it was safer to do so, will burn this one. * * *

The following portions of two letters written by her on August 23, 1914, and November 3, 1914, express her interest in Dr. Miller's children:

"I just know I will enjoy Lillian—and I hope the children will call me mother—do not expect them to at once but hope they will learn to love me and call me by that dear name sometime. * * * When I went to the cemetery I felt that Frank would be pleased to know I had you to love and care for me—Surely sometime we will come here and see how things are—I only hope and pray we may live to prove our happiness. I know I shall feel so safe with you—I have no misgivings." "Yes my dear you may depend on me to help you about the children and their future. Am so glad you have them and they will soon be mine as well as yours."

On September 23, 1914, she wrote to Dr. Miller as follows:

"I do hope it [plan to intermarry] will work out all right for we do not want to live apart any longer than we have to."

On October 14, 1914, she wrote as follows:

"I have done enough for the whole family [her collateral kindred] to have my way about this matter. The point is this, we want each other and that is all there is to it. * * * Now, my dear, we shall go ahead and do as we please—now we are going ahead regardless for I am under obligation to no one and there are many under obligations to me."

If Dr. Miller succeeded in getting his first Tennessee divorce decree from Irene she suggested to him that he telegraph her at once, "Patent granted." Her purpose to possess Dr. Miller as her husband is further disclosed by the following lines taken from a letter written by her to him November 7, 1914:

"My taste does not run to society—steam yachts—private cars and palaces—but a cozy home ruled by perfect love and confidence and peace is what I want and that is your idea of happiness we will have it some day."

She expressed considerable anxiety as to the finality of the divorce proceeding that would separate the doctor and Irene. She wrote:

"Have everything exactly right, never mind the cost, the correct result is what we want."

In a letter of September 1, 1914, prior to the commencement of any divorce proceeding and well knowing that Dr. Miller was living with Irene Ayers Miller as her husband, she wrote Dr. Miller instructions as to the kind and size of a wedding ring he was to purchase for her. The details of their mutual plans, studied and cunningly devised, by which Dr. Miller, who was known to Mary Moore to be a resident of California, was to apply for a divorce in Madison county, Tenn., are elaborately set out in her letters. This divorce, which was held by the trial court to be invalid for want of bona fide residence in Tennessee, was entered on November 17, 1914, and she and Dr. Miller went through the form of marriage three days thereafter in the state of Tennessee. Their correspondence prior thereto had been conducted clandestinely and their identity as married persons was adroitly concealed until the second marriage. After their first marriage, which was not announced, they journeyed to Boston and thence to Cuba and finally homeward by way of New Orleans, where they separated, leaving upon different trains for Los Angeles. On their matrimonial trip all persons who might chance to know the two or either were avoided. They continued to keep their purported marital relations a profound secret until October 13, 1915, a few days after the entry of the interlocutory decree obtained by Irene Ayers Miller in the divorce action she had brought against Dr.

Miller, when they again indulged in another marriage ceremony in Shelby county, Tennessee.

On their first matrimonial venture, and even before the ceremony was performed, Mary Moore Miller supplied Dr. Miller with expense money, and liberally gave him other sums of considerable importance to be used for his needs. Both entertained doubt as to the legality of their first marriage. Lawyers, so the testimony goes, were divided on the question. In due course of time Mary Moore Miller returned to her Marquette home, and from there she continued to write Dr. Miller scores of letters, in which she discussed a variety of subjects, but each letter abounded in expressions of ardent affection for him, and she repeatedly manifested impatience at the circumstances which kept them apart. Being in an uncertain state of mind as to the validity of the Tennessee decree purporting to divorce Dr. Miller and his wife Irene, both parties set about to promote the divorce of Dr. Miller and Irene. It appears that their matrimonial relations had not been altogether harmonious under normal conditions, and they became more disturbed after Mary Moore became the doctor's patient. At any rate, Irene returned to her Berkeley home, and in due time brought a divorce action in the superior court of the county of Alameda, which resulted in the entry of an interlocutory decree in her favor on September 28, 1915. The final decree was entered October 5, 1916. Mary Moore largely financed Dr. Miller in his property settlement with Irene. To remove the doubt which they entertained as to the validity of the first decree obtained from Irene in the Tennessee court they proceeded immediately to that state upon the entry of the interlocutory decree granted to Irene by the superior court of the county of Alameda, Cal., where the second marriage ceremony was performed. En route from her Marquette home she broke the news of her intentions to her brother, Attorney George William Moore, in a letter dated October 12, 1915, in which, among other things, she said:

"As I am stopping over in Chicago a few hours want to write you a few lines about a very important matter. Now don't faint away when I say that I am on my way to be married tomorrow. You remember I showed you two photos when you were in Marquette the last time—they are both the man, different positions. I expected you would be up before I left, then would have told you what I am writing now. Our plans worked out a little different from what I expected which accounts for this haste. Have had the matter in mind for some time but have not discussed it with the family or any friends for several reasons. In the first place, I dislike talk and publicity as you know, and did not want it known, nor would I be married in Marquette or Detroit and as this is my first marriage and at my age felt more disinclined than ever to be discussed. Then the question of my means made me feel the same way. When Frank died I heard some complaint, things that some of the youngsters said, for instance, that if he had not left a will they would have had some of the money. So all in all I decided it was nobody's business but my own. I have known the Dr. and his people for nearly two years, in fact he has treated my throat for two winters. * * * Am marrying him because I love him and want him. In fact, we want each other. As you said once when I told you 'I wanted to'—was the best reason in the world. Ever since Frank died have felt without a real home—As I do not care to live with any of my relatives, but am sure I shall have some one to share a happy home with me, for that is what we both like is our home. And I know I am fortunate in my choice, for he brings to us a thoroughly trained mind, not only in his profession but in business as well, and should anything happen to you I would have some one who is capable of looking after my interests carefully and faithfully. Of course I want everything to go on just the same as it is fixed now."

Immediately following the marriage of 1915, they resumed matrimonial relations and proceeded from the altar directly to Marquette and Detroit, where they met the relatives and friends of Mary Moore Miller. She exhibited a sense of pride in the attainments of her husband, and represented to her relatives that he was a man of affairs and possessed good professional and business ability. She knew, however, that he was a man without means, as she had all the time voluntarily financed him. In order to give him the appearance of a man of affluence she placed sums of money to his credit. Appellant has argued through hundreds of pages of briefs that her exhibition of marital pride in speaking well of her husband and representing him as a man of means to her relatives is proof positive that she was wickedly deceived by him into such belief, and had she not been thus deceived she would not have consented to a marriage with him. Such a contention is completely and effectively answered by her correspondence with Dr. Miller. In order that he might not hesitate to make known his needs to her she assured him that she had more money than she ought to spend—more than she knew what to do with. Again she wrote:

"All the afternoon was busy writing checks—the end of the month—you know that will soon be your job."

The evidence overwhelmingly defeats appellant's contention. The evidence is also conclusive to the point that it was the agreement and understanding that Dr. Miller was to retire from the practice of medicine and devote himself to the care and management of Mrs. Miller's large interests, and engage in such business affairs as might be agreeable to both. She transferred her bank accounts from Michigan to Los Angeles as expeditiously as her judgment dictated. She had much correspondence with her lawyer brother, who visited her for several weeks at her Los Angeles home in 1919, concerning her business projects, and was fully aware of his views with reference to her business concerns. She did not take him into her full confidence as to what money or property she intended to make Dr. Miller a joint sharer with herself, but she did tell him that at least one-half of the purchase price of the property in suit was paid with her funds. This property, which did not exceed $16,500 in value, was incumbered with a mortgage for almost one-half of its value, and said incumbrance was never discharged. The deed to said property stood of record in the joint names of Dr. Miller and his wife from the day it was recorded in 1916 to her death in 1921. Decedent formulated a number of plans which had to do with herself and Dr. Miller as husband and wife, which she afterwards executed without disclosing her purposes to her brother. These matters, personal to herself, were revealed to Dr. Miller and, except in a few instances, were concealed from others. In presenting the three cases before us appellant vehemently persists in the view that Mary Moore Miller was brought under the complete control of Dr. Miller by the exercise of some magic power which he likens to hypnotism. It is absolutely incredible that for a period of seven years the exercise of subtle or unnatural influence could have dominated the mind of a person who possessed the personality, intelligence and business experience which the record shows Mary Moore Miller to have possessed. Her independent acts of charity and the exercise of the faculty of volition refute the claim that she was lacking in will power and was easily influenced to do the things she did not choose to do. The evidence is all against such a theory. She was charitable in a sensible way, and she was responsive to certain moral obligations which she felt came to her with her wealth. The benevolences which her brother Frank had initiated were adopted by her, and she contributed annually thousands of dollars to brothers, sisters, near relatives, and family acquaintances who found themselves reduced to necessitous circumstances. Her confidence in and admiration for Dr. Miller did not once falter. And strange as it may seem, a matrimonial alliance which had its inception in intrigue and sin united a twain that lived together in a state of harmony and happiness to the end. Her written words recorded in scores of letters to Dr. Miller and to her brother, George William Moore, her legal adviser in many transactions, stand as unshaken testimonials to her devotion. There is in the record the testimony of two or three witnesses, either relatives or friends of the parties contesting the right of decedent to make disposition of her estate, who gave testimony tending to show that decedent was unhappy and had lost confidence in Dr. Miller, but this testimony, aside from bearing the earmarks of improbability, is overwhelmed by the written words of the deceased, and is also rebutted by her action and conduct during the entire period of their relationship.

In 1919 she took up with her brother the subject of making her will, and wrote several letters telling him just how she wished him to draw the will. No unprejudiced mind can read those letters without becoming convinced that decedent in her instructions was acting freely, voluntarily, and intelligently. The following is but a sample of the many expressions which are to be found in her letters. It deals directly with testamentary intention:

"Los Angeles, April 7, 1919.

"Dear George: The revised copy of the will received and is exactly what I want and fully carries out my wishes. I see no reason why I should ever change it as it seems to me to be as just as possible all around. The way it was before it would have cut the Dr. off with $2,400.00 a year, which I would not want. He is the one who is spending his life with me, has for several years and expect will for many more. Helps me in all the details of life, assists me in many ways. Should anything befall you I would have to depend on him much more. Companionship and service of this sort cannot be measured in money, but my first wish and care is for him naturally and I want him fully provided for while he lives."

[1] The will as finally executed carries on after her death many of the benevolences which she practiced in life, and some of those now opposing the probate of her will are named as beneficiaries therein so long as they shall live. We have no disposition to mitigate the wrong she wrought by counseling, aiding, assisting, and abetting the divorcement of Dr. Miller and his wife, Irene. That, however, is the only shadow that darkens a life that abounded in benevolent and gracious offices. But her transgression, however grievous, did not, per se, work a forfeiture of her right to dispose of her property on the same terms that are guaranteed to those who have not so transgressed.

[2] Appellant seeks to bring to his support sections 158 and 2235, Civil Code, which provide that transactions between husband and wife during the existence of the marital state by which one of the spouses obtains any advantage from the other are presumed to be entered into without consideration and under undue influence. That Mary Moore Miller had the opportunity of independent advice in all of her transactions with Dr. Miller is not a debatable question. From the first marriage ceremony to the second a period of one year elapsed, during which time she resided in the state of Michigan and Dr. Miller resided at the city of Los Angeles. All of this time she was in constant communication with her lawyer brother, personally advising with him on any matter she chose to submit to his judgment. She was given to travel and visited a number of the prosperous cities of the middle west during this period of separation. It also appears that she actually came into personal contact with lawyers. In fact, she paid the fees of one, if not both, in the Irene Ayers Miller divorce action. With her experience in business matters generally is it not at least likely that having employed lawyers for another she was well advised of her right to employ one for herself? The court found, and the evidence abundantly supports the finding, that Mary Moore Miller was at all times fully advised as to Dr. Miller's matrimonial status, and prior to the time of the purchase of the real property involved in this proceeding she knew that Dr. Miller was without means to purchase said property, and she at all times fully intended that the whole purchase price should be paid from funds to be supplied by her to him. That she would have procured the deed to be made as it appears of record, even though she doubted the consummation of a technical legal marriage, there can scarcely exist a doubt in the light of her attitude to Dr. Miller.

[3] In the three cases before us the Tennessee decree of 1909, purporting to divorce Dr. Miller and Edith Chesley Miller, is vigorously attacked by the representative of the collateral heirs on the theory that if that decree is adjudged to be invalid for want of jurisdiction of the court to render it, then it must follow that Dr. Miller and Edith Chesley Miller, who has since remarried, are still husband and wife, and, further, that that status had a nullifying effect on his subsequent marriage to Irene Ayers and his three later marriages with Mary Moore, and that in consequence thereof all property rights that were acquired by Dr. Miller are tainted with the fraud resorted to in obtaining said decree, and all of said transactions must, as well as the will executed in 1920, fall together. Conceding the decree to be void, this would not inevitably follow. But inasmuch as it has been regarded by the collateral heirs as the keystone of all the cases, especially the will contest, we will not deny it consideration.

[4] The petition filed by J. H. Miller against Edith Chesley Miller in the Shelby county circuit court on September 4, 1909, alleged the marriage and the birth of a son, who was in legal custody of plaintiff, Dr. J. H. Miller. Petitioner alleged that he was a resident of Tennessee and that defendant was a nonresident of that state. He alleged as grounds of divorce that his wife had willfully and maliciously deserted him and declared that owing to incompatibility of temperament they could not live together. He next alleged that his wife would not remove into the state of Tennessee with him, and that he held "a letter showing notwithstanding his consideration and efforts she adheres to her position and declares a separation is the proper course." The following waiver of process, which was mailed to the clerk of the court by his wife, was in the handwriting of Dr. Miller and was executed by her in Massachusetts and was filed as a record in the case:

"I, E. C. Miller, hereby waive notice, copy, pleading, term and agree that the application of J. H. Miller for divorce from me shall be set and tried instantler.

"Witness my hand the 10th day of September, 1909.
E. C. Miller."

The pro confesso which Edith Chesley Miller executed and caused to be filed as a record in the case constituted an appearance on her part, and she has never since questioned its true intent or binding effect. The cause regularly came before the circuit court of Shelby county, state of Tennessee, for hearing, and that court made and entered its decree on September 15, 1909, as follows:

"This cause came on this day to be heard on the bill of complaint for divorce, the pro confesso here and now taken and entered against the defendant, and the oral testimony of witnesses examined in open court, from all of which it satisfactorily appeared to the court that complainant is entitled to the relief sought on the ground of desertion without provocation on the part of the complainant, and her refusal to move into this state with him all resulting from incompatibility of temperament;

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed by the court that the bonds of matrimony heretofore subsisting between the complainant, J. H. Miller, and the defendant, E. C. Miller, be and the same are hereby absolutely dissolved and forever held for naught.

"It is further ordered that the defendant pay the costs herein accrued, for which execution may issue."

[5] Surely no fraud was committed against Edith Chesley Miller on any of the grounds which constitute the basis of the cases cited by appellant, nor was the service substituted, and she makes no claim that there was fraud or insufficient service. Her ultimate object in filing her bill of divorce against Dr. Miller in Massachusetts upon the eve of his departure for Tennessee was made more certain of attainment by the divorce action taken by Dr. Miller several months thereafter. Neither do the facts altogether harmonize with the theory of collusion, as there would have been no occasion for a duplication of divorce proceedings if there had been a collusive agreement between the parties.

[6] In considering what effect should be given to the foregoing decree in the light of the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States, it may be proper at this time to observe that neither one of the parties to the 1909 divorce proceeding, nor the issue of the marriage sought to be dissolved, a son, are attacking said decree, but the attack is made by the collateral kindred of the wife of the last marriage, who, according to the finding of the trial court, was fully informed as to the 1909 decree. Edith Chesley Miller and Dr. Miller, each having remarried another person, respectively, are estopped from denying the validity of said decree. Even if the Tennessee decree showed upon its face want of jurisdiction of the court to make said decree and was consequently void on a collateral attack, each of the spouses having thereafter remarried another person, they are held by all the authorities to be estopped from questioning the former void decree. Bruguiere v. Bruguiere, 172 Cal. 199, 155 P. 988, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 122.

[7-11] There is no ground upon which the claim may be predicated that Dr. Miller did not intend to become a bona fide resident of the state of Tennessee when he departed for that state, nor that he did not in fact become a bona fide resident. His preparation to depart from Boston and the request he made in good faith of his wife to accompany him, qualifying himself to practice his profession upon arriving there, and remaining in the state several months after the sanitarium of which he was medical director had closed, and not returning to Massachusetts, but finally coming to California to visit his sick daughter, who was residing at his father's home at Lankershim, and remaining in California, are circumstances which strongly corroborate his testimony to the effect that when he left Massachusetts he did so with the intention of making Tennessee his legal domicile. The fact that he left Massachusetts after his wife had commenced a divorce action against him in that state tends to rebut the claim that he left Massachusetts with the fraudulent intent of establishing a domicile for the purpose of divorcing her. It is upon this theory that the decree is attacked. The trial court found against appellant on that issue, as well as upon the issue that the Tennessee court lacked jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and against the further claim that the judgment was void upon its face upon the grounds that the statutory requirements of two years' residence by the plaintiff in Tennessee and the desertion or absence on the part of the offending party for a period of "two years" were neither alleged in the complaint nor incorporated in the judgment. A judgment upon a collateral attack will not be held invalid on account of the omissions last above pointed out. The Tennessee court had jurisdiction of the person by reason of her appearance, and it had general jurisdiction of divorce causes. The trial court found that Dr. Miller was a bona fide resident of the state of Tennessee at the time the action was commenced and at the time the decree of divorce was entered. We must presume, in the absence of a contrary showing, that the laws of Tennessee are the same as ours affecting similar subjects. It is the law of this state that the judgment of a court having general jurisdiction of the subject-matter involved in the judgment cannot be successfully attacked in a collateral proceeding because of an imperfect or defective complaint in the action in which it was rendered. If the facts stated in the complaint are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded therein and awarded by the judgment, the action of the court in decreeing otherwise and rendering its judgment in accord with the prayer of the complaint can be nothing more than error. A failure to allege that the plaintiff resided in the state and county in which the action is brought for the period of time prescribed by section 128, Civil Code, does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine the action provided the court obtained jurisdiction of the defendant. Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 100 P. 1086, citing other cases. The court in the instant case obtained jurisdiction of the defendant. Any fraud committed as to the issue of residence was intrinsic and not extrinsic, and the person injured thereby was Edith Chesley Miller, who filed her appearance.

In Hamblin v. Superior Court, 195 Cal. 364, 233 P. 337, 43 A. L. R. 1509, this court further said:

"The provision of section 128 of the Civil Code, forbidding the granting of a divorce unless the plaintiff has been a resident of the state and of the county for the time specified, is of a similar character. This requirement has sometimes been spoken of as 'jurisdictional.' Flynn v. Flynn, 171 Cal. 746, 154 P. 837; Gould v. Gould, 188 Cal. 505, 205 P. 1072. But it has never been so decided, so far as we are advised, in any case wherein that question was actually involved. In the cases in which this question has been actually involved and decided it has been held that this requirement is not jurisdictional, and that the failure to comply with it is nothing more than error in the exercise of jurisdiction. Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 339, 100 P. 1086; Dahne v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. App. 664, 161 P. 280; Bullard v. Bullard, 189 Cal. 502, 506, 209 P. 361. The same reasoning applies with equal force to the provisions of section 130 of the Civil Code, and it follows by parity of reasoning that these requirements are not jurisdictional and that a failure to comply with them results in mere error, correctible only by means of a direct attack by appeal or motion in the same case."

[12] Counsel has cited a long list of cases, of which Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 23 S. Ct. 237, 47 L. Ed. 366, Bell v. Bell, 181 U. S. 175, 21 S. Ct. 551, 45 L. Ed. 804, Streitwolf v. Streitwolf, 181 U. S. 179, 21 S. Ct. 553, 45 L. Ed. 807, and Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 562, 26 S. Ct. 525, 50 L. Ed. 867,

5 Ann. Cas. 1, are typical, which are declaratory of the rule announced in many state courts. It is well expressed by former Chief Justice Shaw in Bruguere v. Bruguere, supra, as follows:

"It is a well-established proposition that where one spouse goes to a state other than that of the matrimonial domicile and there obtains a divorce under a residence simulated for that purpose and not in good faith, the judgment is not binding upon the courts of other states of the Union, and upon proof of the fraudulent residence and of the fact that the divorce is obtained by substituted service only, it may be held void in any other state than that in which it was rendered. Estate of James, 99 Cal. 374, 377, 33 P. 1122 [37 Am. St. Rep. 601]. Whether it would be held valid in the state in which it was rendered is a question depending upon the policy and law of that state."

The rule, of course, rests upon considerations of public policy, and was adopted by courts in order to preserve the rights of wives and the issue of marriages against faithless husbands who deserted them without cause and fled to other states and gained a residence for the purpose of obtaining a divorce from the abandoned wife. There is not one of the controlling facts upon which the decisions in the cited cases are placed that is to be found in the instant case. In each of said cases the removal of the husband from the matrimonial domicile was found to be with the intent of simulating a residence for the purpose of obtaining a divorce from the wife and the service of process was constructive. The actions to annul the decrees in those cases were brought by the injured spouse. The fraudulent purpose that moved the husband to leave the matrimonial domicile and gain a residence in another state unquestionably forms the basis of all of those cases. The trial court found against the existence of all of the facts that constitute the real grounds of those cases.

[13-15] But if it be conceded that the 1909 decree is assailable by appellant and is void for the reasons urged against it, this circumstance would not establish the nonmarriage status of Dr. Miller and Mary Moore Miller, which it is incumbent upon appellant to do in order to avail himself of the force of the argument that Mary Moore Miller was deceived and misled by Dr. Miller's machinations into the belief that she was his legal wife. The last marriage ceremonial to which Dr. Miller and Mary Moore Miller were parties, performed at Fresno, Cal., May 11, 1918, estops appellant from questioning the matrimonial status of the parties to said marriage. The mere proof of a prior marriage and the continued life of both spouses is not sufficient to make a case against a second ceremonial marriage. There must be a further showing that the first marriage had not been set aside by judicial decree. There is a very strong presumption in favor of the legality of a marriage regularly solemnized. The marriage ceremony of May 11, 1918, was solemnized under all the forms of law after the entry by Irene Ayers Miller of the final decree divorcing her from Dr. Miller. The deposition of Edith Chesley Beriman (formerly Miller) was taken, and not one word of testimony was given by her as to whether she had obtained a decree of divorce from Dr. Miller. Neither was it made to affirmatively appear that he had not obtained a valid decree against her. This being so, Dr. Miller and Mary Moore Miller were husband and wife under the laws of this state before the will was executed and continued to be such until her death, whatever may have been their marriage status prior thereto. Estate of Hughson, 173 Cal. 448, 160 P. 548; Marsh v. Marsh (Cal. App.) 250 P. 411.

[16] Aside from this, the California decree of divorce in which Irene was plaintiff and Dr. Miller was defendant became final October 5, 1916. It has not been attacked in any direct proceeding and only collaterally, if at all, in this proceeding. In the matter of the Estate of Lee, 253 P. 145, this court said:

"A divorce proceeding in so far as it relates to the marriage relation of the parties to the action and the termination of the marriage status, is a proceeding in rem. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 P. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146. Such an action is brought for the purpose of establishing judicially the matrimonial status of the parties, and, if it be found that a matrimonial relation exists, then for the purpose of a dissolution of that relation. Gridley v. Boggs, 62 Cal. 190, 202; De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 44 P. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165. As a judgment in rem it is binding upon all the world as to the determination of the marital status of the parties and is immune from collateral attack (People v. Perris Irrigation District, 132 Cal. 289, 64 P. 399, 773; 15 Cal. Jur. 239), except on grounds specified by the Code (section 1916, Code Civ. Proc.), none of which is urged here.

[17, 18] The policy of this state on this subject is made clear by the foregoing pronouncement. The question of marriage and divorce is one of public policy committed largely to the sound discretion of the several states, as is well demonstrated by the divergent views of the several courts of the Union in dealing with the subject. The decisions are not uniform, but all extend the judicial arm to protect the matrimonial status from the fraudulent designs of either of the spouses. From a consideration of the marriage status of the persons that may be seriously affected by this proceeding, the policy of the law would require the sustaining of the judgment of the trial court if it can reasonably be done. It is not necessary for us to rely upon such an exigency in this case, as the evidence and the law unquestionably impels an affirmance of the judgment.

[19] Appellant assigns as error the refusal of the court to receive in evidence a letter written by Dr. Miller to his attorney, dated October 19, 1915, which purports to have been written with his wife's consent and in substance was a request made to his attorney to draw up a document predetermining which one of the two died first in the event that both were killed in an accident. The letter was written in anticipation of an automobile trip from Marquette to Washington, D. C., New Orleans, and thence to Los Angeles. In the letter he said: "Should anything unforeseen happen to us, both want you to understand and get my share for my kiddies, for whom I am doing many of these things." He spoke of the Marquette property being very valuable and of the legal effect of the Irene Ayers divorce of 1914 and other matters personal to himself. He admonished his attorney to file carefully away from the office force certain papers and to burn his letter. The latter request was not observed. One of the attorneys for appellant gained permission of Dr. Miller's attorney to examine his letter files containing Dr. Miller's correspondence, and while so doing, and without permission, took from the files the letter in question. The offer to introduce in evidence said letter was objected to as being a privileged communication between client and attorney. The admission of the letter was not pressed, and it was not received in evidence. The court would have been justified in rejecting it for a number of reasons. It was clearly privileged, and its contents had little, if any, relevancy to the issue.

An examination of an excessively large and overfull record convinces us that the judgment of the trial court must be sustained.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Frank M. Kelsey, special administrator of the estate of Mary Moore Miller, deceased, against Jared H. Miller and others. From a judgment for plaintiff in an unsatisfactory amount, he appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, and Victor T. Watkins, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kimball Fletcher, A. P. Thomson, Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, MacDonald & Thompson, and Le Compte Davis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Miller.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in an accounting action for the sum of $693.10. Plaintiff is the appellant herein.

As special administrator of the estate of Mary Moore Miller, deceased, plaintiff brought an action for an accounting for moneys and property in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles against Jared H. Miller, in which he charged him with having fraudulently obtained possession of large sums of moneys and property belonging to said estate, and which moneys and property it is alleged that the said Jared H. Miller would appropriate and embezzle, and that he threatened to remove the same out of the jurisdiction of the court unless restrained by order of the court from so doing. The banking institutions named herein are depositories in which, it is claimed, said Jared H. Miller had on deposit and in safe-deposit boxes large sums of money belonging to said estate, which he was concealing with the intention of appropriating to his own uses. The total amount of money and property for which an accounting was sought is alleged to be an unknown amount in excess of $200,000. Cecil A. Sheward Miller, wife of Jared H. Miller, was subsequently dismissed from the action. Mary Moore Miller died a resident of the county of Los Angeles, February 17, 1921. On May 4, 1921, her husband, Jared H. Miller, was appointed executor of her will. On April 6, 1922, upon application duly made, his powers as executor were suspended pending the hearing of a proceeding to revoke letters testamentary theretofore issued to him, and Frank M. Kelsey, the appellant herein, was appointed special administrator of said estate.

Upon information and belief plaintiff alleged that Mary Moore Miller was not, prior to May 11, 1918, if at any time, the wife of Jared H. Miller, and prior to said year 1918 he claimed to be the husband of Irene Ayers Miller; that he falsely and fraudulently induced said Mary Moore to believe that he was a single person, eligible to contract marriage, when as a fact he was a married man; that, believing him to be eligible to contract marriage, the said Mary Moore was fraudulently induced by him to engage in two separate marriage ceremonies with said Jared H. Miller, to wit, on November 20, 1914, and on October 13, 1915, both being celebrated in the state of Tennessee; that she entertained the belief that said Jared H. Miller was legally competent to contract marriage until at least May, 1918; that by reason of such belief and the faith that she had in the validity of said marriage ceremonies she placed in his possession and under his control, as her agent, large sums of money and valuable property. The period of time for which an accounting is asked extends from 1914 to the date of the filing of the action.

The answer of defendant Jared H. Miller denies all the allegations of the complaint, and alleges that prior to the Tennessee marriages he stated to the decedent, Mary Moore Miller, all of the facts within his knowledge concerning his status as a married or single man. In addition to alleging the Tennessee marriages, the Fresno marriage ceremony performed on May 11, 1918, is alleged. Section 343, Code of Civil Procedure, is pleaded as a bar as to all moneys or property claimed to have been received by appellant prior to April 8, 1918. It is finally alleged in the answer that each and every item of money and property formerly belonging to said decedent, which came into the hands of appellant directly from her or otherwise, was received by him with her consent and approval, and subsequently expended by him with her knowledge; that she at all times consented and directed that each of said items of money or property should be used for any purpose which appellant thought proper and expedient; that from time to time she expressed her approval of the expenditure or use of said money or property; that she never at any time made objection to the expenditure or use of said money or property; and that she and the appellant were estopped by the acts and conduct of decedent.

It is admitted that the facts relied upon in the instant case are basically the same facts that were considered by us in the case of Frank M. Kelsey v. Jared H. Miller (L. A. No. 8539) 263 P. 200, this day decided. In fact, the instant case should have been joined with the case last above cited, inasmuch as both involved the same questions of law and rested practically upon the same facts.

The court in the instant case found against the complaint on every allegation of fraud made therein. A number of the findings are immaterial matters, and may be disregarded. The main finding in this case, and which supports the judgment, is to the effect that Mary Moore Miller deposited in banks, or caused to be deposited in banks, the moneys in suit in the name of herself and husband as joint tenants, with right of survivorship, and that said Jared H. Miller had the full approval and consent of Mary Moore Miller for the spending of any and all funds belonging to her, which were deposited either in his personal bank account or in joint tenancy bank accounts of said Mary Moore Miller and himself.

Unquestionably the evidence supports the conclusion in this case that it was the understanding and agreement between Jared H. Miller and Mary Moore Miller that he should handle and control her estate in the same manner that he would have controlled it had it been community property. Either one of the spouses was at liberty to draw upon, and did draw upon, the funds which were the separate property of the decedent, as their necessities or judgment should dictate. This was in accord with the express wish and will of Mary Moore Miller, as evidenced by her conduct and express words. As she sometimes expressed herself, "What belongs to one belongs to the other." This was her rule during the entire course of her relation with Dr. Miller. The evidence fully sustained the view that she desired Dr. Miller to be the head of the household, with full authority to transact the business of the family, and embark in such enterprises as might appeal to his judgment, without restraint from any source. There is no substantial ground upon which an agency or trust relation between the parties may be sustained.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Proceeding by George W. Moore contesting will of Mary Moore Miller, deceased. From an order revoking the probate of the will, contestees, Jared H. Miller, as executor and individually, and others, appeal. Reversed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, Kimball Fletcher, A. P. Thomson, Hickey & Thompson, MacDonald & Thompson, Le Compte Davis, and Jerome H. Kann, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Anderson & Anderson, Victor T. Watkins, and John L. Richardson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal was taken from an order revoking the probate of the will of Mary Moore Miller, deceased, wife of Jared H. Miller. The grounds of contest set out are in all material respects a duplication of the grounds upon which a cancellation of the deed of joint tenancy to certain real property was attempted in the case of Frank M. Kelsey v. Jared H. Miller (L. A. No. 8539), 263 P. 200, this day decided.

Mary Moore Miller died testate February 17, 1921, in the city of Los Angeles, leaving an estate of considerable value. Her last will and testament was admitted to probate, and her surviving husband was appointed executor. George W. Moore, a nephew of decedent, one of her heirs at law, and a legatee under the will, instituted a contest of said will on the ground that it was procured solely by reason of the fraud practiced by Jared H. Miller upon said Mary Moore Miller. The fraud alleged to have been practiced arises out of their marital relations, which were fully considered by us in Kelsey v. Miller, L. A. No. 8539. In short, it was the claim there, as here, that Jared H. Miller defrauded and deceived Mary Moore Miller into the belief that he was a single man, possessed of much business sagacity and considerable means, when, as a matter of fact, he was a married man and possessed no means or business ability or experience.

The same marriage ceremonies and divorce decrees that were fully considered in Kelsey v. Miller, supra, are alleged in the instant case as constituting a part of the fraudulent means resorted to by Dr. Miller to induce Mary Moore Miller into the belief that she was his lawful wife. The court submitted 106 special findings to the jury. The jury found by special finding (1) that Mary Moore Miller was an unmarried woman at the time of her death, to wit, February 17, 1921, and by finding (2) that she left no surviving husband. A number of issues involving purely questions of law were submitted to the jury for their determination, such as whether the circuit court of Shelby county, Tennessee, had jurisdiction of the person of Jared H. Miller at the time it heard the divorce action in 1909, and whether certain decrees were fraudulently obtained.

The court adopted the findings of the jury and entered judgment to the effect that so much of said will as gave, devised, or bequeathed anything or any power to Jared H. Miller, Lillian M. Hays, and Russell C. Miller, children of Jared H. Miller, was not the last will and testament of Mary Moore Miller. The findings of the jury, adopted by the court, to the effect that the will is the product of the fraud practiced by Jared H. Miller upon his wife, by inducing her to believe that he was her lawful husband, when as a matter of law he was not, and that he fraudulently represented to her that he was a man of affluence and possessed superior financial ability, and that she believed said representations to be true, but as a matter of fact they were false, and that she would not have made him her beneficiary, had she not been fraudulently imposed upon in the manner above set out, are in conflict with our decision in Kelsey v. Miller (L. A. No. 8539), 263 P. 200, and Kelsey, as Special Administrator, v. J. H. Miller et al. (L. A. No. 8894), 263 P. 213, and the judgment of the two trial courts who heard said causes.

The cases above cited on the marriage status of Mary Moore Miller and the fraud alleged to have been practiced upon her by Dr. Miller, who was her husband, necessarily have direct application to the same state of facts which exists in the instant case.

[1] That Mary Moore Miller did exactly what she intended to do with respect to making Dr. Miller and his children legatees and devisees of her will, as shown by her letters, her plans, and conduct, from the first to the last, there can be no doubt. An examination of her will shows that she made, not the will that a woman would have made who was under the domination of evil and sordid influences, but such a will as a free agent would have made, who was actuated by a desire to be both just and charitable. All of her estate did not, by any means, go to Dr. Miller, the person charged with sinister designs on her wealth. She provided that a needy friend, upon whose property she held a mortgage, should not be called upon to pay during the terms of her life. She then provided for the organization of a holding corporation which was to take over all of her bonds, stocks, and other valuable properties, for the purpose of paying annuities to those she wished to make her beneficiaries. She named as trustees of this holding corporation her husband, Jared H. Miller, her brother, George W. Moore, an attorney at law, and her sister, Eliza M. Monroe. Her will then sets out in detail her instructions as to the handling of her affairs. Her bequests follow: To her husband, one-half of the net receipts of said corporation; to her sister, Eliza M. Monroe, $2,400 per annum, and upon her death to her child; to her sister-in-law, Frances E. Moore, $2,400 per annum during her life, and upon her death to be paid to her children; to her sister-in-law, Margaret E. Moore, $2,400 during life; to her brother, George William Moore, $2,400, and upon his death to his child; to her niece, Lucy M. Sustedt, $200 a year; to her nephew, George W. Moore, $200 a year; to her niece, Carrie Moore Post, $200 a year; to her stepson, Russell C. Miller, and stepdaughter, Lillian Miller, $200 each per annum, and upon the death of their father each is to have $1,200 a year. She then makes bequests to three friends, to two of whom she gives $600 a year each, and to the other $300 a year so long as they shall live.

The will upon its face answers the charge that it is the product of fraud and deceit. Her instructions as to how her estate shall pass from one to another in case of death, and the manner in which the business shall be conducted, shows much intelligent thought on the part of Mary Moore Miller. It is the voluntary product of her mind, after months of consultation with her brother by word and by letter, and with her attorney in Los Angeles, and with Dr. Miller. Her letters to her brother with reference to her will continued practically to the time the will was executed. No one can read these letters and entertain a doubt as to her testamentary freedom.

[2] The evidence is absolutely insufficient to sustain a finding that she was under the influence or domination of any person at the time she executed her will. Unquestionably she was then the legal spouse of Jared H. Miller. The will was solemnly executed according to the forms of law, and, being her free and voluntary act, it cannot be lightly set aside.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. CORNELL. (Cr. 3015.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 13, 1928.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 656(5)—Court's appointing alienist to determine defendant's sanity in jury's presence, and commenting on alienist's ability, held not error (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1871, as added by St. 1925, p. 305).

In a homicide trial, where the only defense offered was that of insanity, the court's appointing an alienist under the provision of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1871, as added by St. 1925, p. 305, while a jury was present, and his comment on the experience, ability, and impartiality of said alienist, held not error.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 393(1)—On Insanity defense, permitting evidence of defendant's actions out of court to show simulation held not error.

In a homicide trial, where the only defense was that of insanity, permitting evidence as to the actions of defendant when out of the courtroom, and the contrast with his actions in the courtroom, for the purpose of showing simulation of insanity, held not error as compelling defendant to be a witness against himself.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 722(2)—Prosecutor's comments before jury relative to simulations of defendant relying on insanity held proper.

In a prosecution for murder, where the only defense was that of insanity, prosecutor's comments before the jury relative to simulations of the defendant held proper, where based on evidence of defendant's actions out of court as contrasting with his actions in court.

4. Witnesses $\S$ 255(2)—Permitting deputy district attorney, as witness, to refresh memory of conversation with defendant after arrest, by referring to transcript of evidence taken at preliminary examination, and written by official reporter, held not error (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2047).

In homicide prosecution, permitting a deputy district attorney, as witness, to refresh his memory of a conversation he had had with defendant shortly after defendant's arrest, by referring to the transcript of testimony taken at the preliminary examination, which testimony was there taken down by the court reporter, held not error; the transcript being a proper memorandum, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2047, for such witness to use in refreshing his memory.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 255(2)—Permitting deputy district attorney, as witness, to refresh memory from transcript of testimony taken at preliminary trial, if error, held harmless, in view of other evidence (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2047).

Permitting a deputy district attorney, as a witness in a homicide trial, to refresh his memory from the transcript of testimony taken at the preliminary trial, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2047, if error, held harmless, in view of the fact that the record showed other statements by defendant, in substance identical with that to which the deputy district attorney was called to testify, to the admission of which defendant had not objected at the trial.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 829(1)—Refusing instructions covered by instructions given held not error.

Refusing defendant's offered instructions covered by instructions given held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Odd Cornell was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Paul Garber, J. O. Reavis and Frederick E. Hoar, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., H. Ray Bailey, of Bakersfield, and Joe W. Matherly, of Los Angeles, for the People.

RICHARDS, J. [1] The defendant herein appeals to this court from a judgment imposed upon his conviction of the crime of murder in the first degree by a jury without recommendation, and from an order denying him a new trial. The double murder of which the defendant was thus convicted was committed in the city of Bakersfield on the evening of October 17, 1926; his wife and stepdaughter being the victims of his atrocious and premeditated crime. The defendant, who at the same time made an ineffectual attempt to end his own life, was apprehended upon the scene of his crime, and has at no time denied his part in the commission of the double homicide, except possibly by his plea of not guilty, the only defense, however, offered in his behalf upon the trial being the defense of insanity, the chief points urged upon this appeal having relation to that defense. The first contention which the defendant urges upon this appeal is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in relation to the appointment by it of a certain medical expert upon the issue of the defendant's alleged insanity which had been raised on the defendant's behalf during the course of the trial. Such appointment was made under the provisions of section 1871 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 305). The defendant does not question the power of the court to make such appointment under the terms of such provisions, but relies upon certain irregularities alleged to have occurred in the course of making the same. At the time of its selection of the medical expert so chosen, the trial judge made some comment in the presence of the jury with relation to the experience, ability, and impartiality of said expert, and to the fact that he had been theretofore acting as an expert alienist in the superior courts of Los Angeles. The defendant, while objecting through his counsel to the appointment of said expert by the court, placed such objection upon the ground that the defendant had secured the services of his own experts, and hence was not in need of said or any appointive alienist, but he neither then nor since offered any objection to the character, qualifications, or impartiality of the chosen expert. It would thus seem that no prejudicial injury was suffered by the defendant either through the making of such appointment by the court or by its remarks touching the qualities of the proposed appointee. The appellant cites no authority, and offers no sufficient reason why the action of the court in the matter of the appointment of an official expert under the provisions of the foregoing section of the Code should be had without the presence of the jury. Like every other step in the trial of a criminal cause, it is a proceeding which should be held in open court and in the defendant's presence, and with respect to which the jury should be informed in order to determine what merit there might be in the defendant's objections, if any, to the character, ability, or impartiality of the alienist thus officially to be chosen and to act, and what weight was to be given to his expert observations or opinions.

[2, 3] The appellant's next specification of error relates to the alleged erroneous ruling of the trial court in permitting certain witnesses to testify that the actions and demeanor of the defendant while in court and in the presence and observation of the jury differed from the actions and demeanor of the defendant upon other occasions when out of court. The purpose of this offered evidence was evidently that of showing that the action and demeanor of the defendant while in court and in the presence of the jury were simulated in aid of his defense of insanity. The appellant bases this contention upon the proposition that, since the defendant in a criminal trial cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, his actions and conduct in court and during his trial cannot be made the subject of comparison with his actions and conduct elsewhere without violating the rule which affords to all defendants this protection. The appellant presents no authority in support of such a proposition, nor do we think any such could be found or could in reason exist. The law which requires the presence of a defendant in court during his trial of necessity submits him to the observation and scrutiny of the court and jury. In being thus submitted to inspection and to whatever impressions or deductions the court or jury may draw therefrom, the defendant does not occupy the position or come within the definition of a witness either for or against himself, since to place him in that category would be to place a limitation upon his constitutional right to be there. In the case of People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 347, 19 P. 161, 170, it was held that the action of the court in ordering a defendant to stand up for identification by a witness was not a violation of the constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself; this court aptly observing that the defendant was not thereby "compelled to exhibit any part of his person which the jurors could not see as he walked in and out every day." If a defendant, being thus brought as of right into the presence of the court and jury, so conducts himself as to be suspected of simulation, we can perceive no reason why those who may have observed his actions and conduct elsewhere may not be heard to describe his normal appearance and actions for the purpose of exposing his deception. In this same connection, and upon the like ground, the appellant insists that prejudicial error was committed by the comments which the district attorney in his closing argument was permitted to make upon the conduct and demeanor of the defendant in the courtroom as evincing simulation and as contrasted with his actions and demeanor outside of court. In support of this contention the appellant relies upon the case of People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 370, 202 P. 51, wherein a certain comment of a district attorney upon the defendant's conduct was held improper and prejudicial. In that case, however, the observation of the district attorney was based upon a supposition which had no evidence to support it, viz., that an innocent woman in the ordeal to which the defendant was being subjected during the trial would have given way to tears. In the instant case the inferences which the prosecution sought to present to the jury were strictly within the scope of the evidence which had been introduced before it relating to the defendant's actions and demeanor in and away from the presence of the jury. In so arguing, the district attorney was clearly within his line of duty.

[4, 5] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court was in error in permitting a witness before it to refresh his memory as to a conversation had by him with the defendant shortly after the latter's arrest by referring to the transcript of the testimony taken at the preliminary examination. The appellant insists that such transcript could not be availed of by said witness as a memorandum by which to refresh his memory, for the reason that such memorandum was not made by himself or under his direction, as required by section 2047 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant cites a number of cases which, without attempting to review them in detail, would seem to be clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. In the instant case the statements of the defendant with respect to which the witness wished to refresh his memory were made, not in court or before the magistrate, but were made prior to the preliminary examination and in the presence of the official reporter. The witness being a deputy district attorney, the memorandum of such conversation then taken down by the court reporter comes fairly within the definition of a memorandum made under the witness' direction, and hence available to him as a means of refreshing his recollection under the very provisions of section 2047 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon which the appellant relies. The fact that the same statement was read into the record at the preliminary examination by the same reporter does not militate against its availability by the witness upon the trial of the action. It is not contended that the reporter's transcript was not correct as to the details of the original conversation. If, however, technically an error was committed in this regard, we are of the opinion that it would not be prejudicial, in view of the fact that, as disclosed by the record herein, a number of other statements of the defendant in substance identical with that to which this particular witness was called to testify were offered and admitted in evidence without objection.

[6] The appellant's final contention is that the trial court committed error in the giving or refusing to give certain enumerated instructions to the jury. We have examined the several instructions which were given and of the giving of which the defendant complains, and we fail to find either that they are properly subject to the defendant's criticisms or that the cases which he cites sustain his objections thereto. As to the instructions which he offered and the court refused to give, we find that the appellant in his closing brief concedes that, as to the instruction upon which he most strongly relied as predicated error in its refusal, the trial court in such refusal to give the same committed no error. The other of the defendant's offered instructions which the trial court failed to give are, we find, sufficiently covered by the general body of instructions which had been already given.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

STUART ARMS CO. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 16, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 781(4)—Questions raised on appeal from dismissal of action to restrain tax levy held moot one and one-half years after fiscal year in which taxes were levied.

Questions raised on appeal from dismissal of action to restrain the levy of a tax held moot one and one-half years after the fiscal year in which the taxes were levied, since it was presumed that the tax had been by that time lawfully collected and expended, and hence a restraining order would be useless.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 956(2)—Taxes collected for fiscal year are presumed spent for expenses of year.

Presumption is that taxes collected by municipality for a definite fiscal year are expended for municipal expenses of that year.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 956(2) — Presumption is that excess municipal income from taxes in one year would enter into computing rate for next year.

It is to be presumed that any excess in municipal income from taxes in one fiscal year entered into the computation of the fixing of the rate for the following year.

4. Evidence — 83(1)—No presumption of irregularity may be indulged against public officers.

No presumption of irregularity or failure to perform official duty may be indulged against municipal, or public, officers.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by the Stuart Arms Company against the City and County of San Francisco and others to restrain the levy of a tax. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. On July 13, 1925, Stuart Arms Company, a corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and owning property subject to taxation in the city and county of San Francisco, filed its complaint on behalf of itself and for the benefit of all the taxpayers of said municipality, and particularly those who might choose to join in the action and contribute to the expense of the suit, for a judgment restraining the city and county of San Francisco, the board of supervisors, the mayor, and the tax collector of said city and county from levying a tax for the fiscal year 1925-1926 in excess of $2.7096 on each $100 of the assessed value of all property situate in said city and county, and subject to taxation, and that the mayor be restrained from approving any tax in excess of the rate above named, and that the tax collector be restrained from collecting any tax in excess thereof for said fiscal year, and for a temporary restraining order pendente lite, and for general relief. It is alleged by the complaint that the sum of $2.7096 on each $100 of the assessed value of all property situate within said city is the maximum rate that may be lawfully levied under the provisions of the charter, and that said municipal officers threaten to levy a tax of $4.2179 on each $100 of assessable property in said city and county, computed according to purported budget appropriations adopted by said board of supervisors.

The four defendants, excepting the mayor, who joined with the board of supervisors, demurred separately to the complaint, specifying as the grounds thereof that the complaint stated no facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action against said respective defendants. The court sustained the respective demurrers, with ten days to the plaintiff to amend, which privilege it declined to avail itself of, and in consequence thereof a judgment of dismissal was entered by the court, and this appeal was taken from said judgment.

The city and county of San Francisco is a municipal corporation, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, operating under and by authority of a charter.

We do not deem it helpful to enter into a consideration of the several interesting questions of law presented by counsel in the case, for the reason that there is no substantial relief that we can grant appellant, even if we should adopt its view, and hold, as to the main question, that the levying of a tax was a judicial, rather than a legislative, act, and, further, that appellant's petition was immune from the several attacks made by respondents, and particularly to the objection made by respondents that sections 3819 and 3804, Political Code, furnish the exclusive remedy for the recovery of taxes paid in excess of the amount which the taxing power is authorized by law to levy. Other objections are made to the complaint by respondents, in that it alleges conclusions of law rather than probative facts, and that it does not negative the existence of certain conditions, which, according to the provisions of the charter, may furnish sufficient reason for exceeding the $2.71 levy, claimed by appellant to be the maximum amount that may be lawfully levied.

Respondents make further objection to the complaint on the ground that the tender of payment of appellant's taxes, computed upon a $2.71 basis on the $100, was made in July, a time prior to the day that the tax collector was authorized to receive said tax or any tax, and therefore said tender was premature, and it was not thereafter renewed. Other objections are raised by the demurrants, but, inasmuch as the questions presented by the appellant have become moot by lapse of time, a discussion of them would be nothing more than a profitless task.

[1-4] The assessment, whatever it may have been, has long since been levied and the tax collected. The presumption is that it has been lawfully expended in the administration of municipal affairs. Since the fiscal year of 1925-1926, another fiscal year, 1926-1927, and one-half of 1927-1928, have intervened. The presumption would be that the moneys collected for a definite fiscal year have been expended in payment of municipal demands which accrued during the year for which the fund was provided. If there was an excess for the year 1925-1926, the presumption is that it was carried over into the next year, and entered into the computation of the fixing of the rate for said following year. No presumption of irregularity or failure to perform official duty may be indulged against municipal or public officers. The presumption is that none of the funds raised for the fiscal year 1925-1926 remain uncollected or unexpended. A restraining order therefore would be an idle act.

The appeal is dismissed.

SULLIVAN v. HESS. (Sac. 3915.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 19, 1928.

Wills §93—Finding that grantor's transfer of deed in escrow, to be delivered on his death, was not mere testamentary disposition, held proper.

Finding that transaction by which grantor executed deed and placed it in sealed envelope, to be held in escrow and delivered on his death, was intended to constitute absolute delivery, vesting title in property in grantee and reserving in grantor only a life estate therein, and was not mere testamentary disposition, held proper, where grantor by signed statement on envelope expressly surrendered all dominion and control over deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by J. M. Sullivan against Cecelia Hess. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Donald Wachhorst, of Sacramento, and Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hughes, Bradford, Cross & Prior, of Sacramento, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. The plaintiff brought an action to quiet title to real property. On the issues raised by the answer and cross-complaint of the defendant, and the answer of the plaintiff thereto, judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff and appellant, John M. Sullivan, is the surviving brother of M. J. Sullivan, who died intestate. The defendant and respondent, Cecelia Hess, claims title under a deed executed by the decedent, which was placed in escrow and not recorded until after the grantor's death. The appellant claims as an heir of the decedent, and seeks to avoid the operation of the deed upon the ground that its execution constituted an attempt to make testamentary disposition of the property, and that there was in fact no valid delivery. Contending that there is no evidence to justify it, he challenges the finding, "that said deed was on said December 6, 1923, duly executed, acknowledged, and delivered by the said M. J. Sullivan with the intention of making the delivery absolute, vesting title to said property therein described in the said Cecelia Hess, and retaining unto himself only a life estate therein; that said deed was not made by the said M. J. Sullivan as a testamentary disposition of the property described therein."

There is no merit in the appeal. Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 161 P. 495; Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 221 P. 191. The intention of the grantor to pass title and the delivery were satisfactorily proved by the uncontradicted testimony of the grantor's attorney. He prepared the deed at the grantor's request, and as directed by him. After the due execution of the instrument, the grantor, who was carefully and fully advised in the matter, placed the deed in a sealed envelope, on which he wrote the following indorsement:

"The within deed was on the 6th day of December, 1923, by me, the undersigned, delivered to J. R. Hughes, to be by him held in escrow until my death. I do hereby surrender all dominion and control over said deed. On the happening of my death, he shall deliver the same to Cecelia Hess.

"[Signed] M. J. Sullivan."

On the day after the grantor died, the deed was recorded in the office of the county recorder.

The judgment is affirmed.

BERGUIN et ux. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (L. A. 8943.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 10, 1928.

1. Appeal and error §1046(5)—Remarks of court when plaintiff was assisted to witness stand that such help was unnecessary held prejudicial error (Const art. 6, § 19; Pen. Code, § 1126).

In action for injuries causing weakened physical condition, abnormally fast pulse, bodily tremor, and bad heart condition, remarks of court when, on second day of her testimony, plaintiff was assisted to stand, that such assistance was unnecessary, held to constitute prejudicial error, where evidence was sufficient to justify a verdict for plaintiff, and in view of evidence as to injuries, and lack of any showing that plaintiff's condition was feigned, or that she was attempting to create false impression with jury, as such conduct of the court involved an invasion of the exclusive province of the jury, contrary to Const. art. 6, § 19, and Pen. Code, § 1126.

2. Appeal and error §201(2)—Failure to request court to instruct jury to disregard court's own prejudicial utterances held not to prevent asserting error.

Failure of plaintiffs to request court to instruct jury to disregard court's own prejudicial statements when one of plaintiffs was assisted to stand held not to prevent plaintiffs from claiming court's conduct was error.

3. Street railroads ☞99(5)—Motorist, driving on street car tracks, is not guilty of negligence per se.

Conduct of motorist, in driving automobile on street car tracks, does not constitute negligence per se.

4. Street railroads ☞117(35)—Right of occupant of automobile to recover under last clear chance doctrine for injuries by street car held for jury.

Issue of plaintiffs' right to recover under last clear chance doctrine held for jury, in action for injuries to occupant of automobile, where driver made left turn in front of street car and proceeded along or near street car tracks, and motorman overtook automobile and bumped into it, causing injuries.

5. Negligence ☞83—Last clear chance doctrine applies, where negligent plaintiff is unconscious of danger.

Last clear chance doctrine applies, not only to cases where negligent plaintiff knows his position of danger and cannot by exercise of ordinary care escape from it, but also where negligent plaintiff is oblivious to or unconscious of dangerous position.

6. Street railroads ☞103(3) — Street railway was liable under last clear chance doctrine for injuries, if motorman could by exercise of proper care have avoided collision.

Occupant of automobile was entitled to recover against street railway for injuries under last clear chance doctrine, even if her husband, driving automobile, who was coplaintiff, was negligent in driving near to or on street car tracks, if motorman on street car, aware of dangerous situation of automobile, could, by exercise of proper care, have avoided bumping into it.

7. Street railroads ☞113(7)—Failure of motorman to ring bell held material in action for injuries to occupant of automobile proceeding ahead at supposedly safe distance.

Where driver of automobile, making left turn in front of street car and proceeding on or near street car tracks, testified that he believed he was in safe position with respect to on-coming street car, failure of street car motorman to ring bell was material, in action for injuries to occupant of automobile resulting from collision, and excluding such question from jury's consideration was error.

8. Street railroads ☞99(5)—One driving vehicle on street car tracks is not guilty of negligence per se in failing to keep constant watch behind.

It is not negligence per se for one who is driving his vehicle astride of or in close proximity to a street car track to fail to keep a constant watch behind for an approaching street car.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by George F. Berguin and wife against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles (Aubrey M. Finley, of Pasadena, of counsel), for appellants.

Frank Karr, E. E. Morris, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from judgment in favor of defendants in an action to recover alleged damages resulting from collision between automobile in which plaintiffs were riding and an electric street car of defendant corporation operated by defendant Stringfellow. Praying for damages in amount of $36,000 for injuries suffered by plaintiff Clara F. Berguin, consequential damages suffered by the husband, and damage to the automobile, plaintiffs allege negligent operation of the street car by defendant Stringfellow. The answer charges plaintiffs with contributory negligence. Verdict of the jury was for defendants.

The facts are substantially as follows: Plaintiff George F. Berguin, with his wife and son, was driving north on Serrano avenue, Los Angeles, with the intention of turning left into and thence proceeding west on Hollywood boulevard, a cross-boulevard on which street cars run east and west. When plaintiff reached Hollywood boulevard, he noticed a street car some distance away—this distance, as testified to by the different witnesses, varying from a block and a half to but a few yards. At any rate, plaintiff made a square left turn into Hollywood boulevard ahead of the street car and proceeded along the car track, whereupon the car crashed into his machine, knocking it over to the right curb, and entangling a Ford automobile there parked in the collision. The testimony is conflicting on many points, for instance, as to speed of both automobile and street car, as to the distance the automobile proceeded on Hollywood boulevard before being hit, and as to whether the motorman rang his gong continuously for a block before and after reaching the crossing, or whether he neglected to ring it until a second before the impact. It is unnecessary, however, to discuss the evidence at length, as appellants do not attack its sufficiency or insufficiency to support the verdict. It is only necessary to consider parts of it in connection with the errors of law claimed.

Appellants first allege misconduct of the trial court; second, they complain of his failure to give their requested instruction, or any instruction, upon the doctrine of the last clear chance; and, third, they attack the instruction given as to the lack of materiality of sounding the street car gong.

[1] The act of the trial court upon which misconduct is predicated occurred when plaintiff Clara F. Berguin was being assisted by some one when she was about to resume the witness stand at the convening of court on the second day of her testimony. The record shows the following occurrence:

"The Court: I think Mrs. Berguin was on the stand.

"Mr. Harris: I have a doctor here.

"The Court: Just a moment. One thing I want to say: It is not necessary for this lady to be helped to the witness stand. I don't imagine she is helped around her own home, and I don't like to see that in court.

"Mr. Harris: I don't know that she is being helped.

"The Court: I saw it just now.

"Mr. Harris: I don't know that your honor knows whether it is necessary.

"The Court: Then we will find out.

"Mr. Harris: I take exception to that.

"The Court: All right. You can take your exception, and I will examine her and find out whether she is or not.

"Mr. Harris: Then do that, but I think the comment is unnecessary.

"The Court: It is not unnecessary. Whenever anything of that kind happens in my department, I expect to speak about it.

"Mr. Harris: I know, but your honor is intimating to the jury— (Interruption.)

"The Court: Call your doctor, Mr. Harris.

"Mr. Harris: I assign that as misconduct. I don't think a remark is necessary, and I don't know that the remark is necessary.

"The Court: She came up to the witness stand yesterday by herself.

"Mr. Harris: I think your honor will find you are in error.

"The Court: She came up to the witness stand yesterday by herself.

"Mr. Harris: I know she did, but yesterday is one day and to-day is another day.

"The Court: Proceed with your case.

"Mr. Harris: Dr. Wright."

The extent of the physical condition of this witness as the result of the collision was the chief element of damages in the case. At the time of the above remarks of the court, one physician had already testified that this plaintiff was suffering from a toxic exophthalmic goiter, the result of which was a greatly weakened physical condition, an abnormally fast pulse, and a tremor of the body, with protrusion of the eyes. The proof also showed that she was unable to adequately perform the duties of her household and spent much of her time in bed; also, that her heart was badly involved. There was no evidence whatsoever that her condition was in any way feigned, nor was there any evidence that her attorneys, or her husband, or any other persons were contriving to create a false impression in the minds of the jury as to her condition, or even to exaggerate or emphasize it. The offer of assistance was apparently a spontaneous impulse, presumably of her 15 year old son or her husband.

Following the colloquy above quoted, Dr.

Wright, instead of this plaintiff, took the witness stand and gave the same diagnosis of her condition as had been given previously, testifying that at the time he was called, which was on a recent date, she had all the symptoms above mentioned, together with a pulse of something like 160. He also observed that excitement tended to intensify and aggravate her malady and increase her weakness; that sometimes a patient with this disease could navigate, notwithstanding such rapid heart action, but at other times "their heart beats in a tumultuous manner and rest seems imperative." He also said that "anything that over-excites the nervous system, if finally continued, will bring on exhaustion." The trial of the cause and the strain of being on the witness stand were impliedly recognized by him as one of the causes of such excitement.

This condition was apparently present when the lady, a few moments after the incident above referred to, did in fact resume the witness chair. She could not make herself heard and complained of being nervous. A pause was made in the proceedings to allow her to compose herself, whereupon the court said:

"I think you had better defer the examination until later in the day."

The examination proceeded, however, for a few questions, whereupon the court again said:

"Now, it is difficult for her to speak loud. The reporter evidently hears it. He can repeat each answer after the witness. It is difficult for her to make herself heard."

The foregoing facts show clearly the absence of any intentional effort to deceive the court or jury. The remarks of the court, in view of these facts, could not have been other than highly prejudicial. A perfect case in plaintiffs might well have been destroyed by such remarks. The standing of plaintiff, both as a witness and as a litigant, doubtless withered like a leaf in a flame before these burning words of the court. It needs no citation to convince any unbiased observer that a jury has both ears and eyes open for any little word or act of the trial judge, from which they may gather enough to read his mind and get his opinion of the merits of the issues under review. The learned and distinguished trial court doubtless regretted the hasty act on his part, but the jury were not adequately or at all apprized of this fact. In fact, throughout the trial plaintiffs' counsel were repeatedly subjected to the severest strictures by the court, many of which seem unwarranted.

The evidence of plaintiffs' witnesses would have amply supported a verdict in their behalf. We agree with the language of O'Connor v. United Railroads, 168 Cal. 43, 47, 141 P. 809, 811, as follows:

"It must be apparent that, in operating a street car over a public street, a motorman cannot under ordinary circumstances run down a vehicle proceeding in the same direction without having been negligent in the operation of his car. The mere fact that he does so furnishes cogent evidence of negligence, which is rarely capable of explanation."

See, also, Callett v. Cen. Cal., etc., Co., 36 Cal. App. 240, 246, 171 P. 984, and Adamson v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. App. 256, 259, 225 P. 875.

The above error must therefore be held sufficient, in and of itself, under the circumstances of this case, to compel a reversal of the judgment, for under our system of procedure the trial judge may not thus invade the exclusive province of the jury. "Under a system of law which prohibits judges from charging juries with respect to matters of fact (Const. art. 6, § 19), and which gives to the jury the exclusive power to determine the facts (Pen. Code, § 1126), the trial judge should, as has often been pointed out, use the greatest care to avoid, in the presence of the jury, any utterance which may be construed as an intimation of his opinion on the issues of fact which are to be determined by the jury [citing cases]. * * * Anything said by the judge, indicating that the witness on the stand had, by her demeanor, created a favorable impression on his mind, would naturally tend to lead the jury to give to her testimony greater weight than they otherwise might. * * * Such an intimation constituted an invasion of the jury's province of judging the facts, in the light of the appearance and demeanor of witnesses, and might be highly prejudicial." People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 550, 551, 140 P. 256, 258. See, also, McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300, 320-321; People v. Willard, 92 Cal. 482, 490, 28 P. 585; Abbott v. Coronado Beach Co., 55 Cal. App. 179, 182, 203 P. 145; People v. Frank, 71 Cal. App. 575, 580, 581, 236 P. 189.

[2] There is no merit in the suggestion that an exception by counsel to these remarks of the court cannot avail appellant, because he did not go further and request the court to instruct the jury to disregard the court's own utterances. The rule contended for is set down in such cases as Compton-Gardena Milling Co. v. McCartney, 69 Cal. App. 708, 231 P. 764, People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 159, 65 P. 295, Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., 156 Cal. 713, 717, 106 P. 83, and People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 537, 545, 117 P. 549. But the reasons for this rule are entirely absent when applied to the acts and conduct of the court himself. A second appeal of this character to the court would in all probability have made a bad matter worse. The remarks would probably have been repeated with emphasis, and in addition counsel would have found himself in a position anything but pleasant or secure.

[3, 4] The evidence of plaintiff was also sufficient to justify an instruction on the doctrine of last clear chance. This is true because of the following facts: Plaintiff George F. Berguin's testimony was that ample time and space existed when he last saw the street car to warrant the belief on his part that it would be safe to enter the intersection and turn west upon the boulevard, and, in view of the congested traffic, to drive along or upon the car tracks. There is no rule of law that required him, after making up his mind to this effect to continue to look backward for the on-coming of the street car, when his duties directed him to look in front. It is not negligence to drive even upon the car tracks of a street. The rule in this behalf has been stated as follows:

"As a general rule, whether a person has exercised ordinary care or not is to be left to the jury, to be determined by them from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time. But it was not negligence per se for the plaintiff to drive along the street as he did in proximity to the track of the defendant. This of itself did not constitute negligence at all. The streets of a municipality are for the use of the traveling public, and the right of a street car company is only to use it in common with the public. The fact that the company has been granted a right to lay tracks and operate cars along the streets gives it no exclusive right to travel even over that portion of the street covered by its tracks. Other vehicles have a right to travel over the entire street, including the space between the tracks. Nor is this right restricted to the times when other portions of the street may be crowded or in bad condition. Nor is a traveler, in doing so, in any sense of the term a trespasser." Adamson v. San Francisco, supra, at page 259 (225 P. 876), quoting from O'Connor v. United Railroads, supra.

Taylor v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 638, at 650, 158 P. 117, 123, approves the language of Fujise v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 12 Cal. App. 207, 216, 107 P. 317, as follows:

"The sum of the adjudicated cases bearing upon the relative rights of street cars and citizens traveling in vehicles drawn by horses or other animals is that both have a right to use the street, but neither has the exclusive right. The motorman of a street car is not necessarily obliged to stop his car when he sees a man driving in a vehicle along the line of a railway ahead of the car, but he may continue to run the car in a proper manner until he is conscious of the fact that the driver is unaware or heedless of his danger. * * * Seeing a man driving along the track, the motorman may assume that he will turn aside and out of the way of the car; but he cannot rest on the assumption so long as to allow his car to reach a point where it will be impossible for him to control his car or give warning in time to prevent injury to the man or vehicle."

It is also true, taking the defendants' evidence, that the jury would have been warranted in believing that the motorman saw the position of plaintiff, and knew it was one of danger, from which he could not alone extricate himself, and had time thereafter within which to check the speed of his car, or to stop same outright, if necessary, and thus avoid the collision. For the motorman himself testified that he saw plaintiff coming at a terrific rate of speed, and that he had so much speed he could not stop. This observation on the part of the motorman must have occurred at least 125 feet and may have occurred at a much greater distance, from the point of the impact. He admitted, also, that he did not stop his car until some 90 or 95 feet beyond that point. At a rate of 15 miles per hour he could have stopped in about 75 feet; at 18 miles in less than 100 feet.

[5] It is no answer to this observation to say that plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care could have extricated himself. The rule of last clear chance applies, not only to cases where the negligent plaintiff knows his position of danger and cannot by the exercise of ordinary care escape from it, but also applies equally as well to cases where the negligent plaintiff is oblivious to or unconscious of his position of danger. Arnold v. Oak Term. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 164 P. 798. In other words, and as a second hypothesis, the motorman practically admitted a realization of plaintiff's position of danger, of which the jury might well have believed said plaintiff was oblivious; that the motorman knew of this fact, and after thus realizing it could have stopped the car in time to have avoided the accident. The rule has also been stated in this language:

"The plaintiff's right of recovery exists when the defendant, after having discovered his peril, having also reasonable ground to believe him unconscious of danger, or unable to avoid it, might himself, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, have prevented the mischief which followed." 20 R. C. L. p. 143, § 117.

[6] The court gave no instruction on this subject. The instruction requested and refused by the court was in the following words:

"If you believe from the evidence that the driver of the automobile was guilty of negligence in driving too near, or upon, the track of the street railway company, but you also believe from the evidence that the motorman driving the street car belonging to the railway company was aware of the dangerous situation of the automobile and that he had a clear opportunity by exercise of proper care to have avoided the collision but failed to do so, and as a direct consequence of such want of proper care the collision occurred, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff and against the defendant."

This instruction was expressly approved in Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal App. 649, 117 P. 956, and while it is true the instruction could have been better framed by stating therein that the motorman must have known of plaintiff's inability to escape his position of danger or of his obliviousness thereto, nevertheless, in view of the practical admission of the motorman as to such knowledge, or at least to such belief, we cannot say that it was erroneous as applied to the facts of this cause.

"I do not think that the failure to ring a bell, if he did fail to ring a bell, as it was approaching this crossing, has anything to do with this case, because it appears beyond controversy by the testimony of Mr. Berguin that he saw the car coming. A motorman or a party driving an automobile, in this case, Mr. Berguin, suddenly confronted with unexpected danger, is required to exercise only that care which an ordinarily prudent man confronted with such unexpected danger would exercise."

We think that the giving of this instruction under the facts of this case was also error. To give this instruction was to ignore the testimony of plaintiffs. It is true, that, if said plaintiff George F. Berguin had known that the street car was bearing down upon him and demanding that he surrender his position to give right of way to it, the ringing of the bell would have been immaterial; but ordinarily an automobile will easily, all things being equal, maintain a lead over an ordinary street car. The cases of Starck v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 277, 280, 156 P. 51, L. R. A. 1916E, 58, Taylor v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 638, 647, 648, 158 P. 119, and Lambert v. So. Pac. R. R. Co., 146 Cal. 231, 236, 79 P. 873, are not applicable to the case before us. Plaintiff's testimony to the effect that he was in a safe position with respect to the on-coming car at the time he turned west at the intersection cannot be ignored. This being true, his duty to look ahead, and not behind, would have demanded of the motorman the ringing of the bell, or the use of some other method of attracting attention of said plaintiff, before coming into collision with him. It being also conceded that a great deal of traffic existed on this boulevard at the time of the collision, the necessity for travel on or near the car tracks may have existed. The true rule in this behalf may be found in the following cases:

"As one of the traveling public the driver of an automobile is entitled as of right to use the entire street, subject only to the limitation that, as the use of the street by the railway company is confined to its tracks, the driver must not unnecessarily interfere with or obstruct a car in its movement thereon. O'Connor v. United Railways [168 Cal. 43, 141 P. 809] supra. Equally true is it that it is not negligence per se for one who is driving his vehicle astride of or in close proximity to a street car track to fail to keep constant watch behind for an approaching car. In O'Connor v. United Railways, supra, at page 49 [141 P. 811], the court says: 'Nor did the fact that he (the driver of the hotel bus) did not keep a constant watch behind for an approaching car while driving near the track show want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff or constitute negligence per se.' (Italics ours.) The reason for this, as stated in the O'Connor Case, is that one driving along a public highway in the same direction in which a car may approach from behind is necessarily engaged in looking in front of him to have a care that he does not collide with some other vehicle ahead enjoying also the common use of the highway. The exercise of ordinary care makes it his duty to look ahead so as to avoid any collision with those in advance of him. And as it is not possible for him to look simultaneously forward and backward, it necessarily is not negligence per se to fail to keep a constant watch behind for an approaching street car. * * * For this reason, although it cannot be said that one who is driving a vehicle along or in close proximity to a street car track is in duty bound to keep a constant watch behind for approaching cars, it is his duty to turn off or away from the tracks when he sees or hears, or by the exercise of reasonable care should see or hear, a car approaching from the rear. He should listen for and he should heed whatever signal there may be of an approaching car."

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1928.

Malicious prosecution §24(5)—Accused had no cause of action for malicious prosecution after judgment of conviction became final by failure to appeal.

Plaintiff convicted of petit larceny in prosecution instituted by defendants had no cause of action for malicious prosecution against defendants after judgment had become final by reason of the absence of an appeal, since such judgment after becoming final is conclusive on the question of probable cause for arrest, prosecution, and conviction, in absence of a direct and successful attack thereon based on extrinsic fraud in its procurement.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Harry C. Lucas, Judge.

Action by Mary Roos against J. C. Harris and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George W. Smith and Ralph H. Smith, both of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

James A. Hall and Wyckoff & Gardner, all of Watsonville, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants made and entered in the superior court in and for the county of Santa Cruz after the granting of a motion made by the defendants for a judgment on the pleadings, upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This action was one for malicious prosecution; the complaint alleging that the defendants caused to be instituted against the plaintiff a criminal proceeding for petit larceny, by reason of which the plaintiff was arrested, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment for six months. The complaint further alleges that the acts of the defendants in that regard were malicious and without reasonable or probable cause, and that the conviction of the plaintiff was obtained by means of conspiracy on the part of the defendants and by means of false testimony given by the defendants in said criminal proceeding. It is nowhere alleged in the complaint that the judgment of conviction was either appealed from or reversed upon appeal. We cannot agree with the contention of the plaintiff and appellant herein that a complaint containing the foregoing averments sufficiently states a cause of action for malicious prosecution. The vice of the plaintiff's contention in that regard consists in her failure to aver that the proceedings in the criminal action taken against her by the defendants had terminated in her favor. On the contrary, it sufficiently appears that said proceedings resulted in her conviction and that such judgment of conviction had become final prior to the institution of the present action. We are pointed to no authority by the appellant, and we are satisfied that none such exists, wherein a civil action for malicious prosecution has ever been sustained when the plaintiff, as a result of such prosecution, has been convicted, and when the judgment of conviction has either been sustained upon appeal or has become final by reason of the absence of an appeal. When such judgment has thus become final, it is conclusive upon the question of probable cause for the arrest, prosecution, and conviction of the defendant, in the absence of a direct and successful attack thereon based upon extrinsic fraud in its procurement.

The assault which the plaintiff and appellant herein makes upon said judgment is collateral, and is predicated upon averments of intrinsic fraud. The finality of said judgment having foreclosed any and every assault thereon by the person adjudged guilty thereunder (People v. Mooney, 178 Cal. 525, 174 P. 325), in the proceeding which resulted in such judgment, on the ground of intrinsic fraud, we are unable to perceive how the conclusive presumption arising therefrom could be as-sailable by the person convicted thereunder, or by any one else, in a collateral proceeding up-on the same ground. The cases of Holliday v. Holliday, 123 Cal. 26, 55 P. 703, Carpenter v. Sibley, 153 Cal. 215, 94 P. 879, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1143, 126 Am. St. Rep. 77, 15 Ann. Cas. 484, and Black v. Knight, 44 Cal. App. 770, 187 P. 89, do not support her contention, since in each of said causes the judgment had been re-versed or the suit dismissed before the com-mencement of the action for malicious prose-cution. We are satisfied that the complaint of the plaintiff and appellant herein, in the absence of a like essential averment, failed to state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

BUCK v. BORCHERS. (S. F. 12207.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1928.

Appeal and error §1015(2)—Where evidence is conflicting, trial court will be deemed not to have abused discretion in granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence.

Where there is substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion in granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence, and its decision will not be disturbed.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Krell Buck against B. W. Borchers. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Booth, of San Francisco, and C. W. Moore, of San Jose (George B. Harris, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

F. H. Benson and D. T. Jenkins, both of San Jose, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial based upon insufficiency of the evidence. The action was for damages for personal injuries resulting from defendant's alleged negligence. The defendant was driving an automobile, and the plaintiff was riding upon a motorcycle at the time of the accident. The record discloses a conflict in the testimony. While there is evidence in support of the verdict, there is also evidence which, if believed, would exonerate the defendant, such as the testimony to the effect that the plaintiff was driving at a terrific rate of speed at the time of the accident and that there were no lights upon the motorcycle, although the accident occurred at night; that the defendant swerved to his left in a vain attempt to avoid plaintiff. There is also the evidence afforded by the photographs that the motorcycle crashed into the side of the defendant's automobile, evidently at a high rate of speed. There is also in evidence the further fact that the plaintiff was riding upon a motorcycle having a seat for only one person, and that that seat was occupied by a girl companion, while plaintiff sat in front of her in a position not intended for the operator of the vehicle.

Under these circumstances we may not interfere with the discretion vested in the trial court upon an application for a new trial. This court has recently stated in Rosenberg v. Moore, 194 Cal. 393, 229 P. 34, that, if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict or finding is against the weight of the evidence and that there should be a new trial. It is useless to cite further authorities for a proposition of law as well settled as is the one applicable here. Numerous authorities are cited in the case last mentioned, and many more are available to the same effect.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KELLY. (Cr. 2996.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 13, 1928.

1. Jury §9—Right of jury trial guaranteed by Constitution is right as it existed at common law (Const. art. 1, § 7).

The right of a trial by jury guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 7, is the right as it existed at common law, hence any act of the Legislature attempting to abridge that right is void.

2. Jury §31(11)—Statute permitting indictment to charge two or more offenses held not violative of right to jury trial (Const. art. 1, § 7; Pen. Code, § 954).

Pen. Code, § 954, providing that an indictment may charge two or more offenses connected in commission, or two or more of same class though not connected in commission, held constitutional, against objection that it violated the provisions of Const. art. 1, § 7, guaranteeing right of trial by jury.

3. Indictment and Information §127—Crimes of same grade could be joined in separate counts in one indictment at common law.

Crimes of the same grade or class could at common law be joined in separate counts in one indictment.

4. Indictment and Information $\S$ 130—Indictment charging three murders in separate counts, committed at different times, held not objectionable (Pen. Code, $\S$ 954).

Indictment charging, in three separate counts, accused with having committed three murders on the same evening, and night, but at different times, held not objectionable, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 954.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 618—Refusing to order separate trials on three counts in indictment, each charging different murder, held not abuse of discretion, where indictment showed murders committed on same day, in same city and county (St. 1915, p. 744).

Where homicide indictment showed that the three murders stated therein were committed by the same person, on the same day, and in the same city and county, court's refusal to order separate trials on the three counts held not abuse of discretion, under St. 1915, p. 744.

6. Jury $\S$ 136(8)—On trial for three murders, defendant held not entitled to same number of peremptory challenges as if trials were separate (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1070).

Where defendant was charged in three separate counts of one indictment with three different murders, held, that the fact that Pen. Code, $\S$ 1070, gave him the right to exercise twenty peremptory challenges did not permit his exercising three times that many, or the number which he would have been permitted had the trials been separate, merely because the prosecutions were combined into one trial.

7. Homicide $\S$ 171(3)—In trial for three murders, evidence of all crimes committed by defendant and accomplice on night of murders held admissible.

In trial of defendant for three murders committed at different times, but on the same evening and night, admitting evidence of all crimes committed by defendant and his accomplice on that night held not error.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 768(1)—Instructing jury to disabuse minds of idea prosecution was improperly attempting to convey wrong impression concerning defendant's crimes, together with prosecutor's remarks objected to, did not make trial unfair.

Where, during the prosecutor's closing argument in a murder trial, the court instructed the jurors that they were to disabuse their minds of the idea that the prosecution was improperly attempting to convey a wrong impression to them concerning the crimes committed by the defendant, such instruction, together with the prosecutor's remarks objected to, held not to have made the trial an unfair one.

9. Jury $\S$ 103(9)—Denying challenge for cause of prospective juror who stated objection to insanity defense, but that he could give insanity plea fair consideration, held not error.

In a murder trial, where a prospective juror upon voir dire expressed his prejudice against defenses based on insanity pleas, but stated further that, if chosen as a juror, he would set aside the prejudice, receive the evidence with open mind, and consider it fairly, denying defendant's challenge of witness as a juror held not error.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 1170½(1)—Refusal of doctor's testimony, given before coroner's jury, to impeach his trial testimony as to kinds of bullets taken from bodies of deceased held not prejudicial.

In a murder trial, refusal to permit defendant to introduce testimony of a doctor, given before the coroner's jury, to impeach such doctor's testimony at the trial as to the kind of bullets which he had taken from the bodies of the murdered victims held not prejudicial, the only apparent discrepancy in his testimony being as to one bullet being steel jacketed, and bullets being admitted in evidence so subject to jury's examination.

11. Homicide $\S$ 174(7)—Officers' testimony that defendant was hiding when arrested week after murders and attempted to escape held admissible.

In murder trial, testimony of police officers that when the defendant was found at his home a week after the murders were committed he was in hiding and attempted to escape held properly admitted for the purpose of showing a consciousness of guilt.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 406(2)—Evidence of defendant's response and reaction when confession of alleged accomplice was read to him preceding trial held admissible.

Where defendant, while lying wounded in hospital, had been visited by police officers and alleged accomplice who was recognized by defendant, and there was read to him an alleged confession of such accomplice, evidence of defendant's response and reaction when such confession of the alleged accomplice was read to him held admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Clarence Kelly was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Milton T. U'Ren, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Isadore Golden, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

WASTE, C. J. The appellant, Clarence Kelly, and Michael Papadaches were jointly charged by indictment with the commission of three murders, each alleged in a separate count. Both defendants entered pleas of not guilty. Their separate motions for a severance were granted, and the record now before us relates only to the trial and appeal of the defendant Kelly. His demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and his motion to compel the prosecution to elect as to which charge in the indictment it would submit to the jury was denied. After a lengthy trial, the jury returned three verdicts, one for each count of the indictment, each finding the defendant guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, without recommendation. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the court pronounced judgment sentencing the defendant to pay the extreme penalty. He has appealed from the judgments of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. He rests his appeal upon the contention that he was deprived of certain constitutional and legal rights, greatly to his prejudice in the light of the evidence, and upon alleged prejudicial errors occurring during the trial.

According to the evidence, the appellant, Papadaches, and a boy known as "Spannie" spent the greater part of October 11, 1926, loafing and drinking in various places in San Francisco. In the early evening, the appellant, who was armed with a pistol, and Papadaches procured a Yellow taxicab, driven by Walter Swanson, and were taken to Third and Sixteenth streets, at which point they entered upon an almost unbelievable orgy of crime. They there compelled Swanson to get out of the cab, searched him, took away his cap and badges, and the appellant shot and killed him. The appellant then put on Swanson's cap and badges, which he wore during the rest of the evening, got in the driver's compartment of the taxicab, and drove away from the scene of the shooting with Papadaches as an ostensible passenger. The killing of Swanson is charged in the first count of the indictment.

A few minutes after the shooting of Swanson, the appellant, driving the taxicab, approached Mike Petrovich, who was walking along the sidewalk near the intersection of San Bruno avenue and Mariposa street. He asked Petrovich the time, and almost instantly shot and killed him, for no apparent reason other than a lust for killing, and with no apparent provocation. This offense is charged in the second count of the indictment.

Appellant and Papadaches then robbed a "soft drink place" at the corner of Seventeenth and Mississippi streets. A few minutes later they entered a restaurant at Seventh and Brannan streets. While Papadaches "cleaned out the till," the appellant intimidated the patrons and others in the place with his pistol. Louis Ferrando appears to have said something about the affair being a "joke," and the appellant instantly shot him, inflicting a wound in his neck. The bandits then robbed a gasoline service station across the street from the restaurant, where the appellant shot and seriously wounded Carl W. Johnson, the proprietor, and Rex Hayden, and shot and killed John Duane. The murder of Duane is charged in the third count of the indictment.

The appellant and Papadaches then held up, beat, and robbed three other men at different points. While they were searching the last victim, an attendant at an oil station, a police officer drove his automobile into the place, and the bandits fled in the taxicab. In the pursuit which followed, during which a number of shots were fired by the pursuers, the appellant wrecked the taxicab. Papadaches and he separated, running in different directions. A week afterward the appellant was arrested at his home in San Francisco. The place was surrounded by police officers, and a search was made for Kelly. He was in hiding, and, when discovered, attempted to get away, but was shot and seriously wounded by the arresting officers. Papadaches, who became a witness for the prosecution, testified to all that occurred during the wild escapade in which he and the appellant had engaged. His testimony was amply corroborated by other witnesses in remarkable detail. As a witness in his own behalf, the appellant admitted that Papadaches, "Spannie," and he were together, and drinking during the day, but insisted that his mind was a blank and he remembered nothing that happened on the evening and night in question. He does not make a direct attack on the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgments of conviction, but contends that the evidence regarding the murder of Swanson and the murder of Petrovich was of such weak character that if he had been tried separately upon those charges he would have been entitled to an advisory verdict of acquittal as to each. He contends, also, that if the evidence of those murders and the evidence of the other crimes committed by him, which was permitted to be introduced because of the threefold charge in the indictment, had been eliminated, there would have been such reasonable doubt as to his having murdered Duane that a verdict of acquittal could reasonably have been looked for. Because of this situation, he contends that he suffered irreparable injury when the trial court overruled his demurrer to the indictment and denied his demands for separate trials upon the three charges of murder. Because of this situation, he also claims that by his being compelled to go to trial on the one indictment, charging the three separate offenses, he was deprived of his constitutional rights to a common-law trial. He rests the proposition on his assertion that, at the common law, there could be no joinder of charges of separate and distinct felonies in the same indictment, and no joint trial of separate and distinct felonies which did not relate to the same act.

under which the present indictment was filed, is unconstitutional in that it makes it possible for one, accused as he was, to be placed on trial at the same time, and with the same jury, on three separate and distinct charges of murder, committed at different times, at different places, upon different individuals, and requiring different evidence from different witnesses to establish each separate act. We know of nothing in the state or Federal Constitutions sustaining appellant's position, and we do not agree with his contention that two crimes of the same grade, or class, could not be joined in separate counts in one indictment at the common law. The authorities appear to hold the other way. The Supreme Court of the United States has announced the view that there is no impropriety in trying one accused of crime for different offenses at the same time, if the offenses are charged in the same indictment and are of the same grade, and subject to the same punishment, and says that "substantially to the same general effect are the decisions of other American courts" (citing cases), and that "the rule in England is not materially different." Pointer v. United States, 151 U. S. 396, 401, 14 S. Ct. 410, 38 L. Ed. 208. The court says (page 403 [14 S. Ct. 412]):

"While recognizing as fundamental the principle that the court must not permit the defendant to be embarrassed in his defense by a multiplicity of charges embraced in one indictment and to be tried by one jury, and while conceding that regularly or usually an indictment should not include more than one felony, the authorities concur in holding that a joinder in one indictment, in separate counts, of different felonies, at least of the same class or grade, and subject to the same punishment, is not necessarily fatal to the indictment upon demurrer or upon motion to quash or on motion in arrest of judgment, and does not, in every case, by reason alone of such joinder, make it the duty of the court, upon motion of the accused, to compel the prosecutor to elect upon what one of the charges he will go to trial. The court is invested with such discretion as enables it to do justice between the government and the accused. If it be discovered at any time during a trial that the substantial rights of the accused may be prejudiced by a submission to the same jury of more than one distinct charge of felony among two or more of the same class, the court, according to the established principles of criminal law, can compel an election by the prosecutor."

[4] Section 954 of the Penal Code, as in force when the crimes here considered were committed, expressly provided, as now, that an indictment may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, and the prosecution is not required to elect between the different offenses or counts so set forth. The defendant may be convicted of any number of the offenses charged, and each offense upon which he is convicted must be stated in the verdict. The court may, however, in the interest of justice and in its discretion, order that the different offenses or counts be tried separately. St. 1915, p. 744. These provisions appear to be in close harmony with the decision in Pointer v. United States, supra, and to preserve to accused persons the rights of the common law. The offenses in the present case were properly joined in one indictment, and the prosecution was not required to elect between them at the instance of the defendant. People v. Dasey, 75 Cal. App. 439, 442, 242 P. 876. The contention that the indictment is defective in that it contains no averment of the theory upon which the joinder of offenses is made falls with its making. The three counts set forth three offenses of the same class of crimes.

[5] The trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to order separate trials on each of the counts. The indictment showed that the three murders were committed by the same person, on the same day, and in the same city and county. These facts alone justified the court in forbearing, at the inception of the trial, to compel an election by the prosecution. When the evidence was concluded, the wisdom of the court's ruling was manifest. Pointer v. United States, supra. The circumstances under which each crime was committed, and the proof required to establish it, necessarily threw light upon the other two. We are therefore of the opinion that no constitutional guaranties of the appellant were denied him.

[6] It is next contended on behalf of the appellant that he was deprived of the number of peremptory challenges allowed him by law. During the course of the examination of the jury on voir dire, the defendant exercised and exhausted the twenty peremptory challenges allowed by section 1070 of the Penal Code. He then demanded that he be permitted to exercise the number of challenges to which he would have been entitled if he had been separately charged with three separate offenses of like nature and tried therefor at different times. The demand was properly denied. People v. Potigian, 69 Cal. App. 257, 266, 231 P. 593; 35 Cor. Jur. 414, par. 474. See, also, People v. Howard, 31 Cal. App. 358, 369, 160 P. 697.

[7] No error was committed by the admission in evidence of all the crimes committed by the appellant and Papadaches on the evening and night of the murders. The proof of one tended to prove facts material to proof of the others. The evidence was, therefore, admissible, and the fact that it might have tended to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors was no ground for its exclusion. People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 114, 193 P. 92.

"The atmosphere created by the assistant district attorney trying the case was of such nature as to preclude a fair and impartial trial."

He has specified a number of instances of alleged misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer. Although he did not assign all of such occurrences as error at the time, we have closely scrutinized the record of all of them, and are satisfied that nothing took place which was of such nature as to prejudicially affect the case of the defendant, or to warrant a reversal of the judgment. Some of the specifications relate to trivial matters, others to the exchange of comment, sometimes amounting to insinuations and direct charges, which were continually passing between counsel. The trial court, although frequently appealed to by counsel for the defense, did not always interfere or rule on the request, for the very sufficient reason that it was unnecessary. At other times he sustained the contention of the defense and instructed the jury to disregard the incident and any inferences which might have arisen from it. In one of the instances most complained of, which occurred during the closing argument of the assistant district attorney, the court instructed the jurors that they were "to disabuse their minds of the idea" that the prosecution was improperly attempting to convey a wrong impression to them concerning the crimes committed by the defendant.

[9] Complaint is made that the trial court committed error in denying the challenge for cause, interposed by the defendant, to juror Smith, who, upon examination on voir dire, expressed himself as prejudiced against a defense based on a plea of insanity. On his answering further that, if chosen as a juror, he would set the prejudice aside, receive the evidence with a free and open mind, take the facts from the witnesses and not from anything heard or read on the outside, give the plea of insanity, if presented, a fair and careful consideration, and follow the instruction of the court upon the subject, the challenge was denied. There was a conflict between different answers of the juror, which it was the function of the trial court to decide (People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 11, 112 P. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193), and from the record of the entire examination we are convinced that no error was committed.

[10] Another contention of the appellant is that error was committed when the trial court did not allow the defendant to impeach the testimony of Dr. Strange, the autopsy surgeon, regarding the bullets taken from the bodies of Swanson and Petrovich. In order to show an alleged contradiction, the defense offered the testimony of the witness given at the coroner's inquest. A designated portion of the record was shown to the witness and read by him, but the court sustained the objection of the prosecution to the line of cross-examination. The testimony before the coroner was not admitted, but is brought here as an exhibit "for identification." The witness testified before the coroner that he performed autopsies upon the bodies of the three murdered men within a few hours after they were killed, and that the bullet taken from the body of Swanson was a steel-packed bullet weighing 93 grains, and that the bullet taken from the body of Petrovich was a lead bullet, not of the "steel-jacketed variety," weighing 68.5 grains. At the trial the witness testified exactly the same way, except that he could not say whether the bullet taken from the body of Petrovich was steel jacketed, that he found it without a steel jacket, and did not search for pieces of steel jacket in Petrovich's body. The only apparent discrepancy in the testimony of the witness, given upon the two occasions, is that at the inquest, and without any further pursuit of the subject, he said the bullet was "not the steel-jacketed variety," while at the trial he said, for the reasons stated, that he could not tell, after it had been fired, whether it was steel jacketed when fired into the body of Petrovich; that he had found many bullets, and later found the steel jackets and fitted them on the bullets. The bullets were admitted in evidence at the request of the defendant, and we fail to perceive how any injury was done to his case.

[11] The testimony of the police officers that, when the defendant was found at his home in San Francisco, a week after the murders were committed, he was in hiding and attempted to escape was properly admitted for the purpose of showing a consciousness of guilt. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 673, 174 P. 892.

[12] While the appellant lay wounded at the City and County Hospital he was visited by police officers who read to him an alleged confession made by Papadaches, who was present, and who was recognized by the appellant. When asked if he had heard what was read, the appellant answered, "Yes sir," and said nothing more. Whether or not the circumstances were such as to permit the introduction of the statement and the evidence of what the defendant did when it was read to him was a question for the trial court to determine. We are satisfied that the statement and the evidence were properly admissible. People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 235, 116 P. 521.

The defendant, Kelly, having been accorded a legal, fair, and impartial trial, the judgments of conviction and the order denying the motion for a new trial are, and each is, affirmed.

GORDON v. PERKINS. (S. F. 12193.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 23, 1928.

- 1. Venue §52(1)—Venue will not ordinarily be changed, where convenience of witnesses requires action to be tried in county where it was brought.

When, in opposition to motion for change of venue to residence of defendant, convenience of witnesses is alleged and requires that action be tried in county where it was brought, place of trial will not ordinarily be changed.

- 2. Venue §37—Unless answer was filed at time demand for change of venue was made, counter-motion to retain case for convenience of witnesses will not lie.

Unless answer has been filed at time demand for change of venue is made, counter motion to retain case on ground of convenience of witnesses will not lie, since, until issues are settled, court cannot determine what testimony will be material.

- 3. Appeal and error §863—Sufficiency of complaint is not before reviewing court on appeal from order granting change of venue.

On appeal from order granting motion for change of venue, question whether complaint states facts sufficient to constitute cause of action which was determined by overruling of demurrer in trial court is not before reviewing court.

- 4. Appeal and error §1024(3)—Order on conflicting affidavits, granting or refusing change of venue, supported by substantial evidence, will not be disturbed.

Where there is substantial evidence to support action of trial court, an order based on conflicting affidavits either in granting or refusing change of venue will not be disturbed.

- 5. Appeal and error §912—Where affidavits on motion for change of venue are conflicting, those favoring prevailing party must be taken as true by reviewing court.

Where there is any conflict in affidavits presented on motion for change of venue, those in favor of prevailing party must be taken as true by reviewing court, and facts stated therein must be considered established.

- 6. Venue §7—Affidavits supporting motion for change of venue back to county where action was brought, on ground of convenience of witnesses, held to authorize granting of motion.

Where venue had been changed to county of defendant's residence in action for damages for breach of contract for sale of real property, affidavits supporting plaintiff's motion for change of venue back to county where action was originally brought, showing names of numerous proposed witnesses, all residents of such county, who would testify to circumstances alleged in complaint and value of land involved which was situated in such county, and various other relevant matters, held to authorize granting of motion.

- 7. Appeal and error §912—All presumptions on appeal favor order changing venue, which will not be interfered with, in absence of clear abuse of trial court's discretion.

All presumptions on appeal are in favor of order as made changing place of trial on ground of convenience of witnesses, since much is confided to court's discretion, and it is only where it is clear that there has been abuse of such discretion that reviewing court will interfere.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; H. V. Alvarado, Judge.

Action by Virgel Gordon against S. J. Perkins. From an order granting a change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lee D. Windrem and W. T. Kearney, both of Richmond, and John W. Maloy, of Madera, for appellants.

Henry I. Maxim and John J. Coghlan, both of Madera, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from an order of the Contra Costa county superior court granting a change of venue from that county to the county of Madera.

The complaint, which was filed in Madera county, alleged damages in the sum of $8,000 suffered by plaintiff because of defendant's failure and refusal to perform his part of a certain written agreement respecting the sale by him to plaintiff of a 40-acre tract of land situate in said county. Defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint, together with notice of motion and demand for change of venue; also affidavit of merits in support thereof, alleging also therein his residence in Contra Costa county. In opposition thereto plaintiff filed his counter affidavit, alleging that the convenience of witnesses and ends of justice would be promoted by retention of the cause in Madera county.

[1, 2] When, in opposition to a motion for a change to the residence of the defendant, the convenience of witnesses is alleged, and requires that an action be tried in the county where it was brought, the place of trial will not ordinarily be changed. This rule, however, is subject to the exception that, unless answer has been filed at the time the demand for change of venue is made, a counter-motion to retain the case on such ground will not lie, for the obvious reason that, until the issues are settled, the court cannot determine what testimony will be material. Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72; Dawson v. Dawson (Cal. App.) 256 P. 491; Pascoe v. Baker, 158 Cal. 232, 110 P. 815; and San Jose Hosp. v. Etherton, (Cal. App.) 258 P. 611, and cases there cited; also Sheffield v. Pickwick Stages, 191 Cal. 9, 214 P. 852. The court therefore properly granted defendant's motion changing the place of trial to Contra Costa county.

When the matter was heard in the superior court of the latter county, that court overruled the demurrer to the complaint, and thereafter defendant duly filed his answer. Plaintiff then gave notice of motion for change of venue back to Madera county, supporting it with affidavit of merits and supplemental affidavit, in opposition to which defendant filed a counter affidavit. Upon the hearing the court made its order granting plaintiff's motion, and it is from that order that defendant is now appealing.

[3] We are not called upon to consider his contention that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, as this issue was determined by the overruling of the demurrer in the court below, and is not before us on this appeal.

[4, 5] The remaining question involves the sufficiency of the averments of plaintiff's affidavits in support of his motion. On this point we have no hesitancy whatsoever in declaring that there is substantial and abundant evidence to uphold the order appealed from, nor will anything be found in the counter affidavits of defendant of sufficient weight to disturb this conclusion. Where there is substantial evidence to support the action of the trial court, an order based upon conflicting affidavits, either in granting or refusing a change of venue, will not be disturbed. Brown v. S. F. Sav. Union, 122 Cal. 648, 55 P. 598; Lakeshore Cattle Co. v. Modoc, etc., Co., 108 Cal. 261, 41 P. 472; McKenzie v. Barling, 101 Cal. 459, 36 P. 8. "In considering the affidavits used upon the said motion this court is bound by the same rule that controls where oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts stated therein must be considered established." McKenzie v. Barling, 101 Cal. 462, 36 P. 8; Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 18, 91 P. 1001; Henderson v. Cohen, 10 Cal. App. 585, 102 P. 826." Sourbis v. Rhoads, 50 Cal. App. 98, 100, 194 P. 521. See, also, Smillie v. Smillie, 24 Cal. App. 420, 424, 141 P. 829.

[6] The affidavits of plaintiff disclose the names of numerous proposed witnesses—all residents of Madera county—whom he avers will testify as to the circumstances alleged in the complaint, as to the value of the land involved, which is also situated in said county, and as to various other relevant matters, which need not be here set forth in detail. It is sufficient to state that the allegations thereof reveal ample support for the action of the court.

[7] It should be remembered that all presumptions upon appeal are in favor of the order of the court as made changing the place of trial. Grant v. Bannister, 145 Cal. 219, 78 P. 653. As said in the case of Miller & Lux v. Kern Co. Land Co., 140 Cal. 132, 136, 73 P. 836, 838:

"Much is necessarily confided to the discretion of the trial court on motions for a change of place of trial on the ground of convenience of witnesses, and it is only where it is clear that there has been an abuse of such discretion that this court will interfere."

Order affirmed.

ZIMMER et al. v. CONGREGATION BETH ISRAEL et al. (S. F. 11986.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1928.

Cemeteries — 18—Refusal to enjoin interference with erection of tombstone violating cemetery regulations held warranted.

Findings of fact based on sufficient evidence that cemetery association, before sale of burial rights to plaintiff, had established regulations concerning size, type and style of tombstones permitted in cemetery, held to support refusal of injunction against interference with erecting tombstone violating such regulations.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Max Zimmer and another against the Congregation Beth Israel and another for an injunction. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Olin L. Berry, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Redman & Alexander and G. C. Ringole, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco in favor of the defendants in an action instituted by the plaintiffs having for its purpose the prevention of the defendants from interfering with the attempted effort and action of the plaintiffs to place a tombstone of a certain type upon and over the grave of one Bertha Zimmer, the deceased wife of the plaintiff Max Zimmer and sister of the plaintiff Joseph B. Kasser, the said grave of said decedent being located in a certain portion of a cemetery known and designated as "Salem Cemetery," located in the county of San Mateo, and maintained and conducted by the defendant Congregation Beth Israel, a religious association, for the burial of persons of the Jewish faith. The decedent, Bertha Zimmer, died on January 20, 1922, in the city of San Francisco. Subsequent to her death her husband purchased from said defendant Congregation Beth Israel the right to bury the body of his deceased wife in said Salem Cemetery and in a portion thereof wherein single graves are sold to persons who do not desire to purchase more than the space for one grave. At the time of said purchase and for some years prior thereto the said defendant Congregation Beth Israel had in operation certain duly adopted rules and by-laws of said association with relation to the size, type, and style of tombstones to be permitted to be erected or placed upon and over graves in the several portions or divisions of said cemetery, depending upon their location, which rules and by-laws had, since their adoption, been uniformly enforced. That by virtue of such rules and by-laws no person was to be permitted to erect a full-length tombstone over any grave in the division of said cemetery known and maintained as a single grave portion or division thereof by said rules and by-laws. Said rules and by-laws were peculiarly applicable to those portions or enlargements of said cemetery which had been opened up for burials since the year 1917, and, while such rules and by-laws could not be given retroactive operation in the other portions of said cemetery wherein burials had been had and tombstones and monuments erected in the earlier history of said place of interment, they were given application uniformly to the portions and divisions of said cemetery which had been opened up for interments and in which purchases of plots for single graves had been made since said date. That the purpose underlying the adoption and uniform enforcement of said rules and by-laws within the above-named portions and divisions of said cemetery was that of facilitating the care and beautification of said cemetery in the interest of all of those who had or should acquire burial plots therein.

The trial court has found upon sufficient evidence: That such rules and by-laws were reasonable and were uniformly applied and enforced within the above-named portions or divisions of said cemetery. The said rules and by-laws further provided that no monuments or other adornments of burial lots were to be constructed or placed thereon without the approval of the cemetery committee of said association, and particularly that no monument or gravestone was to be erected thereon until the inscription thereof had been approved by the rabbi of said congregation. The purchase of the burial plot for the interment of said Bertha Zimmer, deceased, in said cemetery had been made by her said surviving husband long after the date of the adoption of said rules and by-laws and while the same were in full and uniform operation upon and over the portion or division of said cemetery within which such purchase and interment were made. Notwithstanding this, the said plaintiffs, the husband and brother, respectively, of said decedent, after the interment of her remains in said purchased lot, proceeded to contract with a manufacturer of tombstones for the creation and placing upon and over the grave of said decedent of a marble slab 6½ feet long by 3 feet wide, which, when so placed, was to lie horizontally over, and was to entirely cover, the grave of said decedent. That said tombstone, as to its size and the manner of placing the same, was in violation of the aforesaid rules and by-laws of said association and was proposed by said plaintiffs to be so constructed and so placed upon the grave of said decedent without the permission first to be procured from the said association or the governing officials, and without any application either for such permission or for the approval of the inscription to be placed thereon. That, upon learning of the desire and intent of said plaintiffs to place said tombstone upon and over the grave of the decedent, the association, through its said officials, made offers to the plaintiffs to permit them to remove the remains of said decedent to another plot whereon said tombstone might be placed, which, though of higher price, was to be at no additional cost to them, and further offered to pay all of the charges and expenses of such removal, but which offers the plaintiffs refused to accept, but, on the contrary, commenced this action.

The foregoing facts were found by the trial court and were fully supported by the evidence deduced at the trial of this action. That the judgment of the trial court based upon such a state of facts was proper and should be sustained requires little if any argument in its support. The right of associations of this character to make and enforce reasonable rules and regulations and by-laws for the government and beautification of places of interment is conceded by the appellants themselves. That such rules and regulations are sufficiently uniform in their operation when they are given equal application to the added portions of such places of interment which come into use as the years of accumulating interments go by would seem to be supported by the nature of things and to be unopposed by any reasoning or authority to which this court has been referred by the appellants herein. We find no merit in this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRACE CORSET CO. v. BROWN BROS. et al.

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1928.

Judgment ⇨138(1)—Setting aside default judgment held not abuse of discretion in view of attempted adjustment after judgment, and defendants' counsel's and family's sickness (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where application was made for relief under and within the time provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, court's setting aside a judgment and vacating the default held not an abuse of discretion where it was shown that after entry of default judgment the parties had carried on negotiations as to settlement and setting aside default, and for some time after the default was entered, both the defendant's counsel and his family were ill, but counsel, upon release from the hospital, immediately had engaged associate counsel to proceed to have the default judgment set aside.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by the Grace Corset Company against Brown Bros. and others. From an order setting aside a default judgment for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

John W. Marshall, and Ernest K. Little, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel Hone, and Derby, Single & Sharp, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from an order setting aside a default judgment in the sum of $3,235.70. The plaintiff is engaged in business at Kalamazoo, Mich., and the defendants are located at San Francisco. Summons was served on the defendant Joseph Brown on September 11, 1925, and on the defendant Arthur Brown on the 17th day of October following. On the day last named the defendants employed counsel to represent them. Counsel for defendants endeavored to obtain from plaintiff's counsel a stipulation extending time to plead, but without success. On the morning of October 28, 1925, counsel for defendants examined the records of the clerk's office and ascertained that no default had been entered. He thereupon applied to the court for and obtained an order extending the time of the defendants to plead to November 10, 1925. He then proceeded to the clerk's office to file the order and found that the default had been entered. It appeared by the affidavit of counsel for the defendants that counsel for both parties had occupied offices together and had been friends for a long period of time. After the default was entered negotiations were entered upon looking to a mutual agreement to set aside the default, with the suggestion from both sides that the case should be settled out of court. Plaintiff concluded that he would not stipulate to have the default opened up without the consent of his client. Correspondence was had with the plaintiff in Michigan who declined to authorize its counsel to set aside the default. These negotiations continued until after the holidays when illness invaded the family of counsel for the defendants, resulting in the death of his mother and his own hospitalization. Immediately upon coming out of the hospital in March, 1926, and feeling not sufficiently recovered to attend to the matter, he engaged associate counsel to proceed in court to have the default set aside. Application was made for relief under and within the time provided by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Whereupon the judgment was set aside and the default vacated. It also appeared that after the defendant Joseph Brown had been served with summons on September 11, 1925, and before the default was entered, counsel for plaintiff wrote to said defendant requesting certain information concerning the claim sued on. As late as October 15th and before the defendant had employed counsel, plaintiff's counsel wrote to defendant Joseph Brown asking that the matter be adjusted. Other facts shown by the record tending to uphold the ruling of the trial court need not be related. It is enough to say that no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court is shown.

The order is affirmed.

BLACK v. BLACK. (S. F. 11993.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1928.

1. Divorce ⇨245(2), 309—Divorce decrees are subject to modification as to allowances for alimony and children's support where situation of parties is changed.

Allowance, in divorce decree for alimony and support of children, is always subject to modification by chancellor, where changed situation of parties affected requires such modification.

2. Divorce ⇨245(3), 309—Wife, resisting husband's proceedings to have allowance to her and children reduced, had burden to establish agreement for permanent allowance.

When husband sought to have final divorce decree modified by reducing monthly allowance to wife for alimony and support of children, burden was on wife to show agreement that allowance provided for in decree was to be permanent, conceding that parol evidence could be resorted to to show intent in this particular.

3. Appeal and error ⚭1011(1)—Decision by trial court on conflicting evidence is final.

Decision of trial court as to issues on conflicting evidence is conclusive.

4. Divorce ⚭245(2), 309—Reduction of monthly allowance under divorce decree for support of wife and 18 and 20 year old sons, whose combined income exceeded that of husband, from $60 to $30 monthly, held proper.

Where combined income of divorced wife and two sons, aged 18 and 20, was greater than that of husband, and wife, by decree, had been allowed corner lot containing residence, free of incumbrances, order of trial court reducing amount of monthly allowance under divorce decree for wife's alimony and support of children from $60 to $30 per month held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Suit by Lillian Ella Black against Frank Morris Black for divorce. From an order modifying a final decree of divorce by reducing the monthly allowance awarded plaintiff for alimony and support of minor children, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert Choynski, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert E. Fitzgerald, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is taken from an order modifying a final decree of divorce by reducing the monthly allowance of $60 awarded by said decree for the support of plaintiff (appellant) and the minor children of the marriage to $30 per month.

[1-3] Appellant and respondent intermarried October 17, 1901, and two sons and one daughter were the issue of the marriage. On January 24, 1905, respondent's mother, in consideration of the love and affection she bore unto him, and to provide for his better maintenance and support, conveyed to him a lot situate at the northeast corner of Geary street and Eighteenth avenue, city and county of San Francisco, and being 120½ feet on Geary street by 100 feet on Eighteenth avenue. On January 24, 1905, in consideration of love and affection, and for her better support and maintenance, respondent conveyed said lot to his wife, appellant herein. On May 27, 1920, appellant brought an action in divorce against respondent, alleging cruelty. On October 14, 1920, the court rendered its decision in favor of the appellant, granting her a divorce, awarded her the custody of the minor sons, and made an allowance of $60 per month for the support of the wife and said minor sons. This order became final October 17, 1921. Pending the divorce action, an adjustment of property rights was made by the parties. On September 20, 1920, during the pendency of the action, the wife, who was the owner of the legal title of the lot in question, in consideration of love and affection, conveyed to her husband the easterly portion, 80x100 feet, of the lot formerly conveyed by his mother to him, and later conveyed by him to her. The wife retained the corner lot, 40x100 feet, which was occupied by the family residence. The husband's portion of the lot was unimproved. On the same day the husband quitclaimed unto his wife said lot 40x100 feet. A mortgage in the sum of $3,200, which covered the entire lot, was assumed by the husband, and the wife's lot was free of incumbrance, and was valued at about $9,000. She afterwards sold it, and purchased property elsewhere. It was the claim of the wife, appellant, that she and her former husband entered into an oral agreement whereby the allowance of $60 per month for the support of herself and said minors was to be permanent, and it was the agreement of said parties that said monthly allowance of $60 was to be carried into the judgment, and was not subject to modification or change thereafter. The judgment makes no reference to any such stipulation or agreement, and, upon its face, is the usual decree entered in divorce actions. Such decrees are always subject to modification by the chancellor as the changed situation of the parties affected thereby may seem to require a modification or change in the original decree. The burden of showing that an agreement was entered into between the parties to the effect that the decree as entered was to be permanent, and was not subject to modification or change thereafter, granting that parole evidence may be resorted to to show the real intent of the parties as to the effect of the decree in this particular, was upon the wife, and, inasmuch as the evidence was conflicting as to that issue, the decision of the trial court would conclude the question.

[4] We are of the opinion from the record before us, that the trial court rendered a just and equitable decision. Beyond doubt the wife was the holder of the legal title to the property in question, and the husband was the owner of a beneficial interest therein. The fact that the wife, in the settlement of their property rights in contemplation of divorce, deeded to her husband a portion of the lot originally deeded by her husband's mother to him, and then by him to her, is a strong circumstance against her claim that she was the owner absolute of said lot. In the settlement of their property rights the wife was permitted to retain as her own the corner lot, upon which the house stood, free of incumbrances, and the husband took the remaining unimproved portion of said lot, and assumed the $3,200 mortgage which formerly covered the entire lot. At the time the decree was made, the husband, who was a police officer, was receiving a monthly salary of $140. Since the decree was entered, his salary and other emoluments have increased his income to $203 per month. He has since married, and his family consists of himself, his wife, and a step-daughter. At the time this proceeding was before the trial court the two sons, whose custody was given to the mother, were 18 and 20 years, respectively. The younger was a part-time employee of the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco, and was receiving a salary of $75 per month; the elder was an employee of the Standard Oil Company, receiving a salary of $100 per month, and the wife was employed by the Sanborn Map Company at a weekly salary of $16.23. Their combined salaries were greater than the husband's and father's by $36 per month. Adding the $30 allowance, which respondent is required to contribute, makes their income $66 per month in excess of respondent's.

The evidence, considered in the light of the transactions between the parties, fully justified the court in reducing the amount of the monthly allowance from $60 to $30 per month.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. Venue ⇐70—Refusal of change of venue on uncontradicted affidavit alleging defendants were residents of other county held error (Code Civ. Proc. § 395).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, in action to recover reasonable value of legal services, affidavit filed by one defendant, alleging that, at commencement of action, and at all times since, all defendants were residents of county other than that in which action was brought, was sufficient affidavit of nonresidence of defendants other than affiant, and, being uncontradicted, rendered refusal of change of venue, error.

2. Venue ⇐22(1)—On uncontradicted affidavit showing defendants resided in county other than one where personal action was brought, venue should have been changed (Code Civ. Proc. § 395).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, where, in action to recover for legal services, uncontradicted affidavit showed defendants all resided at beginning of suit and at time of trial in county other than one in which suit was brought, venue should have been changed to their county on motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by Ruth Stone against P. L. Everts and others, individually and as copartners, under the name of Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, and another. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

L. W. Young, of Fresno, and Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. [1] This is an appeal by the defendants from an order denying their motion for change of place of trial from the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, to the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Fresno.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants upon an assigned claim of Messrs. Colding & Hale, to recover the reasonable value of legal services alleged to have been rendered, to defendants at their special instance and request. At the time of pleading by way of general demurrer, defendants gave due and proper notice of motion for change of place of trial, and also served and filed an affidavit of merits executed by the defendant Conway, not only on his own behalf, but on behalf, and at the request, of the other defendants; and included in said affidavit the following allegations regarding the residence of the defendants:

"Affiant further states that he was, at the time of the commencement of this action, and now is, a resident of the county of Fresno, state of California, and also that he has a personal acquaintanceship with each of the remaining above-named defendants, and has personal and direct knowledge of the residence of each of the remaining above-named defendants at the time of the commencement of this action, and that, by reason of his acquaintanceship and his personal knowledge, he avers that all of the remaining above-named defendants were at the time of the commencement of this action, and ever since have been, and now are, residents of the county of Fresno, state of California."

The trial court denied the said motion as to all the defendants, except D. F. Conway, and from this order the appeal is taken. Respondent seeks to justify the order upon the sole ground that the affidavit of D. F. Conway as to the residence of the other defendants was insufficient. It is admitted that one defendant may make such an affidavit upon behalf of the others, but the contention is made that the foregoing language is insufficient to allege that the city and county of San Francisco is not the residence of the defendants. From the allegation "that all of the remaining above-named defendants were, at the time of the commencement of this action, and ever since have been, and now are, residents of the county of Fresno, State of California," it must necessarily follow that said defendants are not residents of the city and county of San Francisco. Furthermore, the case of Simpson v. Hosin, 49 Cal. App. 585, 193 P. 867, is authority upon the point that it is not necessary to make a negative showing that a defendant is not a resident of the county where the action is brought. The court in the last cited case said:

"But the Code does not require this negative showing. Section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action must be tried in the county in which the defendant resides at the commencement of the action."

It is also to be observed that no counter affidavits were filed by plaintiff, and the facts alleged in the affidavit of defendant Conway stand uncontradicted in the record.

[2] As the action was a personal one, and the affidavit showed that all the defendants resided in the county of Fresno, their motion for a change of the place of trial to that county should have been granted.

The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant the motion for a change of the place of trial as to all the defendants.

SEATON v. GARCIA & MAGGINI CO.

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1010(1)—Judgment for buyer's breach of apple purchase is affirmed where trial court's finding is supported by evidence.

In seller's action for buyer's breach of contract to purchase apples and to furnish lug boxes for harvesting crop, on appeal from judgment for plaintiff in which fact question only is involved, judgment is affirmed where trial court's findings are supported by evidence.

2. Sales $\hookrightarrow$ 384(1)—On buyer's failure to furnish lug boxes, seller held not required to secure boxes elsewhere to minimize loss.

As respects duty to minimize loss, where buyer of crop of apples breached its contract to furnish necessary lug boxes to harvest the apples, seller was not required to secure boxes elsewhere, but was entitled to rely on buyer's repeated promises to furnish sufficient boxes on seller's repeated demands for boxes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by Elwyn D. Seaton against the Garcia & Maggini Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan and A. W. Hollingsworth, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it for $4,845.98, damages for breach of contract. The plaintiff was the owner of an apple orchard in Sonoma county, Cal., and entered into a contract with the defendant by which the defendant agreed to purchase and the plaintiff to pick and deliver "all the Gravenstein apples, below specified and grown during the current year on his [seller's] ranch." The seller agreed to haul the apples from the plowed ground of the orchard and place them in a convenient place to be loaded on auto trucks and to assist the drivers of said trucks in loading the same. It was also agreed that said apples were to be weighed at the packing house of the buyer at Sebastopol, Cal., and that the buyer would furnish the necessary lug boxes for harvesting the crop. The contract also contained the following provision:

"It is understood that the price paid for these apples is $60 per ton and is for fruit two inches in diameter and larger and is free from worms and any deceased imperfections which would cause same to be unfit for packing and drying."

The complaint alleged that plaintiff had delivered to defendant 303,178 pounds of apples of the kind described in the contract, upon which there was a balance still due of $1,450.74; and as a second cause of action, it was alleged that the defendant had failed and refused during the harvesting season, though repeated demands were made upon it to furnish lug boxes in sufficient quantity to harvest said crop of apples sold by plaintiff to defendant; that by reason of the failure of defendant to furnish a sufficient quantity of lug boxes or any boxes to harvest said crop of apples, many of the apples raised by the plaintiff and by the plaintiff sold under said contract to defendant fell from the trees on the plaintiff's ranch to the ground, and became unfit and unsuited for delivery by plaintiff to the defendant under said contract. It is also alleged that for the purpose of minimizing the damage to the defendant by reason of such failure of defendant to furnish boxes for harvesting of said apples, this plaintiff gathered said apples and sold them at the best price obtainable in the vicinity in which said apples were grown. It is alleged that by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish said boxes, and the consequent necessity of a sale by plaintiff of the fallen apples (83½ tons) at a price of $6 per ton, the plaintiff has been damaged. It is also alleged that by reason of the failure of defendant to furnish the lug boxes in accordance with its contract, plaintiff was unable to harvest and sell for any purpose or any price 120 tons of apples of the kind and character described in the contract, resulting in additional damage to plaintiff in the sum of $7,200. Judgment was prayed for a total of over $13,000.

The findings conform substantially to the allegations of the complaint. The number of apples sold by the plaintiff at $6 per ton to minimize the damage caused by defendant's failure to furnish the lug boxes, was found to be 82½ tons; that there fell to the ground and remained unsold, by reason of defendant's default, 6¾ tons of apples described in said contract, all resulting in a loss to plaintiff of $4,845.98, the amount for which judgment was given.

[1] The appeal is taken entirely upon questions of fact, no errors of law being alleged by appellant. The contentions in the briefs of appellant involve nothing more than an argument upon the evidence and the position taken is entirely without merit. An examination of the transcript and especially of that portion thereof printed in respondent's brief, which sets forth the testimony of several witnesses for the plaintiff, abundantly justifies the findings made by the trial court.

The defendant set up a counterclaim upon the theory that it had overpaid plaintiff for the apples actually received by it, as some of them were not in accordance with the specifications in the contract. Conceding to the appellant that its receipt and payment for the apples would not bar this counterclaim, if the facts supported it, nevertheless, it is perfectly apparent from the entire record and from all the facts and circumstances surrounding this transaction that the trial court was justified in concluding that there was no merit in the claim set forth.

A detailed discussion of the evidence would serve no useful purpose; it has been carefully examined and found to abundantly support the findings, which justify the judgment given.

[2] The contention of appellant that it was the duty of the plaintiff to secure lug boxes elsewhere upon breach by defendant of the provision of the contract relating thereto is without merit under the facts of this case. The record shows that the defendant promised time and again to furnish sufficient boxes; that the plaintiff, from day to day, waited and telephoned and demanded boxes; and that plaintiff's losses occurred gradually while he was waiting, in reliance upon defendant's promises. It is also a fair inference from the testimony appearing in the record that there were no lug boxes to be had in the vicinity during the packing season. Plaintiff was in a helpless situation when defendant breached his contract under the circumstances shown in the record, and he seems to have done what he could to minimize the loss.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Joao Dos Santos Rocha, Jr., a minor, by Joao Dos Santos Rocha, his guardian ad litem, against Willis Garcia, Manuel Garcia, Ella Garcia, and Beverly Bones. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed as to defendants Willis Garcia and Beverly Bones, and reversed as to defendants Manuel and Ella Garcia.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for appellants.

Edward D. Mabson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. [1] Defendants appeal from a judgment entered upon a jury verdict awarding plaintiff $500 as damages for personal injuries received when he was struck by an automobile owned by defendant Beverly Bones and operated by defendant Willis Garcia, a minor 15 years of age at the time of the accident and the son of the defendants Manuel Garcia and Ella Garcia.

Appellants contend that the evidence establishes, as a matter of law, an absence of negligence on the part of appellant Willis Garcia, the driver of the car, and contributory negligence of the respondent, who was 5½ years of age at the time he received the injuries complained of. The appellants Manuel Garcia, Ella Garcia, and Beverly Bones disclaim responsibility for the injuries on grounds which will be stated hereafter.

The accident occurred on the afternoon of April 8, 1924. Appellant Willis Garcia was a student at the Mt. Tamalpais Union High School, and had been participating in a parade being given by the students of the school to advertise a high school circus which the student body was promoting. The automobile was a touring car model, and had been decorated for the occasion. Three other students, two boys and a girl, were in the car with Willis Garcia, the two boys sitting in the front seat with him and the girl sitting in the tonneau. The cars were returning from the parade and were proceeding northerly on Caledonia street, in the town of Sau-salito, in procession, each car following closely behind the preceding vehicle. Willis turned west on Turney street at the corner of Caledonia and Turney streets for the purpose of letting out the high school girl, who lived on Turney street near Caledonia; it being his intention to stop at the corner upon completing the turn. As he was turning, or immediately after he had made the turn, respondent, who, with two small boys, was running across the street, was struck by the automobile driven by appellant Willis Garcia and received the injuries complained of.

The complaint alleged that Willis Garcia was operating the automobile at a high and reckless speed, and that, after turning into Turney street at a high and reckless speed he "carelessly and negligently permitted said automobile to strike said plaintiff." Witnesses for both respondent and appellants united in testifying that the parade line out of which Willis turned at Caledonia and Turney streets was moving at a speed between 10 and 15 miles an hour as it approached Turney street, and Willis and the other occupants of the car stated that he was slowing down from the speed at which he had previously been traveling to stop and let out the high school girl in the car when he struck respondent. Willis testified that he had given the signal for turning and had blown his horn. It would seem, therefore, that a lack of control of the car, due to a high rate of speed, was not the cause of the accident. Willis testified that respondent ran directly into the automobile. The facts and circumstances surrounding the accident, as related by the witnesses who testified upon the trial, would, however, seem to justify the jury in inferring that appellant Willis Garcia was negligent in either failing to keep a proper lookout for the safety of small children who might reasonably be expected to throng the streets upon the occasion described, or that he observed respondent and the other young children and could have avoided hitting respondent had he exercised the care that he should have exercised upon the occasion.

[2] We cannot disturb the implied finding of the jury on this point. Although the only acts of negligence charged in the pleadings were that Willis Garcia was operating the automobile at a high and reckless speed, which was disproved by the evidence, and that he "carelessly and negligently permitted said automobile to strike said plaintiff," it appears that the evidence as to the acts and conduct of appellant Willis Garcia in striking respondent which would be sufficient to sustain a verdict for damages was introduced without objection on the part of appellants. This being so, the decision will not be reversed because based upon other acts of negligence than those specifically alleged in the complaint, even if it be conceded, for the purposes of argument, that evidence of other negligence was not admissible under the allegation that Willis Garcia "carelessly and negligently permitted said automobile to strike said plaintiff."

[3, 4] As to appellants' claim that recovery is barred because the evidence shows, as a matter of law, contributory negligence on the part of respondent in running into the street in the path of the automobile, if we grant, for the purpose of argument, that respondent's conduct did constitute negligence even in one so young, we would nevertheless be required to affirm the decision, for the evidence is susceptible of the inference that appellant Willis Garcia had the "last clear chance" to prevent the accident. Where the verdict of the jury and the judgment based thereon may be sustained on any reasonable theory, it will not be disturbed by an appellate court.

[5] We pass now to a consideration of the responsibility of the appellant Beverly Bones, the owner of the car, and appellants Manuel Garcia and Ella Garcia, parents of appellant Willis Garcia, for injuries resulting from the accident. Assuming, without deciding, that the evidence fails to establish liability on the part of Bones for all injuries caused by the negligence of Willis Garcia on the theory that he committed an act of negligence proximately contributing to the accident in intrusting his automobile to a person whom he knew to be insufficiently experienced, the testimony of said Bones as to the condition of the brakes upon his car is such as to indicate carelessness proximately contributing to the injury in permitting it to be driven by his nephew. Said witness testified that the condition of the brakes on the car was not excellent; that they were a little bit worn; that the car did not respond to the brakes rapidly, but pretty close to the measurement; that they were "good enough" and held and were not worn down bad, but were worn down some.

[6] Appellant Willis Garcia was driving the automobile upon the occasion without the consent or permission of his parents and in violation of their explicit command. Both parents had absolutely forbidden him to drive their car or any other car in the parade on the previous evening, and both had reiterated their command on the following morning when the boy left home for school. There is no showing of any act of negligence on the part of said parents in permitting their son to drive the car upon the occasion or otherwise which would render them liable to respondent, and, unless they are within the statutory provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517, § 62), imposing a liability upon parents in certain cases for the negligent operation of motor vehicles by their children, the award must be annulled as to said parents. Perry v. Simeone, 197 Cal. 132, 239 P. 1056; Arrelano v. Jorgensen, 52 Cal. App. 622, 199 P. 855. The pertinent provisions of the act are to the effect that an operator's license shall not be granted to a minor unless the application therefor is signed by both the father and mother of the applicant if both father and mother are living and have custody of the applicant and that any negligence of a minor "so licensed" in driving a motor vehicle upon a public highway shall be imputed to the person or persons who shall have signed the application of such minor, who shall be jointly and severally liable with such minor for any damage caused by such negligence. Bosse v. Marye (Cal. App.) 250 P. 693. Willis Garcia had made application for an operator's license before the accident occurred, and his parents had signed his application, as required by statute, but the license had not been issued when the accident took place. Willis was therefore violating the law in driving without a license. Although his parents had done all that was required on their part to obtain a license for their son and had indicated their willingness to assume the consequences of his negligent acts by signing his application, it is only for the negligence of a minor "so licensed" that the parents are liable. Appellant Willis Garcia was not "so licensed" or licensed at all, and hence the provisions of the statute imposing a liability upon parents of minor licensed drivers do not apply.

We find no other reversible error in the case. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed as to appellants Willis Garcia and Beverly Bones and reversed as to appellants Manuel and Ella Garcia, parents of Willis Garcia.

DRAPER v. HELLMAN, COMMERCIAL TRUST & SAVINGS BANK.

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1928.

1. Libel and slander $\S$ 10(6)—Telegram to plaintiff's employer, charging him with fraudulently appropriating funds of defendant, held libelous per se.

Telegram sent to plaintiff's employer, charging plaintiff, who was former bank teller for defendant, with having fraudulently appropriated funds of defendant, is libelous per se.

2. Libel and slander $\S$ 54—Truth of defamatory statements is absolute defense in libel action.

In action for libel, truth of defamatory statements is an absolute defense.

3. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 123(7)—Truth of statements in telegram charging plaintiff, while bank teller, with embezzlement, held not established as matter of law under evidence failing to show teller had exclusive opportunity to embezzle.

In action for libel, based on letter and telegram charging plaintiff, who was former bank teller for defendant, with fraudulently appropriating funds of defendant by destroying deposit slips and keeping money, evidence showing that plaintiff did not have exclusive opportunity to embezzle money and destroy records, but that other tellers had access to his cage, and that adjoining teller assisted plaintiff in finishing work on night he quit, did not establish as matter of law truth of defamatory statements.

4. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 140(2)—Jury held judge of plaintiff's credibility in libel action.

In action for libel, jury was judge of plaintiff's credibility.

5. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 930(1)—Jury is deemed to have resolved conflicts in evidence in favor of plaintiff recovering judgment.

Conflict in evidence on material points must be deemed to have been resolved by jury in favor of plaintiff recovering judgment.

6. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 103—Plaintiff's telegrams to defendant, stating address, denying defendant's charges of embezzlement, and threatening suit, held admissible in libel suit.

In action for libel, based on letter and telegram charging plaintiff, who was defendant's former bank teller, with destroying deposit slips and keeping money, telegrams sent by teller to defendant, stating his address, emphatically denying charges, and threatening action unless matter was cleared up with his employer, held admissible.

7. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 44(3)—Bank's communication to other bank charging employee with misappropriating funds while employee of first bank held not privileged unless in response to legitimate inquiry (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3).

False communication from one bank to another to effect that ex-employee of former bank, then in service of latter bank, had unlawfully appropriated funds of ex-employer is not privileged, under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, unless made in response to legitimate inquiry by bank to which communication is made.

8. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 44(3)—Relations between Los Angeles bank and Montreal bank held not such as to render privileged a voluntary false communication charging latter's employee with misappropriating money while employee of former.

In action for libel based on communication by one bank to another, charging ex-employee, then in employ of bank receiving communication, with unlawfully appropriating funds of ex-employer, relation between bank in Los Angeles sending communication to bank in Montreal, Canada, receiving communication, held not such as to render communication privileged though volunteered.

9. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 44(3)—Communication to plaintiff's employer in answer to inquiry is not privileged, where inquiry was provoked by defendant to afford opportunity to make libelous statement made for purpose of inducing repayment of moneys believed embezzled.

Where inquiry of plaintiff's employer was provoked by defendant in order to afford opportunity to make libelous statement and for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to repay money believed to have been embezzled, it is not privileged as made in response to inquiry by person interested.

10. Principal and agent $\hookrightarrow$ 159(1)—Defendant, requesting detective agency to inform plaintiff's employer of plaintiff's misappropriation of funds, could not escape responsibility for libelous telegram sent by agency on ground that it did not authorize same.

In action for libel, defendant, presenting facts to detective agency and requesting it to inform plaintiff's employer as to reason for wishing to locate plaintiff, could not escape liability for telegram sent by detective agency, falsely accusing plaintiff of misappropriating funds, on ground that agency acted as independent contractor in sending telegram, and that telegram was sent without defendant's consent or authorization.

11. Principal and agent $\hookrightarrow$ 159(1)—Principal is liable for agent's libel published within scope of employment, though in excess of authority.

Principal is liable for agent's libelous communication published within scope of employment and in performing service on behalf of principal, even though in commission of unlawful act agent violated principal's express instructions or exceeded his authority.

12. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 25—Libel suit requires proof of publication or communication of defamatory statement.

In action for libel, sufficient publication or communication of defamatory statement must be proved.

13. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 74—Author of defamatory statements, not authorizing or intending publication thereof, is not liable for libel.

In action for libel, author of defamatory statements is not liable for publication thereof, where he neither authorized nor intended publication to be made.

14. Libel and slander $\hookrightarrow$ 74—Bank held responsible for several publications of defamatory matter transmitted through several hands to plaintiff's employer in manner contemplated by it.

Where defendant bank directed detective agency to communicate facts concerning plaintiff's alleged misappropriation of funds to correspondent bank of plaintiff's employer, with intention that such bank should communicate with bank employing plaintiff, and all steps in transfer of information were taken as contemplated by defendant, defendant must be deemed in law responsible for several publications of defamatory matter involved in transmitting information.

15. Evidence ⇨157(1)—Libelous communication received by plaintiff's employer through correspondent bank held not objectionable as not best evidence; publication having occurred both to correspondent and plaintiff's employer.

In action for libel based on letter and telegram accusing plaintiff of misappropriating funds, sent by detective agency at defendant's request to correspondent bank of plaintiff's employer and thence to employer, publication of libel took place when message was exhibited to correspondent bank and also when read by plaintiff's employer, and hence communications received by plaintiff's employer constituted original evidence admissible in evidence, over objection that best evidence was not being offered, and that message received by agent of detective agency for delivery to correspondent bank should have been produced, or absence accounted for.

16. Evidence ⇨189—Where libelous message sent to plaintiff's employer was same as that sent to employer's correspondent bank, it was not necessary to identify member of detective agency delivering communication to correspondent bank.

In action for libel based on telegram sent by detective agency at defendant's request and exhibited to correspondent bank of plaintiff's employer by branch of detective agency, it was not necessary that individual representing himself to be of detective agency, who exhibited communication to correspondent bank, should have been present at trial to be identified by detective agency, where it was sufficiently established that communication sent by detective agency hired by defendant was identical with communications presented to plaintiff's employer.

17. Libel and slander ⇨110(1)—Evidence tending to prove truth of charges made is admissible in libel action.

In action for libel, evidence which tends to establish truth of charges made is admissible.

18. Libel and slander ⇨110(1)—Evidence rebutting proof tending to establish truth of libel is admissible for plaintiff.

In action for libel, defended on ground of truth of defamatory statements, plaintiff may offer proof rebutting evidence tending to establish truth of libel.

19. Libel and slander ⇨103—Evidence that criminal act, which plaintiff suing for libel was charged with committing, was committed by another, is relevant to establish falsity of charge.

In action for libel based on charge that plaintiff committed criminal act, evidence that act has been committed by another is relevant to establish falsity of charge that plaintiff is guilty party, to be governed by appropriate rules of evidence.

20. Libel and slander ⇨110(1)—Evidence of crimes by another similar to that charged in libel is prima facie inadmissible to prove falsity of libel.

Where libel charged plaintiff with commission of crime, evidence of commission of similar crimes by another, in absence of showing of circumstances indicating relevancy of testimony to issue in case, is prima facie inadmissible to prove commission of crime at issue by such other and so to prove falsity of libel.

21. Trial ⇨114—Counsel's remarks in course of propounding leading questions held not evidence, though they may be prejudicial to opposing party.

Remarks of counsel, made in course of propounding leading questions to witnesses, are not evidence, though their effect on minds of jury-men may be prejudicial to opposing party.

22. Libel and slander ⇨101(5)—Burden of establishing defense of truth of defamatory matter is on defendant.

In action for libel, defended on ground of truth of defamatory statements, burden of establishing defense of truth is on defendant.

23. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1)—Allusions by plaintiff's counsel to conviction for embezzlement by teller working with plaintiff were not prejudicial, where evidence as matter of law was insufficient to show truth of charge that plaintiff misappropriated defendant's funds.

In action for libel based on charge that plaintiff, while bank teller, misappropriated defendant's funds, allusions by plaintiff's attorney in questioning witnesses to fact that head night teller had been convicted of embezzling funds belonging to defendant were not prejudicial, where all evidence legally admitted would be insufficient as matter of law to sustain finding that charges were true.

24. Appeal and error ⇨933(1)—Excessive damages are deemed eliminated by trial court's reduction on denying new trial.

In action for libel, all excessive damages not justified by facts legally admitted in evidence must be deemed to have been eliminated from case by reduction made by trial court on denying of appellant's motion for new trial.

25. New trial ⇨162(1)—Trial court, deeming damages excessive, may require remission of portion as condition to denying new trial.

Where trial court deems damages awarded by jury excessive, it has power to require remission of portion of verdict as condition of denying motion for new trial.

26. Appeal and error ⇨901, 1032(1)—Appellant has burden to show commission of reversible error.

Appellant has burden of showing that error has been committed and that error is sufficiently prejudicial to require reversal.

27. Appeal and error ⇨933(1)—Trial court, reducing damages for libel without indicating whether compensatory or exemplary damages were reduced, is presumed to have eliminated exemplary damages, if proof failed to show actual malice necessary therefor.

In action for libel, in which jury awarded plaintiff $15,000 compensatory damages, and $5,000 exemplary damages, and trial court reduced total sum to $10,000 damages, without indicating whether compensatory or exemplary damages were reduced, if there was insufficient proof of actual malice to sustain exemplary damages, it must be presumed that court acted in accordance with law, and eliminated such damages entirely in reducing verdict by amount greater than exemplary damages.

28. Appeal and error ⇨222—Defendant, failing to require court to specify whether it reduced compensatory or exemplary damages in reducing total damages, is deemed to have acquiesced in court's action and lost right to urge objection on appeal.

In action for libel, in which jury awarded both compensatory and exemplary damages, defendant failing to require trial court to specify whether it reduced compensatory or exemplary damages, so that error of court, if committed, in not eliminating exemplary damages for want of proof of actual malice, would have appeared, must be deemed to have acquiesced in court's action, and lost right to urge objection on appeal as ground for reversal.

29. Libel and slander ⇨101(1), 103—Generally good reputation of plaintiff suing for libel is presumed until assailed and cannot be offered except to refute evidence of bad reputation.

In action for libel, it is general rule that plaintiff cannot offer evidence of good reputation except to refute evidence of bad reputation, since good reputation is presumed until assailed by defendant.

30. Libel and slander ⇨103—Where plaintiff suing for libel is injured in business or professional capacity, rule excluding evidence of good reputation except to rebut evidence of bad reputation, does not apply.

Rule that evidence of good reputation of plaintiff suing for libel is not admissible except to refute evidence of bad reputation does not apply where injury alleged was to plaintiff in his business or professional capacity.

31. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Admission of evidence of good reputation in community rather than among bankers, of bank teller suing for libel, if error, would not be sufficiently prejudicial to justify reversal.

In action for libel based on charge that plaintiff, former bank teller, misappropriated defendant's funds, admission of evidence of plaintiff's good reputation in the community rather than among bankers, if error, would not be sufficiently prejudicial to justify reversal.

32. Appeal and error ⇨1032(2)—Clear showing of prejudice must be made to prove that admission of presumed fact of plaintiff's good reputation in libel suit requires reversal.

Where allegations of complaint for libel as to plaintiff's good reputation were denied in answer, and basis for excluding evidence of good reputation was that evidence was superfluous as good reputation is presumed, Supreme Court would require clear showing of prejudice before holding that admission of presumed facts requires reversal.

33. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Admission of evidence of good reputation of plaintiff suing for libel before defendant's attack on plaintiff's reputation held not reversible error.

In action for libel, admission of evidence of plaintiff's good reputation before, rather than after, defendant's attack on plaintiff's reputation, could not have prejudiced defendant to any material extent, and was not reversible error.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action for damages for libel by C. M. Draper against the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation. From a judgment of the District Court of Appeal (256 P. 260) affirming a judgment of the superior court for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment of superior court affirmed, and opinion of District Court of Appeals superseded.

W. I. Gilbert and Raymond L. Haight, both of Los Angeles (Allen W. Ashburn, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by defendant, Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, from a judgment awarding plaintiff $10,000 as damages for the publication by defendant of alleged libelous communications concerning plaintiff. A judgment providing for $15,000 as compensatory damages and $5,000 as exemplary damages was originally entered upon the verdict of the jury, but thereafter defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied upon plaintiff's filing with the court a written consent to the reduction of the total amount of damages from $20,000 to $10,000. The court thereupon entered its order amending the judgment by reducing the amount of damages. The appeal is taken from the judgment as thus reduced.

Appellant conducts a general banking business in the city of Los Angeles, and remains open for the receipt of deposits and the paying out of money until 12 o'clock midnight. Respondent was employed by appellant as a night teller between the dates of April 20, 1921, and October 15, 1921, when he voluntarily left the service of appellant bank, after having given two weeks' notice of his intention to quit and having told the head night teller that he was going to leave a month previously. He had worked for the Bank of Montreal at its branch in Brantford, Canada, in various capacities for more than eight years preceding his employment by appellant, and, according to his own testimony, had left Brantford for Los Angeles in the hope that the change of climate would benefit his health. He remained in Los Angeles for approximately two weeks after leaving the employ of appellant and then returned to Canada, where he was immediately re-employed by the Bank of Montreal. During said two weeks he called at the bank for the purpose of bidding his fellow workers good-bye. He left his Canadian address with certain of them, and he himself wrote to three of them after reaching Canada. He was 25 years of age at the time of his employment by appellant.

During the latter part of October or the early part of November, 1921, two depositors, named J. P. Berry and John Burkhartsmeier, respectively, appeared at appellant's banking house and claimed that they had each made a deposit of $100 in cash on October 15, 1921, the last day on which respondent worked for appellant, which had been received by respondent in the course of his duties as a teller, but for which they had not been given credit on the books of the bank. The depositor Burkhartsmeier had in his possession his bank book, which contained an entry of the deposit alleged to have been made. Said entry bore the imprint of a rubber teller's stamp marked "15," which was the number assigned to respondent, and Burkhartsmeier testified upon the trial that he was positive he made the deposit through respondent, Draper. The depositor Berry exhibited a duplicate deposit tag which respondent admitted upon the trial was in his handwriting and bore his stamp. Each teller was required to file all original deposit slips received by him at the end of the day's business, and the deposit slips for the two deposits in question were not among those filed by respondent or by any other teller on October 15, 1921, or on any other date. Each teller was also required to list the amount of every deposit received by him during the day on his daily teller's sheet. The total amount received by respondent, as noted on his teller's sheet, exactly equals the total found by adding together the amounts indicated on the deposit tags filed by respondent on October 15, 1921, which did not include tags for the deposits made by Burkhartsmeier and Berry, and for the amount indicated on each tag there is a corresponding entry on the teller's sheet, but there are no additional entries on said sheet which might represent additional deposits, such as those made by Berry and Burkhartsmeier. The amount of cash turned over by respondent on October 15, 1921, corresponded with the figures on his teller's sheet, which did not include the deposits of Berry and Burkhartsmeier. The inference is irresistible that the appellant bank did not receive either the $200 delivered to respondent or the tags representing said deposits, and that said deposits were ignored in composing Draper's teller's sheet. Respondent, Draper, upon the trial of the action herein, denied absolutely abstracting any cash whatsoever, destroying deposit tags, or making false entries.

Upon receiving notice of the above-stated facts from Percy W. Wilson, assistant cashier of appellant, Emanuel Cohen, one of its three vice presidents, wrote a letter to the Bank of Montreal, which is the first communication upon which the present action is based. Said letter is as follows:

"Los Angeles, November 16, 1921.

"Manager Staff Department, Head Office, Bank of Montreal, Montreal, Quebec, Canada—Dear Sir: We had in our employ for several months C. M. Draper, who left us on October 31st, and whose references show that he was in the employ of your branch at Brantford, Toronto, for a long time.

"We have information to the effect that he left to return to your city. We are anxious to learn his present whereabouts, and have requested Pinkerton's National Detective Agency to locate him for us. Should he present himself to you we will much appreciate it if you will send us a wire, at our expense, telling us where he can be reached.

"Your attention will oblige,

"Yours very truly,

"Emanuel Cohen, Vice President."

On November 21, 1921, the Bank of Montreal, through its agent, the British American Bank of San Francisco, which it largely controlled through stock ownership, wired to appellant, stating that respondent was then in the employ of the Bank of Montreal, and that he had a good record, and asking to be informed of appellant's reason for requesting the Pinkerton Detective Agency to locate respondent. The Pinkerton Detective Agency in Los Angeles, at the direction of appellant's officers, on November 22, sent to its San Francisco office the telegram, which respondent claims constitutes the second libelous communication. Said telegram, which was in cipher, reads as follows when translated:

"Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank had teller named C. M. Draper, quit there October fifteenth went to Montreal. On last day employment received several deposits, destroyed deposit slips kept money (stop) Hellman's wired Bank of Montreal, Canada, asking if Draper in their employ advising we looking for him and received reply from San Francisco Branch, Bank of Montreal, asking for explanation (stop) You call personally Bank of Montreal immediately explain why inquiry being made regarding Draper secure present address."

An agent of the San Francisco office of the detective agency then exhibited a translation of the telegram to the British American Bank of San Francisco, which the Los Angeles agency had referred to in said telegram as the San Francisco branch of the Bank of Montreal. The employee of the British American Bank to whom the telegram was shown made a copy of it, and the message was then dispatched verbatim to the Bank of Montreal in Canada, which thereupon suspended respondent from its employ. The complaint set forth the publication of a third libelous communication. Respondent made no attempt to prove said libel upon the trial of the action herein, and it will not therefore be considered.

[1-5] The telegram of November 22 clearly charges respondent with having fraudulently appropriated funds of appellant, and is libelous per se. Appellant contends that the truth of all charges made in the libelous communication as to respondent's having abstracted funds of appellant was established upon the trial; that, even if said charges were not proved to be true, it cannot be held liable, for the reason that the communications were privileged; and that, in any event, it cannot be held liable for any injury to respondent's reputation resulting from the publication of the telegram of November 22 received by the San Francisco branch of the detective agency, or copies thereof, because it did not authorize said detective agency to send such a telegram. In an action for libel, proof of the truth of the defamatory statements is an absolute defense. Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 P. 1; Chavez v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 20, 195 P. 666; 16 Cal. Jur., 60. It cannot be held in the instant case, however, that appellant established as a matter of law the truth of the defamatory statements published by it or its agents concerning respondent. It was not shown that respondent, Draper, had the exclusive opportunity to embezzle the $200 and destroy the record of its receipt. Draper testified that there was a small aperture back of the steel grating separating the teller's cages in appellant bank, that the tellers frequently passed materials back and forth between the cages, and that it would be possible for a teller to reach through said opening into the adjoining cage and remove whatever he might find near the opening. He further testified that the tellers usually left the door of their cages unlocked, except when they were at lunch, and that other tellers than the one in charge not infrequently entered the cage. It also appears from Draper's testimony that the teller in the cage adjoining his, who was the head night teller, upon finishing his own work, offered to assist Draper by listing on an adding machine on Draper's teller's sheet the amounts indicated on his deposit tags. For this purpose Draper delivered possession of all deposit tags he had received during the day to said teller. Thus it appears that it would have been possible for some one other than Draper to secure possession of both the money and the deposit tags in question. It was customary, Draper stated, for the tellers to occasionally assist each other in the manner in which said head night teller aided him. Upon quitting at midnight, Draper turned over his cash to said head night teller, who had previously assisted him. The jury was the judge of Draper's credibility, and any conflict in the evidence on material points must be deemed to have been resolved in his favor.

[6] Draper's conduct following the alleged abstraction does not indicate a consciousness of guilt of having committed a crime so likely to be speedily discovered and to be attributed to him. He called at the bank on the day he was leaving, according to his testimony, and told several of the tellers good-bye; he left his address with several and wrote to three upon reaching Canada and returning to the employ of the Bank of Montreal. According to Draper, the manager of the bank in Brantford informed him that he was wanted by the Pinkerton Detective Agency and that he was alleged to have embezzled from appellant. Respondent sought to offer in evidence certain telegrams and a letter sent by him to appellant. There is some confusion in the record as to whether these telegrams were admitted by the court. They are treated by both parties as having been received in evidence, and we will so regard them. We think they were evidence properly admissible, as the subject-matter seems pertinent to the case. The first telegram was sent on November 23, 1921, and in it Draper stated that his address was 245 Malboro street, Brantford, Canada, and that he emphatically denied the charges made. He also requested the bank to wire and write him at once. Receiving no reply, he telegraphed as follows on November 25:

"Unless matter is cleared immediately with Bank of Montreal, will enter action against you."

On November 30 the following message was sent:

"Do you or do you not intend replying to my telegrams, you know the alternative."

On January 3, 1922, he wrote the following letter:

"Brantford, Jan'y 3--22.

"Emanuel Cohen, Esq., Hellman Bank, Los Angeles, California—Dear Sir: In view of the reply you made to the British American Bank, San Francisco, regarding your charges against me, would say, if you will fully clear my name with the general manager, Bank of Montreal, at once, I will withdraw any statements I have made against you and will promise not to proceed with any suit for libel or to take action of any kind. I have suffered six weeks' loss of work as well as damage to my business reputation through your willful, unbusinesslike course in not either pressing or withdrawing your charge. If you still refuse to straighten out this matter, I will take the only course left, coming to Los Angeles and entering action against you. Yours truly, C. M. Draper, "245 Malboro St., Brantford, Ontario, Canada."

Although the bank received said telegrams and letter, it never replied to Draper.

[7-9] Appellant further argues that the alleged libelous communications were privileged, because made "without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested." Section 47, subd. 3, Civ. Code.

Certain false communications, which are not privileged if volunteered, become privileged when made in response to an inquiry from a person having an interest in the subject-matter of the communication. We are of the view that a false communication from one bank to another to the effect that an ex-employee of the former, then in the service of the latter, had unlawfully appropriated funds of his ex-employer is of this class, and is not privileged unless made in response to an inquiry by the bank to which the communication is made. The relations between banks by reason of their geographical proximity and interchange of business may be such that a moral or social duty rests upon the communicant to impart the information, which renders the false and libelous communication privileged although volunteered, but no such relations were shown to exist between the Hellman bank in Los Angeles and the Bank of Montreal in Canada in the instant case. Although the communication made in the telegram of November 22 was made after inquiry by the Bank of Montreal, the inquiry was not initiated by said Bank of Montreal, but was provoked by the Hellman bank by the letter of November 16, 1921. If the purpose of said letter was legitimate, or one which the law will recognize as proper, the fact that the inquiry resulted therefrom and would not otherwise have been made, becomes immaterial and the communication is privileged; otherwise it stands upon the same footing as a volunteered communication and is not privileged. Appellant contends that the letter of November 16 is a mere request for information as to Draper's address. If the Hellman bank did not have Draper's address, it certainly was entitled to ascertain it and to locate him by all reasonable means. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for a bank to frame a letter asking another bank for information as to the location of a former employee, and requesting a reply by wire, which would not cause the recipient of the letter, if the person concerning whom information was sought was then in its employ, to inquire as to the reason for the request, with a view of ascertaining whether it was for any suspected wrongdoing. There was some evidence in the instant case, however, from the testimony of Emanuel Cohen, vice president of appellant, which would warrant the jury in inferring that the bank had knowledge of the address to which Draper proposed to return in Canada at the time the letter of November 16 was written, although said evidence is somewhat equivocal. If appellant was in possession of said address, it must have written the letter with some other motive than the purported one of ascertaining Draper's address. Said witness Cohen, the author of the letter, testified that he wrote it because he thought it would cause Draper to admit that he took the money and to pay it back; that he then believed Draper guilty and was still of that opinion. The letter also brought into the inquiry a nationally known detective agency. The witness Briggs, who was the Los Angeles manager for the Pinkerton Detective Agency, after refreshing his recollection by looking at his records stated that the agency was not employed until November 22. The letter in which Cohen stated that the agency had been requested to locate Draper was written on November 16. From a consideration of this witness' testimony as a whole it is to be inferred that appellant's officers had reason to believe that Draper had planned to return to the employ of the Bank of Montreal, or that said bank would have knowledge of his whereabouts, and that it was intended that Draper, through said bank, should be informed of the communication. We cannot uphold the method pursued by appellant to obtain repayment of the amount it suspected respondent had taken from it. If a letter purporting on its face to be a mere inquiry for an address, but actually written for the purpose outlined above, provokes an inquiry as to why the information is sought, and in reply thereto the author of the original letter makes the false and libelous statements, the communication stands upon the same footing as if it had been volunteered, and is not privileged unless a voluntary communication would have been privileged. We conclude, therefore, that appellant cannot avoid liability on the ground that the communications were privileged.

[10, 11] We are further of the opinion that appellant cannot escape liability for the second communication, the telegram of November 22, on the ground that it was a libel published without its consent or authorization. The witness Cohen testified that he instructed the Pinkerton Detective Agency in Los Angeles to inform the Bank of Montreal as to the reason for wishing to locate Draper. He claimed that he stated the facts as to the disappearance of the money and deposit slips to the representative of the detective agency and told him to communicate such facts to the Bank of Montreal through the San Francisco correspondent of said Bank of Montreal. It does not appear from the testimony of said witness that he directed the detective agency to charge Draper with actually having taken the money. Neither does the contrary directly appear. The principal is liable for the agent's torts committed in the scope of his employment and in performing service on behalf of the principal, even though in the commission of the unlawful act the agent violated the principal's express instructions or exceeded his authority. Appellant cannot avoid liability in the instant case under the claim that the Pinkerton Detective Agency acted as an independent contractor in sending the communication, for whose act it was not legally responsible unless it expressly and unequivocally authorized said agency to charge Draper with fraudulent misappropriation.

[12-15] A sufficient publication or communication of the defamatory statements must be proved in a libel suit, and it is the rule that the author of defamatory statements is not liable for a publication thereof where he neither authorized nor intended such publication to be made. In the instant case, the Hellman bank having directed the detective agency to communicate with the British American Bank in San Francisco, which was the correspondent of the Bank of Montreal, with the intention that said San Francisco bank should in turn communicate with the Bank of Montreal, and all steps in the transfer of the information from appellant to the Bank of Montreal having been taken in precisely the manner contemplated by appellant, appellant must be deemed in law responsible for the several publications of the defamatory matter which the transmission of the information involved. A publication of the libel took place not only when the San Francisco agent of the Pinkerton Detective Agency exhibited the message received from the Los Angeles agency to one Cotter, who was connected with the British American Bank, but also when the message sent by the British American Bank to the Montreal bank was read by the officials of the Montreal bank. Since a publication of the libel took place when officials of the Montreal bank received and read the message, communications received at Montreal constituted original evidence and the court below did not err in admitting said communications in evidence over the objection that the best evidence was not being offered and that the message received at San Francisco by the Pinkerton agency there should have been introduced or its absence accounted for.

[16] Appellant contends that it was not shown by competent evidence that the person exhibiting to Cotter at the British American Bank the message received by the San Francisco detective agency from the Los Angeles agency was a duly authorized agent of the San Francisco branch of the detective agency for whose acts the Los Angeles agency and, in turn, the appellant was liable. No claim is made that the message was in fact exhibited to the British American Bank by a person without authority. We are of the view that it was sufficiently established upon the trial that the telegram sent by Briggs of the Los Angeles agency to the San Francisco branch of the agency was identical in content with the libelous communication published at Montreal. Briggs testified that the message was sent to one P. E. Geaque, manager of the San Francisco branch. Cotter of the British American Bank, to whom was exhibited the message which he copied and sent to Montreal, stated in his deposition, which constitutes part of the record herein, that a man whom he had never met before, and who represented himself to be P. E. Geaque, of the San Francisco Pinkerton Detective Agency, presented himself and exhibited the message. We do not deem it necessary that the individual who appeared before Cotter and represented himself to be P. E. Geaque, of the detective agency, should, under the circumstances of the instant case, have been present at the trial in order to be identified by the Pinkertons as P. E. Geaque, of their agency.

[17-24] Appellant also contends that the case must be reversed because of certain allusions made by one of the attorneys for respondent in the course of his questioning of several witnesses to the fact that the head night teller, who had assisted respondent on the last day of respondent's employment when the money disappeared, had since been tried and convicted of embezzling funds belonging to the Hellman banking house, and was serving a term of imprisonment in San Quentin at the time of the trial. Since proof of the truth of defamatory matter will exonerate the defendant in a libel action, evidence which tends to establish the truth of the charges made is admissible. Conversely, the plaintiff may offer proof which will rebut evidence tending to establish the truth of the libel. Where plaintiff is charged with having committed a criminal act, evidence that the act has been committed by another is relevant to establish the falsity of the charge that plaintiff is the guilty party. 8 Cal. Jur. 49; 1 Wigmore on Evidence, p. 367. However, the introduction of such proof is to be governed by the appropriate rules of evidence. Evidence of the commission of similar crimes, in the absence of a showing of circumstances indicating the relevancy of the testimony proposed to be offered to an issue in the case, is prima facie inadmissible in proof of the commission of the crime at issue, and in any event remarks of counsel made in the course of propounding leading questions to witnesses are not evidence, although their effect upon the minds of the jurymen may, under some circumstances, be prejudicial to the opposing party. But in the instant case the judgment as it now stands cannot be attributed in any extent to said remarks. Even though said remarks had not been made, the evidence establishes as a matter of law the publication of the libel, defendant's responsibility therefor, and a lack of privilege. Further, the burden of establishing the defense of truth rested upon appellant, and all the evidence legally admitted would be insufficient as a matter of law to sustain a finding that the charges were true. It follows that the only respect in which the said remarks of counsel could have influenced the jury to the prejudice of appellant was in the assessment of damages. However, all excessive damages not justified by facts legally admitted in evidence must be deemed to have been eliminated from the case by the reduction made by the trial court upon the denying of appellant's motion for a new trial.

[25-28] Appellant further contends that the court acted without right in reducing the total amount of damages awarded from $20,000 to $10,000. It is well settled in this state, although a contrary rule prevails in some jurisdictions, that it is within the power of the trial court, where it is of the view that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive, to require a remission of a portion of the verdict as a condition to the denying of a motion for a new trial, as was done in the instant case. Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 125 Cal. 141, 57 P. 774; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513; Kinsey v. Wallace, 36 Cal. 462; Riley v. Davis, 57 Cal. App. 477, 207 P. 699; Lynch v. Southern Pacific Co., 24 Cal. App. 108, 140 P. 298. Here the jury awarded compensatory damages in the sum of $15,000 and exemplary damages in the sum of $5,000. The court, upon denying the motion for a new trial, required the reduction of the total sum from $20,000 to $10,000, without specifying whether the exemplary damages should be entirely eliminated and the compensatory damages reduced $5,000, or the compensatory damages reduced $10,000, the exemplary damages remaining $5,000, or whether both compensatory and exemplary damages should be reduced. Appellant argues that the evidence will not sustain an award of exemplary damages in any amount whatsoever, for the reason that there is no proof of malice in fact, as distinguished from legal malice, proof of malice in fact being essential to an award of exemplary damages, and that it cannot be determined from the manner in which the court below made the reduction whether exemplary damages have been entirely eliminated. From these premises it argues that the case must be reversed. Conceding, for the purpose of argument only, that there was no sufficient showing of malice in fact, or actual ill will or animosity on the part of the appellant bank toward Draper personally to sustain an award of exemplary damages, we do not deem it necessary to reverse the case. The burden rests upon the appellant to show that error has been committed and that the error is sufficiently prejudicial to require a reversal. If there was insufficient proof of actual malice to sustain an award of exemplary damages, it must be presumed that the court acted in accordance with law and eliminated such damages entirely when it ordered the jury's verdict reduced in an amount greater than the exemplary damages, rather than that he permitted the award or any portion thereof to stand. Appellant might have objected in the court below to the manner in which the reduction was made, and have required the court to specify the sums in which the two types of damages, compensatory and exemplary, were to be reduced, in which event any error of the court in not eliminating exemplary damages would have been made to appear. It does not appear that such a demand was made upon the trial court. This being the case, appellant must be deemed to have acquiesced in the court's action and to have lost the right to urge this objection upon appeal as a ground for reversal.

[29-33] It is further argued that the court erred in permitting the witnesses David Wright and Mary Wright to testify as to Draper's good reputation. Said witnesses had known Draper in Brantford, Canada, for eight or nine years. Both testified, without going into detail, that his reputation in the community for truth, honesty, and integrity was very good. It is the general rule in actions for libel, that the plaintiff may not offer evidence of his good reputation except in rebuttal of evidence of bad reputation adduced by defendant, for the reason that the good reputation of the plaintiff is presumed until it is assailed by the defendant. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 P. 530. An exception to this rule has been made where the injury alleged is to the plaintiff in his business or professional capacity. We deem it unnecessary to decide whether evidence of Draper's good reputation in the community, rather than among bankers, was admissible under this exception, for the reason that any error in admitting such testimony would not be sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal. The allegations of the complaint as to Draper's good reputation were denied in the answer. Since the basis of excluding the testimony is that it is superfluous, for the reason that good reputation is presumed, we would require a clear showing of prejudice before we would hold that evidence of facts that are presumed requires a reversal. Subsequent to the testimony of the Wrights, appellant offered evidence to impeach Draper's good reputation. The testimony of the Wrights would, in any event, have been admissible in rebuttal of such testimony. Its introduction before, rather than after, appellant had attacked plaintiff's reputation, could not have prejudiced appellant's rights to any material extent.

An examination of the other assignments of error made by appellant, as to the admission of evidence and the giving or refusal of certain instructions, reveals no error sufficiently prejudicial to warrant a reversal.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

TULARE COUNTY v. CITY OF DINUBA
et al. (Civ. 6072.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 22, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 27, 1928.

- 1. Electricity ⇐10—Division between county and city of tax paid by holder of light and power franchise held proper (Broughton Act as amended).

Division between county and city of tax paid by holder of electric light and power franchise for use of highway under Broughton Act (St. 1905, p. 777), as amended, made by awarding city sum equal to tax on same proportion of gross receipts of corporation from consumers in city which total value of all pole lines of company's entire system bore to total investment of company in its entire system, held proper, in view of fact that portion of franchise system serving city could be dealt with as a unit.

- 2. Appeal and error ⇐907(5)—Appellate court might assume that stipulation not in record, but referred to in findings, sustained judgment dividing tax between city and county.

Appellate court might assume that stipulation referred to in trial court's findings contained facts showing legality of judgment dividing tax, paid by holder of electric light and power franchise for use of highway under Broughton Act (St. 1905, p. 777) as amended, between county and city, where stipulation was not in record and trial court's finding adopted correct principles and rules for division.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Consolidated action by the County of Tulare against the City of Dinuba and others to determine share of franchise tolls. From portions of the judgment and decree, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Le Roy McCormick, Dist. Atty., and Frank Lamberson, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Visalia, for appellant.

J. E. Greene, of Dinuba, and W. W. Middlecoff, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. [1] This appeal is from portions of a judgment and decree given in three consolidated actions. The portion of the decree appealed from divides between the county of Tulare and the city of Dinuba, in that county, the county's total share of franchise tolls paid by San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation. The payment is required by the provisions of its franchise obtained under the Broughton Act (Stats. 1905, p. 777, and amendments thereto). The city was incorporated after the franchise had been granted by the county. The Tulare county franchise was granted as a whole at one time, but under the principle declared by this court in San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys. v. County of Alameda, 66 Cal. App. 77, 225 P. 304, the tolls are to be divided between the county and the city. The amount of the payment is annually 2 per cent. of the gross receipts arising from the use, operation, and possession of the franchise. The statute fails to provide how to divide such payments received from a system of franchises extending through several counties and cities. One of these consolidated actions was previously tried and appealed to the Supreme Court, where the judgment of the trial court holding the tolls uncollectible was reversed by an opinion which set out a method of dividing such gross receipts among the several counties and municipalities served under one franchise or one system of franchises granted under the said Broughton Act. The other cases by stipulation abided that appeal, and after the remittitur and some delay all three cases were tried as one action. The question presented upon this appeal is whether the division of such tolls made by the trial court between the county of Tulare and the city of Dinuba is according to law. See County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba, 188 Cal. 664, 206 P. 983.

The appeal is upon the judgment roll, and the method of allocation and division is contained in the findings, particularly in finding No. 13. The method is as follows: First. Arrive at the gross receipts properly attributable to the franchise privilege by: (a) Deducting from the total gross receipts a proportion equal to the proportion of the investment cost of intangibles to the investment cost of properties used in generation and distribution of electricity; (b) from the remainder thus obtained deduct a proportion equal to the proportion which the mileage of transmission and distribution lines on private rights of way bears to the total mileage of such line through the entire system; (c) all transmission and distribution lines existing under franchises obtained otherwise than under the Broughton Act shall be considered as though they were on private rights of way and deducted as under subdivision b above. Second. Having thus obtained the amount of gross receipts attributable to the entire system of public street franchises under the Broughton Act, it is determined that 2 per cent. of said sum shall be paid to the several counties and municipalities in the proportion that the length of such franchise lines on public highways in the said counties and said municipalities bears to the total mileage of such franchise lines on public highways in the entire territory. Third. It is then especially provided that in dividing the amount which thus falls to the county of Tulare as a whole between that county and the city of Dinuba it shall be considered that the receipts upon which the said city of Dinuba will be entitled to 2 per cent. shall be deemed to be the same proportion of the gross receipts of said corporation from consumers in Dinuba which the total value of all pole lines of the company's entire system bears to the total investment of the company in its entire system. Without this special provision, which we have numbered third, the division between the city and the county, under the other provisions of the findings, would have been made in proportion to the length of franchise lines in the city and in the county, respectively—treating the whole county as one inseparable unit of franchise. It is only this exceptional provision which is attacked by appellant herein. By this special provision for the city of Dinuba, it results (the briefs state) that of the amount of tolls to be divided between the city and the county, the city receives more than it would receive if the exception had not been made. Further findings contain two groups of facts which read as if they were inserted as justification for this exception, and these facts will elucidate the meaning of the clause third above. One of these groups of facts found amounts to this: That whereas in the county at large (outside the city) the franchise lines are many and long in proportion to the receipts from consumers, in the city itself the franchise lines are few and short in proportion to the receipts from consumers, the city being less than one square mile in area. For this reason it was evidently concluded that it would be just and equitable that the city should receive a greater share of the tolls than it would receive had the tolls been divided upon the theory that they should be divided in direct relation to the relative length of franchise lines maintained in the two political subdivisions (the city and the county) respectively. In other words, it was evidently concluded that the franchise had greater earning power per mile of franchise line in the city than in the county. In the effort to make for this reason a more just and equitable division of the tolls between the county and city, a rule of proportion or division was sought and found for the purpose. This rule of proportion was taken from a comparison made between (1) the value of all pole lines of the company's entire system and (2) the total investment of the company in its entire system; the fraction being made up of the amount of clause one as the numerator and the amount of clause two as the denominator.

Without consideration of the second group of facts found, this exception in the method of allocation between the city and the county would seem to us to be contrary to the principles laid down by the Supreme Court in the former appeal. For, suppose 50 miles of franchise line ran through a sparsely populated county with no consumers and then served a congested city with, say 5 miles of line and a great number of consumers, it should be all considered as one unit. The toll being a payment for the use of the highway and not a 2 per cent. tax upon receipts, the political subdivision sustaining the burden of the 50-mile franchise line should receive ten times the toll that the political subdivision should receive which sustained the burden of only 5 miles of franchise line upon the theory that it earned ten times as much—not because the payment is according to mileage nor burden, but because it is according to earnings arising from the use of the franchise which is in turn normally in proportion to mileage or burden. Under such conditions the franchise lines in the county are helping to earn the receipts collected from the city consumers. "The reasonable construction of the language used (in the Broughton Act) is that each county or municipality is entitled to its percentage of the gross earnings arising from the use of its highway, in the proportion that the receipts arising from the use of such highways bears to the receipts attributable to all the rights of way of the entire system." County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba, 188 Cal. 664, at page 676, 206 P. 983, 987.

The second group of facts found, however, is to the general effect that the system of franchise lines serving the city of Dinuba is capable of segregation and separation from the system as a whole, from which it results that the city of Dinuba system may feasibly be considered and treated as a separate unit of the franchise rights. This finding sets out that only two trunk lines (each being less than two miles in length) serving electricity to Dinuba use Tulare county roads. They come from a substation located just across the boundary of Fresno county, less than two miles away from Dinuba. Each of these lines, in addition to serving Dinuba, serve consumers outside of the city to the south and west and to the east and south respectively. Dinuba, as a system, enjoys only two miles of county franchise, or at most the aggregate of four miles of county franchise lines, and these lines furthermore are shared with the system enjoyed by consumers outside the city and in the county district. Some of the city franchise lines are used by the company in transmitting electricity through the city to county consumers beyond. The through lines in the city serving the county may thus be an offset for the short county lines serving the city, and this furnishes a reason for the court to leave out of the fraction the investment cost of the short county lines running to the city, if in fact that was done. These conditions give justification for treating the Dinuba part of the franchise system as a separate unit the earnings from which can be segregated—not with absolute accuracy, but reasonably and practically so.

In arriving at the "gross receipts arising from the use, operation and possession" (language of Broughton Act) of what might be called the Dinuba city unit portion of the franchise, the court by applying this special rule of proportion may not have awarded to the city as great a share as it might logically have done by pursuing this unit theory or subunit theory to its logical extremity. The investment costs of the company's property using franchises to supply the city compared with the investment cost of all the company's property used in serving the city as a unit might be a larger fraction than the one applied by the court, to wit, the proportion "which the total value of all pole lines of the company's entire system bears to the total investment of the company in its entire system" (language of the findings). If so, the amount upon which 2 per cent. was awarded to the city was less than the gross receipts arising from the use of all franchises enjoyed in serving the city.

We have said "may" and "might." The appeal is upon the judgment roll. The findings refer to a stipulation of the parties which we conclude from the context was a stipulation of facts. This stipulation is not in this record. Respondent states that we may assume that all lines in Dinuba are franchise lines—that none are private or of a kind for which the 2 per cent. is not payable. The record does not show to the contrary. Consequently, so it is argued, Dinuba is entitled to all the tolls thereon unless the other franchises of the system show affirmatively some equity to part of them. This argument has merit because of the fact that the record here omits that important stipulation of counsel.

There is no dispute and no appeal concerning the amount due from the company to the county as a whole (including Dinuba). The company paid into court the sum of $4,546.94 for the year 1923 and $15,074.34 for the years up to and including the year 1922. The language of the court's findings used in dividing these two sums follows, in part:

"20. That under and by virtue of the terms of said franchise * * * and pursuant to the stipulations of the parties hereto on file herein, there is now due and unpaid * * * for the calendar years 1923 and 1924, the total sum of $4,546.94, computed according to the rules and principles hereinbefore set forth (finding No. 13), and the court finds that in accordance with the stipulation filed herein by said plaintiff, and the defendant city of Dinuba, said sum of $4,546.94 should be allocated as follows:

"The sum of $4,069.51 shall be paid to said plaintiff, and the sum of $477.43 shall be paid to said defendant city of Dinuba."

"19. That in accordance with the stipulation filed herein by the plaintiff, county of Tulare, and the said defendant, city of Dinuba, the court finds that if computed on the basis set forth in finding No. 13 herein, the said sum of $15,074.34 deposited * * * as * * * due * * * up to and including the calendar year 1922, should be allocated as follows:

"The sum of $13,491.53 shall be paid to the county of Tulare, and the sum of $1,582.81 shall be paid to the city of Dinuba. * * *"

[2] The allocation was made, therefore, first, according to finding No. 13, and, second, according to the stipulation. The stipulation not being in the record, and the burden of showing error being upon appellant, we assume in favor of the judgment that it furnished all necessary facts and data to make the judgment legal and just, provided, of course, the principles and rules announced in the findings are just and equitable and in harmony with the decision upon the former appeal. As there said, the mileage rule of division is not exclusive. On page 681 (206 P. 989) the court in that case outlines the method by which a division of the toll payment should be divided among the counties and municipalities. It is there said:

"Each municipal franchise will be entitled to its 2 per cent. of whatever portion of such fund can be shown to arise wholly from the use of the easements under such franchise, and such portion of the remaining fund as the mileage of the given franchise easements bears to the entire mileage of the distributing system contributing to such gross earnings.

"We have adopted this appropriation, to the various rights of way, according to mileage, not necessarily as an exclusive method of distribution of the gross receipts, but as a practicable one where the contribution of the various franchise easements to the gross earnings cannot be otherwise determined. There may be portions of the distributing system where the entire transmission from the producing plant to the consumer is supplied through a given franchise, or is entirely supplied over private easements. Such earnings would inure to such specific franchises or easements. There may be instances where the extent or value of the distributing system over a given right of way may indicate its earning capacity; or where the service of lateral lines may be differentiated from that of main conduits in the value of their use of the easements. In such cases these conditions should be taken into account. But where, as will often happen, contribution to the earnings of the various rights of way is general and indistinguishable, we can see no reason why the proportionate mileage basis should not be used in apportioning the statutory percentage of gross receipts."

The foregoing is predicated upon the idea previously expressed in the opinion at page 677 (206 P. 988) in the following language:

"But since the state is dealing, in this phase of the matter, with the distribution of a fund among its own political subdivisions, any plan may be adopted consistent with substantial justice."

The amount of franchise tolls awarded to the city of Dinuba apparently is not in excess of 2 per cent. of the gross receipts arising from the use of the franchise lines within the boundaries of said city, and the method of determining the amount thereof is in harmony with the opinion in the appealed case.

The judgment is affirmed.

TULARE COUNTY v. CITY OF DINUBA
et al. (Civ. 6054.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 28, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Costs $\S$ 103—Principle that, where party recovers fund for benefit of many, attorney's fees may be awarded from fund, held inapplicable where other party with conflicting interests prosecuted separate action by own counsel.

Principle that, where party sues for benefit of many and recovers a fund for all, equity may award attorney's fees out of entire fund and thus indirectly charge every interested person with attorney's fees, held inapplicable as between attorney claiming fees and county, where county expressly refused to employ attorney claiming fees and prosecuted actions of its own for same purpose and joined action prosecuted by attorney claiming fees only temporarily and was at all times represented by own counsel and had interest which conflicted with interest of attorney and some of attorney's clients.

2. Attorney and client $\S$ 62—One can employ own attorney.

One has right to employ his own attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Consolidated action by the County of Tulare against the City of Dinuba and others. From a portion of the decree denying an application for attorney's fees, W. W. Middlecoff and others appeal. Affirmed.

J. E. Greene, City Att'y., W. W. Middlecoff, of Los Angeles, H. K. Landram, of Merced, M. E. Power, of Visalia, and Mason A. Bailey, Dist. Att'y., of Madera (H. E. Schmidt, of Bakersfield, of counsel), for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leroy McCormick, Dist. Att'y., and Frank Lamberson, Dep. Dist. Att'y., both of Visalia, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an appeal from a portion of the same decree described in County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba et al. (Cal. App.) 263 P. 249. The portion of the decree appealed from is that portion which denies an application of appellant Middlecoff for attorney fees to be paid and withdrawn from the portion of certain franchise tolls payments awarded to the county of Tulare by the decree.

The subject-matter of this part of the decree was transferred by stipulation into these cases from another action in Merced county. The Merced county action had been commenced by several counties and cities for the purpose of collecting their shares of franchise tolls after the procedure had been first definitely outlined in the opinion of the Supreme Court in an appeal of one of these three consolidated actions originally commenced and prosecuted by Tulare county alone. County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba, 188 Cal. 664, 206 P. 983. In the Merced county case, the court awarded attorney fees to appellant Middlecoff, and ordered a portion deducted from the share of franchise tolls distributed to each claimant in that suit. This award of attorney's fees and the amount thereof was there expressly consented to by each one of the claimants, except Tulare county, which, with the city of Dinuba and all the issues affecting them, had been previously dismissed from the Merced county suit and sent back to the Tulare county suits now here on appeal. These Tulare county suits were tried in Fresno county by stipulation. The court below, dealing with the question of attorney's fees as a part of that corner of the litigation which had been carved out and sent to it from the Merced case, denied appellant Middlecoff's motion to charge Tulare county's share with a part of his attorney fees upon the ground that there was no legal warrant for such order.

[1] Appellant argues for the application of the principle that where one party commences an action for the benefit of many and recovers a fund for all, the court in the exercise of its equity powers will award attorney fees out of the fund and thus indirectly charge every interested person with the attorney fees expended by the one party for the benefit of all. This general principle has been recognized in several other jurisdictions and seems to have been taken for granted in Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 108 Cal. 475, 41 P. 328, although it has several times been said that no attorney's fees can thus be allowed in California in cases not provided for by statute. Los Angeles Trust, etc., Bank v. Ward, 197 Cal. 103, 239 P. 847; Sanger v. Ryan, 122 Cal. 52, 54 P. 522; Miller v. Kehoe, 107 Cal. 340, 40 P. 485.

If we concede the general principle contended for by appellant to be recognized in California, nevertheless there are several reasons why it is not applicable in the instant case. Tulare county expressly refused to employ appellant Middlecoff. It was at all times prosecuting actions of its own for the same purpose and joined the Merced county litigation at the last minute (January, 1924), only to be immediately dismissed and removed back to its own actions by stipulation (February, 1924). It was at all times represented by counsel of its own choice; its district attorneys and special attorneys employed and independently paid by it. There was some conflict of interest between Tulare county and some of the clients of Mr. Middlecoff, particularly the city of Dinuba. See County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba et al. (Cal. App.) 263 P. 249. Finally, it is quite doubtful whether the principles of the equitable rule contended for can be applied to any county of the state of California where the Political Code has made a complete scheme providing when and by whom the county shall be represented in its litigation. The scheme includes only the district attorneys, the Attorney General, and special counsel employed in a designated way in certain cases.

[2] One has a right to employ his own attorney, and the equitable rule contended for has never been applied against one appearing by his own attorney. McCormick v. Elsea, 107 Va. 472, 59 S. E. 411; Stuart v. Hoffman & Co., 108 Va. 307, 61 S. E. 757; Dunlop v. McGehee's Ex'r, 139 Va. 643, 124 S. E. 199.

The mere claim or belief on the part of Tulare county that its interests were adverse to some of the clients of appellant Middlecoff or to Mr. Middlecoff himself would be a sufficient reason, if any were required, for the county to employ its own independent counsel.

Appellant has cited no authority where the rule contended for has been applied in face of any one of the numerous objections raised by respondent under the facts of this case and mentioned above.

The judgment is affirmed.

McOMIE v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF VETERANS' HOME OF CALIFORNIA
et al. (Civ. 3040.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 24, 1927.

1. Descent and distribution §91(1)—Heir may sue board of directors of veterans' home to recover deposit of deceased inmate without administration (Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 20; Veterans' Home Act, § 10, as amended by St. 1921, p. 945).

Action against board of directors of veterans' home to recover sum on deposit by deceased inmate may properly be brought directly in name of heir without obtaining letters of administration, since under Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 20, money is not subject to execution, and particularly since section 10 of the Veterans' Home Act (St. 1897, p. 110), as amended by St. 1921, p. 945, specifically provides that such moneys may be paid over without probate of estate of deceased inmate.

2. Judgment §120—Clerk of court cannot enter default judgment in action against board of directors of veterans' home to recover deposit of deceased inmate (Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1).

Action against board of directors of veterans' home to recover deposit of deceased inmate not being within Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, providing only conditions under which clerk of court may enter a default judgment, action of clerk in attempting to enter a default judgment without order or direction of court and without taking of testimony was invalid requiring reversal of judgment.

3. Judgment §117—Default judgment against board of directors of veterans' home under complaint asking for direct money judgment held void (Code Civ. Proc. § 580).

Since under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, clerk of court in entering default judgment could not exceed relief demanded by complaint, judgment in action against board of directors of veterans' home to recover deposit of deceased inmate held void, where prayer of complaint was for direct money judgment against trustees and secretary-treasurer without request for examination by board of plaintiff's claims.

4. Mandamus §80—Board of directors and secretary-treasurer of veterans' home may be compelled by mandate to act on claim for deposit of deceased inmate.

Where board of directors of veterans' home and secretary-treasurer thereof refused to act on claim for deposit of deceased inmate after due and proper proofs had been presented to them under their rules governing presentation of such claims, they may be compelled by writ of mandate to act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Henry McOmie against the Board of Directors of the Veterans' Home of California and another. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal. Reversed with directions.

See, also, 77 Cal. App. 248, 246 P. 155.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Gueren and R. L. Chamberlain, Deputy Attys. Gen., for appellants.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. By complaint filed in the superior court of Napa county on March 9, 1925, the above-named plaintiff alleged that Samuel W. Backus, Hugh M. Burk, B. A. Forsterer, E. L. Hawk, E. B. Hinman, Harry E. Speas, and Walter D. Wagner were the trustees of the Veterans' Home of California, and that C. de Colmesnil was the secretary-treasurer of said home. Plaintiff further alleged that one Henry McOmie, the father of plaintiff, died in Napa county on or about April 28, 1922, being at the time of his death a resident of Napa county and an inmate of said Veterans' Home. That at the time of his death McOmie, the deceased, had on deposit with defendants herein the sum of $794.38. It is further averred that plaintiff herein was the son and only heir of the deceased, and the only person entitled to any share in the estate of said deceased. It is then alleged that said defendants are holding said sum of money "until the same is claimed by any heirs at law of said Henry McOmie, deceased," and, by further allegation, that said plaintiff "demanded of said defendants the payment of all of said moneys to him, * * * but the defendants have refused and still continue to refuse to pay plaintiff said moneys or any part thereof."

The prayer to said complaint is worded as follows:

"Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against said defendants for the sum of $794.38, and interest and costs of suit."

To this complaint there was interposed, in due time, a general demurrer. This demurrer came up for hearing, and thereupon the judge of the trial court ordered inserted in said complaint an allegation that plaintiff had "submitted to defendants proper proof of heirship to Henry McOmie, deceased, and his right to be paid said moneys," and then ordered the demurrer overruled and granted defendants 10 days within which to answer said complaint. Defendants did not answer, and upon the entry of their default the clerk of the said court entered a pretended judgment herein without order or direction of or from the judge of said court, and without the taking of any testimony by the court as to the truth of the allegations of the complaint.

Defendants have appealed from said judgment, and the case is presented in this court upon the judgment roll, duly certified by the clerk of the superior court of Napa county.

Appellants assign three reasons why, as they claim, the said judgment should be reversed. We will state these reasons in the order in which we believe they should be arranged, and not in the order presented by appellants.

First. Appellants assert that such an action as this, even if permitted, must be brought and prosecuted by the personal representative of the deceased.

Second. That in no event could a judgment such as this be entered by the clerk without the order of the judge granting the judgment, and upon testimony being taken by the court as to the allegations of the complaint.

Third. Appellants claim that this action is in substance a direct action against the state of California, and that in its present form it is not one of the character that may be prosecuted against the state.

order, while this judgment cannot be sustained for reasons hereinafter stated, yet we are of the opinion that it is not a valid objection to this form of action that it is brought directly in the name of the heir, and without obtaining letters of administration upon the estate of the deceased. No purpose can be served by administration of the estate of the deceased who leaves only an estate consisting of pension moneys, or moneys turned over to the trustees of this home. This money is not subject to execution. Subdivision 20, § 690, Code Civ. Proc. Creditors can have no interest therein. A similar situation is provided for by section 1454, Code of Civil Procedure, whereby certain heirs are permitted to collect a bank deposit under certain conditions without probate. Section 10 of the Veterans' Home Act (St. 1897, p. 110), as the same was amended by chapter 573 of the Statutes of 1921, specifically provides that the moneys on deposit, such as this, may be paid over "without probate" of the estate of the deceased inmate.

[2] As to the claim of appellants that this judgment is one that can only be rendered by the court after the taking of testimony upon the matters alleged in the complaint, we must agree with that contention. Subdivision 1 of section 585, Code of Civil Procedure, provides the only conditions under which the clerk of the court may enter a default judgment. This action is not of the kind wherein the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, may make entry of judgment. We are therefore of the opinion that the action of the clerk herein, in attempting to enter a judgment, was wholly beyond the statutory power of the clerk, and therefore this judgment must be reversed.

[3] The third objection above enumerated is in our judgment not well taken, except in so far as the form of the action is concerned. The prayer to the complaint herein is one for a direct money judgment against the trustees and the secretary-treasurer, and in response to that prayer the clerk entered a pretended judgment herein. Under section 580, Code of Civil Procedure, the clerk could not exceed the relief demanded by the complaint. The prayer of the complaint does not ask for an examination by the board of the claims of plaintiff. Having no right to bring an action in this form, it must follow that the judgment, in its present form, is void.

[4] We are clearly of the opinion that, if the defendants herein have refused to act as required by law upon due and proper proofs being presented to them under their rules governing the presentation of such claims as the instant one, they may have been compelled by writ of mandate to act and order the claim paid, and their secretary-treasurer may be directed to pay the same, and thus any attempted arbitrary action on the part of this board and their secretary-treasurer could have been subject to control by a proper court.

The judgment herein entered by the clerk is reversed, and the judge of the lower court is hereby directed to permit the plaintiff to amend his present complaint to the end that he may state a cause of action to compel the defendants to allow the claim and to compel said secretary-treasurer to pay the same.

SCHLEIF v. GRIGSBY. (Civ. 6022.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 31, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 27, 1928.

1. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨20(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that executrix was in control of telephone line causing injuries to traveler caught by low wire.

In action against executrix of estate of transferee of telephone line for injuries to one coming in contact with low telephone wire strung across highway, evidence held to sustain finding that testator was owner and in control of telephone line at time of his death, and that such control had been assumed by executrix and those acting under her.

2. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨15(2)—One maintaining telephone line crossing highway is required to exercise ordinary care to maintain line at height sufficient for ordinary travel.

Defendant maintaining telephone line which crossed highway was under duty to exercise ordinary care to maintain line in reasonably safe condition for travel and at height sufficient for ordinary travel such as would pass in locality in which line was constructed.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)—Trial court's determination on question of fact is conclusive.

Determination of trial court on questions of fact is conclusive on appeal.

4. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨20(7)—Negligence in maintaining telephone wire across road at height of less than 10 feet held for jury.

Issue of negligence of owner of telephone line in maintaining wire across road at height of only 9 feet and 9 inches held for jury, in action for injuries by person standing on truck in process of moving load, who was caught and violently thrown by unseen wire.

5. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨15(2)—Person maintaining telephone line is charged with duty of inspecting wires, and his knowledge of existence of defects may be inferred.

Though one maintaining telephone line is entitled to reasonable time to make repairs after obtaining actual or constructive knowledge of defective condition of wire, such person is charged with duty of inspection, and proof of his knowledge is assumed to follow proof of facts from which knowledge would ordinarily be inferred.

6. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨20(7)—Knowledge of low level of wire crossing highway held for jury.

Where person managing telephone line lived in vicinity and was familiar with line and country through which it was constructed, question of her knowledge of defective condition of wire crossing highway in that it was situated less than 10 feet above ground level held question for jury.

7. Appeal and error ⇨989—Appellate court merely determines sufficiency of facts to warrant findings implied in verdict.

Appellate court merely inquires as to whether facts are sufficient to warrant findings implied in verdict.

8. Master and servant ⇨203(1)—Doctrine of assumption of risk applies to master and servant.

Doctrine of assumption of risk has its general application to the relation of master and servant.

9. Negligence ⇨66(1)—Doctrine of assumption of risk merely places higher duty on injured party if he voluntarily enters position of known danger.

Doctrine of assumption of risk, if applicable to cases not involving relationship of employment, does not absolve wrongdoer of all blame or remove requirement of ordinary care, but merely places upon party injured higher duty if he voluntarily enters a position of known danger.

- 10. Negligence ⇨136(27)—Momentary forgetfulness of known danger is not contributory negligence per se, unless circumstances show want of ordinary care.

Momentary forgetfulness of a known danger by person injured does not constitute contributory negligence per se, unless circumstances are sufficient to enable court to determine that forgetfulness showed want of ordinary care.

- 11. Evidence ⇨14—Court judicially knows that small telephone wire is often difficult to locate.

Court can take judicial notice of the fact that a single telephone wire, small in size, is often difficult to locate under favorable conditions.

- 12. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨20(7)—Contributory negligence of one standing on truck caught by telephone wire crossing road held for jury.

Issue of contributory negligence of person caught by low telephone wire across road, wire being obscured from view by trees, while he was standing on truck holding load of household goods, held for jury, notwithstanding person injured had observed wire across road several months before under similar circumstances and had cut or separated it in order to pass, since momentary forgetfulness does not constitute contributory negligence per se.

- 13. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨15(2)—One caught by telephone wire across highway while moving household effects held not trespasser or licensee as to operator of telephone line.

Employee moving away from ranch on truck by which he transported his household effects was neither trespasser nor mere licensee as to one operating low telephone line strung across highway, and who was injured as result of being caught by wire.

- 14. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨20(5)—Owner of telephone line, sued for injuries, had burden to prove line was not in her control.

Owner of telephone line, to avoid liability for injuries resulting from negligence in permitting line to hang low over roadway, had burden to show that she was not in control of line.

- 15. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨20(8)—Instruction requiring proof defendant, owner of telephone line, negligently maintained line held not prejudicial as not requiring that owner be in control.

In action for injuries to one caught by low telephone wire across highway, instruction relative to duties of owner of telephone line held not prejudicial for failure to require that owner must have been in control of line, where instruction provided that defendant was not liable unless she negligently maintained line at time of accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by A. F. Schleif against Harriet Frances Grigsby. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. Churchill, of Santa Rosa, and H. L. Johnston and L. E. Johnston, both of Napa (A. W. Hollingsworth, of Santa Rosa, of counsel), for appellant.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for damages.

The action was tried by the court sitting with a jury, and the judgment followed the verdict returned. Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied.

At the outset a résumé of the facts sufficient to present generally the controversy will be given, and further detail of fact will accompany each point urged. On May 21, 1923, the plaintiff was engaged in moving some furniture and personal effects from a place of previous employment. He had loaded these goods upon a small truck operated by another person. When the truck was in motion plaintiff was standing in the body thereof upon a small trunk and holding in place the small load. While plaintiff was thus riding he came in contact with a telephone wire, which caught him under the chin, throwing his head violently backwards, and causing him to be pitched and thrown from the truck to the ground with some force. These facts seem to be practically admitted.

There are many minor claims of error involved in this appeal, but the disposition of the case centers about two main contentions.

1. Appellant contends there is not sufficient evidence to show that defendant was guilty of any negligence whatsoever, and that she was in no way legally liable.

[1] It appears that at some time previous (1891) a number of people organized a mining corporation known as and called Palisade Mining Company. In the course of its business the company was granted a franchise by the supervisors of Napa county to construct and maintain a telephone line from the property of the company to the town of Calistoga. In the year 1907 by conveyance the company transferred all of its property, including the telephone line, to one R. F. Grigsby, who held the property until the time of his death. He died on January 27, 1923, leaving a will, wherein Harriet Frances Grigsby, defendant herein, was named sole devisee and nominated executrix. Thereafter the said will was admitted to probate and Harriet Frances Grigsby appointed executrix thereof, and at the time of the alleged injury, May 21, 1923, she was the duly appointed, qualified and acting executrix of the last will and testament of R. F. Grigsby, deceased.

It is conceded by appellant that as such executrix the defendant would be personally liable for damages for torts arising out of property under her control. The appellant, however, claims that the telephone line complained of was not at the time of the alleged accident being maintained by or under the control of the defendant as such executrix or otherwise. It is fairly deducible from the record that the telephone line in question was constructed to afford means of communication between the mining property of Palisades Mining Company and the town of Calistoga and other points beyond, through the central station maintained in said town; that at all times the defendant's testator was a large owner or had a direct interest in the conduct of the said mining company, and there was a telephone connection from said line to the Grigsby home. Prior to the death of Grigsby, to wit, in January, 1921, R. F. Grigsby by agreement leased to one L. A. Thomas certain described real estate for a period of five years upon terms and conditions not necessary to detail here. Out of the fact of this unexpired lease arises appellant's claim that at the time of his death her testator had no dominion or control over the telephone line in question, and that after his death the defendant herein, as executrix, acquired no rights other than as subject to the lease in question. The record before us does not support appellant in this contention. The lease does not disclose, nor is there any other evidence to determine, just what property this lease covered. The description of the property demised does not show that it was the intent thereof to lease all of the property of the Palisades Mining Company, and there is not one word therein concerning the telephone line. The lease standing by itself offers no evidence of any change in the ownership or possession of the line, and particularly would this be true from the fact that the lessor Grigsby did reserve certain rights even under the lease, the extent of these rights being immaterial here. Whatever may be said concerning the rights, if any, that the lessee of the other property may have had in the telephone line generally, it is apparent that no use was made or right claimed by the lessee of that portion of the line running to the Grigsby home.

It is shown by the evidence that on May 18, 1923, prior to the alleged accident, defendant caused to be published in a newspaper of general circulation published at Calistoga the following notice:

"Notice.

"Any one found trespassing upon the property of the late R. F. Grigsby will be punished to the full extent of the law. Any information in regard to cutting my telephone wire will be rewarded. [Signed.] Mrs. R. F. Grigsby."

In addition hereto, there was evidence from which a fair inference could be drawn to the effect that defendant executrix and those acting for her had assumed possession and control of the telephone line in question.

Concluding, therefore, that possession and control have been sufficiently brought home to the defendant, we pass then to the duty of the defendant in the premises.

[2] Appellant contends that in the absence of any statutory regulation it is the duty of one who maintains telephone wires to exercise ordinary care in their construction and maintenance in a reasonably safe condition to permit of ordinary travel. We may accept this rule and concede for the purposes hereof, and with respect to the particular line in question, that there is no statutory regulation as to the height at which the telephone line in controversy should be constructed. We wish it understood, however, that the concession is made solely for the purposes hereof and with reference only to this particular telephone line. For the purposes of this appeal we accept appellant's theory that the duty resting on her was to maintain the telephone line at a height sufficient for ordinary travel. Naturally the term "ordinary travel" would relate to the locality in which the line was constructed.

[3, 4] Appellant cites the case of Mayhew v. Yakima Power Co., 72 Wash. 431, 130 P. 485, as authority for this statement:

"A person claiming a wire is too low must show that it is usual and customary for vehicles of equal or greater height to pass under it."

In the case cited all that the court actually determined was that in the particular territory involved derricks 45 feet high were not so generally hauled over the road as to constitute usual and ordinary travel. To adopt appellant's contention here we are called upon to determine that a telephone line 9 feet and 9 inches above the ground is, as a matter of law, sufficiently high to permit of ordinary travel in the locality involved. This we decline to do. The terms "ordinary travel" and "daily travel" are not the same. As may be the fact, in the instant case vehicles or loads 10 feet high may not pass under the wire once a month, yet that would in no way determine that a load 10 feet high was unusual or extraordinary. When we consider that 10 feet is but little over 4 feet higher than the height of an average man, it is difficult to hold that height sufficient in law for all ordinary or usual travel. If we cannot hold as a matter of judicial knowledge that vehicles or loads in excess of 9 feet 9 inches are unusual or extraordinary, then the question becomes one of fact, and the determination of the trial court concludes the query. There is also testimony to the effect that at the point where the telephone line crossed the road the line was hidden by the branches of a tree and by the shade. With these facts in mind we think the jury, had abundant evidence before it from which it might find the defendant negligent.

2. Incidental to this attack upon the verdict the appellant urges that even if it is found that the telephone line in question was negligently maintained, nevertheless there is no evidence of knowledge on the part of defendant.

[5] We do not deem it necessary to review the many authorities cited to the point that one who maintains a telephone wire is entitled to a reasonable time to make repairs after obtaining actual knowledge or constructive notice of a defective condition of the wire. This subject is reviewed in Jones on Telegraph and Telephone Companies (2d Ed.) p. 233 et seq. After citing many authorities, the author concludes the discussion with the statement that in any of these cases the liability is a question of fact to be determined by the jury. This latter statement likewise is supported by much authority. There seem to be no parallel cases in this jurisdiction. But, adopting the doctrine as contended for, we conclude that the rule would be and is that the owner or person in control of a telephone line would be charged, under the duty of maintenance, with the duty of inspection, and that proof of his knowledge would follow proof of facts from which said knowledge would ordinarily be inferred. The authorities cited in the text referred to unqualifiedly support this conclusion.

[6, 7] Coming, then, to the instant case, the question of defendant's knowledge was a question for the jury to determine, and our inquiry goes only to ascertain if there were facts sufficient to warrant an affirmative finding as implied in the verdict. The evidence discloses that defendant prior to the death of her husband had lived many years in the vicinity; that she was familiar with the line and the country through which the same was constructed; that after the death of her husband she was his sole devisee, and likewise executrix of his will; that she had shown some knowledge of the line in general through the advertisement hereinbefore referred to; that a nephew residing with her had made certain repairs on the line preceding the accident. It further appears that the line was in a general condition of dilapidation in various places, and that this condition was observed by her prior to the accident, but, according to her testimony, she gave this no attention because she was of the opinion that the telephone line was out of her possession by reason of the lease referred to hereinbefore. We think this evidence sufficient to support the verdict on this issue.

3. It is next contended by appellant that the evidence shows as a matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence to a degree that precludes any recovery by him. The argument is based upon the following admitted facts: The accident upon which plaintiff's cause of action rests occurred on May 21, 1923. While plaintiff was leaving the ranch of one Mrs. Fowle and removing his goods therefrom, he encountered the telephone wire as related. The plaintiff had moved onto the Fowle ranch in March, 1923, some two or three months prior to the date of the accident. When he went there he moved his furniture in a truck and encountered the same wire, though with less misfortune. On his trip into the premises in March he saw the wire across the roadway and observed that it hung too low to permit his load to pass thereunder, and he cut or separated the wire and left it in that condition and passed through. The evidence further shows that during the few months he remained on the Fowle ranch he had occasion from time to time to note the presence of the wire, and at one time followed the line to the Grigsby home to learn what line it might be.

[8, 9] The appellant bases his contention first upon the doctrine of assumption of risk. This doctrine has its general application to the relation of master and servant, and the authorities cited cover cases wherein this relationship existed. However, conceding that the theory underlying the doctrine of assumption of risk may have application to cases outside of this particular relationship of employment, it goes no farther than the accepted standard of ordinary care under the circumstances. In other words, the doctrine of assumption of risk in other cases does not absolve the wrongdoer of all blame, but places upon the party injured a higher duty if he voluntarily enters a position of known danger. Graff v. United R. R., 178 Cal. 171, 172 P. 603; Kelly v. Santa Barbara R. R., 171 Cal. 419, 153 P. 903, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 67. Therefore we shall dismiss the question of plaintiff's alleged negligence from the standpoint of his knowledge of the conditions as shown as far as that may be important here.

[10] The evidence here shows that when plaintiff was obliged to cut or take down the wire upon entering the premises in March, some two or three months before the accident, the load of furniture which he was transporting on the road was piled to a height greater than the height of the load carried on the date of the alleged injury. While the record is not clear as to the exact height of the wire on the first occasion, yet it seems to be conceded by respondent that the wire was then strung at a height of 10½ feet. The rule of law contended for is as follows: Momentary forgetfulness of a known danger not induced by a sudden and adequate disturbing cause is contributory negligence, qualifying this by the statement that to forget is not negligence unless it shows a want of ordinary care. The qualification is not absolute, but depends upon the facts of the particular case. There is a long line of cases holding that forgetfulness is as a matter of law negligence that will defeat recovery. McGraw v. Friend & Terry Co., 120 Cal. 575, 52 P. 1004; Davis v. Cal. St. R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 135, 38 P. 647; Brett v. S. H. Frank Co., 162 Cal. 735, 124 P. 437; Ergo v. Merced Falls Gas Co., 161 Cal. 334, 119 P. 101, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79; Towne v. Electric Co., 146 Cal. 770, 81 P. 124, 70 L. R. A. 214, 2 Ann. Cas. 905. It is upon this theory that appellant bases her claim of contributory negligence chargeable to respondent. However, as is said in Jacobson v. Oakland Meat Co., 161 Cal. 430, 119 P. 653, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1194, one element in all these cases is the plaintiff's familiarity with the danger he forgot. To arbitrarily adopt as a standard of negligence per se the rule that if one may be charged with a knowledge, past or present, of a danger, he is precluded from recovery for injuries sustained therefrom and let the rule rest there for all cases would be to establish a doctrine dangerous in its application and unsound in principle and one not warranted by the present weight of authority. Courts are unwilling to declare that forgetting a known danger always amounts to negligence. Jacobson v. Oakland Meat Co., 161 Cal. 430, 119 P. 653, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1194, The true rule to be deducted from the cases cited is that the forgetfulness shown must be under circumstances sufficient to enable a court to determine that such lack of memory constituted negligence per se. In all of the cases cited there appear circumstances showing either an employment connected in some way with the dangerous instrumentality, or an intimacy therewith long continued, and further that the danger was of a nature readily apparent and easily discernible to the extent that injury could result only from a forgetfulness. In the case of Davis v. California St. R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 P. 647, which is the strongest case supporting the contention of appellant, the court says:

"Each rests upon its own peculiar circumstances. If the facts are doubtful, as the result of uncertain evidence or conflicting testimony, the question should be submitted to a jury."

In Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., 107 Cal. 126, 40 P. 110, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114, we find this statement:

"To forget is not negligence, unless it shows a want of ordinary care, and it is a question for the jury."

The case of Anderson v. Southern California Edison Co. (Cal. App.) 246 P. 559, is in line with the foregoing, and is a recent authority for the conclusion hereinbefore reached.

[11, 12] In the case at bar the employment of plaintiff was in no way connected with the telephone line in question. The evidence shows that some months before he had occasion to observe that it was strung too low to permit a higher load from passing under; that his work on the Fowle ranch was in proximity to the line; and that from time to time he had observed the line, and had opportunity to observe and did observe that it was in a general condition of disorder. However, he had no contact with the operation or maintenance of the line. He did have knowledge that prior to the accident a nephew of appellant had done some work of repair on the line. Further, and of particular importance is the fact that the line at the place in question was not readily observable. The evidence discloses that at the point where the line crossed the road there were trees of heavy foliage through which the line ran. The shade of the trees and the leaves and branches thereof tended to and did obscure and hide the line from view, practically concealing it. We can readily take judicial knowledge of the fact that a single telephone wire, small in size, is often difficult to locate under favorable conditions. We think the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was one for the jury, and the determination being that no negligence is shown, we hold there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict on that issue.

Appellant complains of the action of the trial court in the giving and refusal of certain instructions.

[13] The court refused to instruct the jury on the question of the duties owed to a mere licensee. Appellant contended that she was entitled to show the relation between plaintiff and his employer. We cannot follow this line of argument. As far as the record discloses, the plaintiff was rightfully enjoying the use of a public road or driveway, and what his rights or duties might have been at the point where his journey commenced, or at the point where it might end, can be of no importance here. Concededly, there was no limitation upon his rights as a traveler upon the highway as far as any contractual or other relationship existed between plaintiff and appellant. In any event, the evidence shows clearly that he had completed his employment at the Fowle ranch and was moving out. Obviously he was neither a trespasser nor a mere licensee even with respect to the premises from which he was departing.

[14, 15] The instructions given of which appellant complains had reference to the duties incumbent upon the owner of a telephone line. Appellant insists that the duties of an owner are enforced only when the owner has control of the operation and maintenance of a line, and that when an instrumentality passes out of the control of a person his responsibility for injuries inflicted by it ceases forthwith. While we might concede that the instruction should have been somewhat qualified, we find that the jury was properly instructed that it must be shown that the line was negligently maintained by appellant at the time of the accident. Appellant was likewise the owner of the line involved, and if responsibility of the owner was to be avoided it was incumbent upon her to set up such facts as would tend to that result. Appellant urges that, under the instruction given, the jury might readily have found that the line was out of her control, and yet found that she was the owner, and applied the rule given as to duties incumbent on the owner irrespective of control.

The instructions as a whole do not warrant such a conclusion. As a whole they sufficiently specify the individual duty resting upon appellant. Analyzing the effect of the claimed error, it might be well argued that if this court placed the duty on the owner rather than the person in control, it would be a favorable instruction as far as the said person in control was concerned and not subject to the complaint offered. On the other hand, if appellant complains that the instruction prejudiced her rights because she was in fact the owner, she nevertheless concedes that had the action been against her as such owner the criticized instruction correctly sets forth the law. In either case, we do not find sufficient error to justify a reversal, and we further find it unnecessary to go to the Constitution for shelter.

Other grounds urged by appellant are as to misconduct of counsel and rejection of testimony. Without detailing these various rulings, or setting out in detail the alleged misconduct, we find upon examination of the record nothing calling for any further action by this court. We are not hurrying over the contentions of appellant on these matters, but these points necessarily are connected up with the main points urged, and while it may be true that in an occasional ruling the trial court would have been warranted in a contrary holding, nevertheless on the whole appellant was in no wise restricted in a full and fair presentation of her case, nor was respondent permitted undue privilege to the prejudice of appellant.

88 Cal. App. 111

MAHANA et al. v. ALEXANDER. (Civ. 3363.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Guaranty ⇨27—Liability of guarantor cannot be extended beyond express terms of contract (Civ. Code, § 2836).

Liability of a guarantor, as is true as to a surety under Civ. Code, § 2836, cannot be extended beyond express terms of his contract.

2. Principal and surety ⇨6—Fundamental distinction between guaranty and surety is that surety's obligation is original, while guarantor's is collateral; "contract of guaranty"; "contract of surety" (Civ. Code, §§ 2787, 2831, 2845).

Fundamental distinction between contract of "guaranty," defined in Civ. Code, § 2787, and that of a "surety," defined in section 2831, is that, while a surety's obligation is original, that of a guarantor is collateral to, and independent of contract, the performance of which he guarantees, and, though surety may demand that creditor first proceed against principal, or pursue any other remedy which would lighten surety's burden under section 2845, guarantor does not have such right.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Guaranty; Suretyship.]

3. Principal and surety ⇨5—"Contract of indemnity" differs from "contract of surety," in that surety contract involves direct promise to perform obligation (Civ. Code, § 2772).

"Contract of indemnity," defined by Civ. Code, § 2772, resembles that of "contract of suretyship," in that both are original obligations, but they differ, in that contract of surety involves direct promise to perform obligation of principal, while contract of indemnity obligates indemnitor only to reimburse indemnitee for loss suffered or to save him harmless from liability; demand being unnecessary in latter obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Indemnity.]

4. Guaranty ⇨1—"Guaranty" is contract for direct payment of debt or money.

A guaranty is a contract for the direct payment of a debt or of money.

5. Principal and surety ⇨1—"Suretyship" is direct promise to perform principal's obligation in case of default.

"Suretyship" is a direct promise to perform obligation of principal in case of default in performance by principal.

6. Principal and surety ⇨5—Contracts by which principal indemnified obligee against loss arising from principal's failure to perform contract and pay materialmen's and laborers' claims held "contracts of suretyship" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183; Civ. Code, § 2831).

Contracts providing that, if principal should indemnify obligee against any loss or damage arising from principal's failure to perform work under contract, and pay materialmen's and laborers' liens, obligation should be void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect, purporting to have been executed in pursuance of Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, held to constitute contracts of suretyship, as defined by Civ. Code, § 2831.

7. Principal and surety ⇨145(1)—Judgment against contractor, sued alone for breach of original contract, is not binding on surety (Code Civ. Proc. § 1912).

Judgment obtained in an action on contract, supported by an agreement of suretyship against the contractor sued alone for a breach of the original contract, is not binding or conclusive on the surety, Code Civ. Proc. § 1912, authorizing binding of principal by judgment against surety, not authorizing binding surety, where principal alone had been sued.

8. Principal and surety ⇨152, 163—Either principal or surety or both may be sued for breach of contract and joint or several, or joint and several, judgment obtained.

On accrual of a right of action on a contract of suretyship which occurs synchronously with breach of original contract, either principal or surety or both may be sued, and a joint or several, or joint and several, judgment secured to enforce liability created by undertaking, obtained.

9. Pleading ⇨364(1)—Trial court, in action against surety, properly struck from complaint matters relative to securing judgment against principal sued alone.

In action against surety to recover under contract of suretyship, trial court properly struck from complaint matters relative to securing judgment against principal, who was sued alone, because of fact that such judgment is not conclusive or binding on surety.

10. Judgment ⇨143(1)—Default judgment may be vacated as obtained through mistake in law on part of moving party or through erroneous advice of attorney.

Judgment by default may be vacated and set aside on ground that such judgment was brought about and entered through a mistake in law on the part of the moving party, or through the erroneous advice given to former by his attorney.

11. Judgment ⇨145(2)—Refusal to set aside order sustaining demurrer to amended complaint and default judgment thereon, without leave to amend, held not error on refusal to plead (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Trial court held not to have abused its discretion in denying motion to set aside and vacate order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, and default judgment entered thereon, made pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and on specific ground that order was taken against plaintiffs through inadvertence and mistake, where plaintiffs' counsel in open court, announced that they did not desire leave to file an amended complaint, and would not do so.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by George T. Mahana and others against Cora B. Alexander. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion to set aside and vacate the order and judgment sustaining the demurrer, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

George W. Seith and Walter W. Little, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred Horowitz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. The court below, on motion of defendant, struck out certain portions of the second amended complaint, and sustained a demurrer to the remaining averments thereof. This is an appeal from the judgment entered upon the order sustaining the demurrer, and from an order, subsequently made, denying the motion of plaintiffs to set aside and vacate the order and the judgment sustaining the demurrer to said complaint, on the ground that said order and said judgment were brought about through "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," on the part of the plaintiffs and their former attorneys of record in said cause. Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

The plaintiffs in their opening brief state the salient allegations of the complaint as follows:

"The second amended complaint alleges, as a first cause of action, that on November 22, 1920, plaintiffs entered into an agreement with the Los Angeles Engineering & Manufacturing Company, a corporation, by the terms of which said company undertook and agreed to manufacture for plaintiffs certain dies, tools, jigs, and electrical flashers, in a first-class, workmanlike manner; that at the same time, and as a part of said agreement, the said company caused to be made, executed, and delivered to plaintiffs the bond, obligation, or agreement of defendant for the sum of $1,700, by which said defendant undertook and agreed to indemnify plaintiffs against any loss, liability, or damage by reason of the failure of said manufacturing company to perform faithfully the work so contracted to be performed, or by reason of the failure of said company to manufacture said flashers in a first-class, workmanlike manner; that said company paid defendant a premium for said undertaking; that plaintiffs accepted said contract with the company, and entered into the same in consideration of said undertaking. The complaint then sets out the breaches of contract upon the part of said manufacturing company, and that, by reason thereof, the plaintiffs instituted an action against said company in the superior court of Los Angeles county for the recovery of damages because of the failure of said company to perform the contract; that plaintiffs notified defendant of said action, and at the trial thereof defendant appeared in said action, and participated in the defense thereof; that thereafter, to wit, on the 1st day of January, 1923, a judgment was duly made, entered, and given in said action, being case No. B. 9474, in favor of plaintiffs and against said company, for the total sum of $18,323.15 damages; that thereafter plaintiffs caused an execution to be issued on said judgment, and the same has been returned wholly unsatisfied, and plaintiffs have not been able to find any property of any kind or nature to satisfy said execution, and that no part of said judgment has been paid; further alleges, on information and belief, that said company, at the time of the rendition of said judgment, and continuously ever since, has been insolvent, that is, has not had, at any time since judgment was rendered, any property, money, or funds of any kind or nature in this state or elsewhere.

"The second cause of action is precisely the same as the first, except that it is upon another bond for a different amount, viz. $6,000. The prayer asks for $7,700 on the two bonds, interest and costs."

The condition of the obligation in each of the undertakings is as follows:

"Now, therefore, the condition of this obligation is such, that if the principal shall indemnify the obligee against any loss or damage directly arising by reason of the failure of the principal to faithfully perform the work contracted to be performed under said contract, and shall pay, or cause to be paid, in full the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in such work, then this obligation shall be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

Each of the undertakings purports to have been executed in pursuance of the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which relates to the enforcement of mechanics' and laborers' liens, and, in fact, the instruments expressly so declare.

The motion to strike, and the order striking from said complaint certain of its averments involved all the allegations relative to the institution of the action by the plaintiffs against the principal and the undertakings, including, therefore, the following averments: That, upon the commencement of said action, the surety on the undertakings was given notice of the institution of the action; that the surety appeared and participated in the trial of said action; that judgment was rendered and entered in favor of plaintiffs against the principal (the manufacturing company); that execution issued on said judgment, and was returned "wholly unsatisfied"; and that "plaintiffs have not been able to find any property of any kind or nature to satisfy said execution, or any part thereof, and that no part of said judgment has been paid."

The plaintiffs contend that, where the principal on a surety bond has failed to perform as required by the contract as to which such bond has been given, it is necessary, as a prerequisite to the right of the party for whose benefit the bond has been given to proceed against the surety to enforce the liability he has assumed, first to prosecute to judgment an action against such principal, and thereby cause to be ascertained and liquidated the damages to which the beneficiary under the undertaking may be entitled; that any judgment thus obtained against the principal then becomes, and is conclusive upon, the surety; hence, so the argument proceeds, the plaintiffs in this case having obtained judgment for damages against the principal (manufacturing company) for a breach of the contract, said judgment has established the liability of the surety (defendant herein), and is necessarily conclusive upon her.

[1, 2] The question whether the surety is conclusively bound by a judgment against the principal alone on an undertaking has occasioned much discussion in the briefs regarding the distinction between the legal status of a guarantor with respect to the obligation he owes to the guarantee and that of a surety to the party for whose benefit the surety undertaking is given. In a general legal aspect there is no ground of distinction between the two classes of undertaking. The ultimate purpose of both is to secure to a party the performance of some act or obligation which another party has agreed to perform. There are, however, certain technical attributes peculiar to each which differentiate them. The Code defines a guaranty to be "a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another" (Civ. Code, § 2787), and a surety to be "one who at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person, or hypothecates property as security therefor." Civ. Code, § 2831. The liability of a guarantor, as is true as to a surety (Civ. Code, § 2836) cannot be extended beyond the express terms of his contract (13 Cal. Jur. § 21, p. 108, and cases cited in the footnotes). And both a guarantor and a surety are alike exonerated and their obligation discharged for the acts by the creditor specified in sections 2819 and 2840 of the Civil Code. But the fundamental distinction between a contract of guaranty and that of a surety, is that, while a surety's obligation is original, that of a guarantor is collateral to and independent of the contract the performance of which he guarantees. Hence, while, as above stated, a guarantor and a surety are "bound for another person," a surety is usually bound with his principal by the same instrument, executed at the same time, and on the same consideration, and a guarantor is not. 13 Cal. Jur. § 5, p. 89. Another distinction between the two kinds of contracts is that, while a surety has the right to demand that the creditor first proceed against the principal, or pursue any other remedy in his power which the surety cannot himself pursue, and which would lighten his (the surety's) burden (Civ. Code, § 2845), a guarantor does not have that right (13 Cal. Jur. § 6, p. 90, and cases cited in the footnotes). A surety, being, with the principal debtor, primarily liable, may, of course, be joined with the latter in an action to recover on the obligation to the performance of the terms of which the surety by his bond pledges himself. While, at common law, a guarantor could not, for obvious reasons, be joined in an action with the principal debtor, under our system he may be so joined, although such a joinder is not necessary. 13 Cal. Jur. § 6, p. 90, and section 33, p. 124.

[3] A contract of indemnity is another contractual relation which falls within the general class to which that of a guarantor and of a surety belong. It is defined by the Code as "a contract by which one engages to save another from a legal consequence of the conduct of one of the parties, or of some other person." Civ. Code, § 2772. A contract of indemnity resembles that of a suretyship, in that both are original obligations. They differ, however, in that a contract of surety involves a direct promise to perform the obligation of the principal in the event that the principal fails to perform as required by his contract, while, on the other hand, a contract of indemnity obligates the indemnitor to reimburse his indemnitee for loss suffered, or to save him harmless from liability, but never directly to perform the obligation indemnified. Moreover, while a demand is necessary in the case of a suretyship to pay or otherwise perform the obligation which the surety has agreed shall be performed before a cause of action accrues against the latter, no such demand is necessary in the case of an indemnity contract. 13 Cal. Jur. § 3, pp. 979-980. "The essential distinction between an indemnity contract and a contract of guaranty or suretyship," says the Supreme Court, in Somers v. U. S. F. & G. Co., 191 Cal. 542, 547, 217 P. 746, 749, quoting from 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 168, "is that the promisor in any indemnity contract undertakes to protect his promisee against loss or damage through a liability on the part of the latter to a third person, while the undertaking of a guarantor or surety is to protect the promisee against loss or damage through the failure of a third person to carry out his obligations to the promisee." * * * Another distinction between the two," proceeds the court in that case, "is that the promise in an indemnity contract is an original and not a collateral undertaking (22 Cyc. 80), while a contract of guaranty is a secondary and not a primary obligation and can exist only where there is some principal or substantive liability to which it is collateral. 'If,' continues the court, quoting from 28 C. J. 887, "there is no primary liability on the part of the third person, either express or implied, that is if there is no debt, default or miscarriage, present or prospective, there is nothing to guarantee, and hence there can be no contract of guaranty." The distinction pointed out in the first of the above excerpts from 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law applies, of course, as well to a suretyship as to a contract of guaranty, but, as in many of the cases, the two terms, "guaranty" and "suretyship," seem to be synonymously or interchangeably used, and it would seem, in some instances, erroneously so. The second of the above excerpts from the same authority, however, appears plainly enough to recognize the distinction between the two obligations, as the word "surety" is excluded therefrom, while the word "guaranty" is alone therein mentioned. In this connection, though, it should be stated that in many of the cases dealing with suretyship contracts the word "guarantee" is obviously used in its colloquial, and not in its technical, sense, as, for illustration, "the surety, by his contract, guarantees," stating the nature of his obligation or what he has agreed to do.

Sufficiently have we now considered the several contracts mentioned to show that, while in some respects there is a correspondence between them, in others there is a vital technical distinction between them, and, therefore, the several different contractual relations must, to ascertain the respective rights of the parties to such contracts, be viewed according to rules peculiarly applicable to the nature of each.

[4, 5] It is perfectly clear that the undertakings involved herein are not contracts of indemnity. And, keeping in mind the distinction between a contract of guaranty and a suretyship as those contractual relationships are defined by our Code, it becomes equally clear that said undertakings are not guaranties. As seen, a guaranty is a contract for the direct payment of a debt or of money (Tyson v. Reinecke, 25 Cal. App. 696, 701, 145 P. 153, opinion by Mr. Justice Richards, now of the Supreme Court), while a suretyship is a direct promise to perform the obligation of the principal in case of default in performance by the principal. It is clear that the undertakings concerned here fall within the description of a contract of suretyship as such contract is thus defined. There is no direct promise to pay a debt or to pay money for any purpose at all. The real and full purport of those contracts, it is plain, is that the surety will see that the primary contract will faithfully be performed by the principal, or, in case he fails to do so, the surety himself will perform it or cause it to be performed, or, in the event that he likewise defaults, he will pay the person for whose benefit the contract of suretyship has been executed and given for such loss as the latter may suffer from the breach of the primary contract, not, of course, to exceed the amount expressed in money to which the surety's liability is limited by his suretyship agreement. In brief, upon a breach of the principal contract, the surety must perform or pay damages to the injured party for the loss or damage he has thus suffered or sustained, while the guarantor's liability is fixed or liquidated by his contract, and is enforceable the moment that the liability under the contract to which his agreement is collateral matures.

that the undertakings involved herein are contracts of suretyship, as the Code defines such agreements, the proposition next to be considered is, as plaintiffs contend, that the judgment obtained by them against the manufacturing company is conclusive upon the security, the defendant herein. In the outset it is well enough to announce that we have been pointed to, or upon our own initiative found, no California case which supports that proposition. The California cases in which the subject has been presented hold contrary to the position of plaintiffs upon that proposition.

In the very early case of Pico v. Webster and the Sureties on His Official Bond as Sheriff of San Joaquin County, 14 Cal. 203, 73 Am. Dec. 647, the precise proposition presented here was submitted and decided. Pico, the plaintiff in that action, had previously brought suit and obtained judgment against Webster for the wrongful levy upon and seizure, under color of process, of certain property which Pico claimed and which it was adjudged belonged to him and not to the defendant in the action in which the levy and seizure was made. In the action against Webster and his sureties, the contention was that the judgment, which had previously been secured against the sheriff alone, was conclusive upon the sureties. The proposition was not sustained. The particular ground of the decision was that the sureties by their undertaking had not bound themselves to the payment of a judgment against the sheriff as such for official misconduct whereby another party has been injured in property or person. The court, among other things, said:

"There can be no doubt, that where a surety undertakes for the principal, that the principal shall do a specific act, to be ascertained in a given way, as that he will pay a judgment, that the judgment is conclusive against the surety; for the obligation is express that the principal will do this thing, and the judgment is conclusive of the fact and extent of the obligation. As the surety in such case stipulates without regard to notice to him of the proceedings to obtain the judgment, his liability is, of course, independent of any such fact. * * * In the case of official bonds, the sureties undertake, in general terms, that the principal will perform his official duties. They do not agree to be absolutely bound by any judgment obtained against" the principal "for official misconduct, nor to pay every such judgment. They are only held for a breach of their own obligations. It is a general principle, that no party can be so held without an opportunity to be heard in defense. This right is not divested by the fact that another party has defended on the cause of action and has been unsuccessful. As the sureties did not stipulate that" he would be absolutely bound "by the judgment against the principal, or permit him to conduct the defense, and be themselves responsible for the result of it, the fact that the principal has unsuccessfully defended, has no effect on their rights. They have a right to contest with the plaintiff the question of their liability; for, to hold that they are concluded from this contestation by the suit against the sheriff, is to hold that they undertook for him that they would be responsible for any judgment against him, which might be rendered by accident, negligence, or error, instead of merely stipulating that they would be responsible for his official conduct."

It was further said in that case:

"Nor is there anything in the point that these defendants had notice. They must have had legal notice, which we have held to be that required by statute, or make voluntary appearance as parties to the record. According to common law rules, a plaintiff cannot bring in parties not sued in an action of trespass by mere notice, when there is no pretense that they were trespassers." (Italics ours.)

Easton v. Boston Investment Co., 51 Cal. App. 246, 250, 196 P. 796, follows the rule as it is stated in Pico v. Webster, and which is also approved in Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 214, 223, 85 Am. Dec. 125. It has been said that an "exception to the rule" is to be found in those cases, for instance, where the sureties are parties to an injunction bond, and "assume such connection with the suit that they are concluded by a judgment in a suit upon the bond," or "where the sureties have become parties to a bond for the redelivery of property, or the release of attached property," or where the sureties are on "a bond of an executor or administrator or guardian," or have "undertaken to perform a decree or judgment," in all of which cases a judgment against the principal alone is binding upon the sureties, unless they can show that it was obtained by fraud or collusion. Easton v. Boston Investment Co., supra; Irwin v. Backus, supra; Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 180; 32 Cyc. 136. The present case does not fall within any of the exceptions mentioned.

[7] The rule above stated accords with the evident view of the Legislature upon the subject of the conclusiveness of judgments obtained in actions against a party upon another connected with contracts in which such judgments are obtained, but not directly connected with the actions in which the judgments have been secured. While there are a number of sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which deal with that subject, there is to be found no provision therein which establishes the rule that a judgment, obtained in an action on a contract supported by an agreement of suretyship against the contractor for a breach of the original contract, is binding or conclusive upon the surety. The sections referred to are 1055 and 1908 to 1912, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The only one of said sections relating to a suretyship is section 1912, which reads:

"Whenever, pursuant to the last four sections, a party is bound by a record, and such party stands in the relation of a surety for another, the latter is also bound from the time that he has notice of the action or proceeding, and an opportunity at the surety's request to join in the defense."

It will at once be perceived that the foregoing section points the way in which the principal on a suretyship contract may be bound by a judgment against the surety, but says nothing about binding the surety, where the principal has alone been sued on the contract for the faithful performance of which the surety has executed and given his bond. This situation as to a surety is, however, to be accounted for by the very nature or intrinsic characteristics of a suretyship undertaking. The surety is bound only by the terms of his contract. As some of the cases put it, he is entitled to stand on the letter of his undertaking. The contract, the faithful performance of which he undertakes, becomes, upon the execution and the giving of his undertaking, a part of the latter, and, if by any act of the creditor the terms of the original contract are altered or modified or changed without his consent, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal "in respect thereto" are in any way impaired or suspended, or his (the surety's) security is lessened by any act of the creditor, he is discharged from the obligations of his undertaking. He is therefore entitled to his day in court, and so contest any attempt to fasten upon him an obligation he did not assume. The present case well illustrates the fallacy of the proposition that a surety on a suretyship bond may be bound by a judgment obtained in an action for a breach of the original contract against the principal alone, where the surety himself is not a party to the record in such action. The surety here did not, by her undertaking, agree to pay or become liable for any judgment which might be obtained against the principal. There is no express provision in the undertaking to that effect, nor does the instrument contain any language which may rationally be so construed as to justify importing into it any such provision or agreement or liability.

[8] As has been stated, and as is obviously true, a contract of suretyship is an original obligation, and the obligation is joint and several, and, upon the accrual of a right of action on the undertaking, which occurs synchronously with the breach of the original contract, the plaintiffs could have sued either the principal or the surety, or both, to enforce the liability created by the undertaking and have obtained a joint or several, or a joint and several, judgment against both, assuming, of course, that there was not available to the defendant a defense which would vitiate or destroy any right under the undertaking which the plaintiffs might originally have been entitled to assert.

pressed that the trial court made no error in striking from the complaint the matters referred to. Special notice, however, should be given the deleted averments. It is to be noted that said complaint does not disclose the nature or character of the notification to the defendant of the commencement and pendency of the action against the manufacturing company—whether it was a mere written notice prepared and given by the plaintiffs upon their own initiative, or a verbal notice likewise given, or the regular process required to be issued and served to bring a party against whom an action has been instituted into the action or his person under and subject to the jurisdiction of the court in a civil action. Indeed, it is not thus shown that the defendant here was such a party defendant or otherwise a party to the record in the action against the original contractor. The portions of the complaint stricken out, after alleging that an action had been commenced by the plaintiffs against the manufacturing company, and further alleging that a judgment was obtained therein against said company, merely stated that the defendant surety was "notified" by the plaintiffs of the commencement of said action, "and at the trial thereof this defendant appeared in said action, and participated in the defense thereof." That averment hardly goes further than to state that an action had been brought against the manufacturing company on the primary contract, that the defendant had in some way been notified of that fact, and that she appeared at the trial and assisted the company in presenting its defense. A mere general statement that a party "participated" in the trial of an action can convey no definite information as to the particular nature or character of such "participation." At any rate, the portions of the complaint stricken out did not show that the defendant was a party to the record in the action against the manufacturing company. And it is worthy of remark that, if, in fact, she was a party to the record in that action, the complaint fails to divulge what disposition the trial court made of her case—whether it was summarily dismissed or upon a trial on the merits judgment rendered and entered for or against her. We will not review the cases relied upon by the plaintiffs upon the proposition that it is requisite to proceed against the principal before action may be taken against the surety on a suretyship bond to establish the extent of the loss and the precise liability of the latter. In some of the cases language is used which, upon first blush, or without a somewhat critical examination of the facts, may seem to lend support to the proposition. But it is not thought that there was an intention in any of those cases to lay down the rule which counsel seek to invoke and apply herein. In fact, as pointed out above, and as we think is obviously true, such a rule would be wholly inconsistent with the nature of the obligation involved in a contract of suretyship or with its intrinsic legal attributes. It is true, as before declared, that a cause of action accrues against the sureties the instant that the original contract is breached, but this cannot mean that the surety is to be deprived of his right to contest the enforcement of his liability upon any legal ground which he is entitled to invoke. If so, then the rule that he may stand upon the precise terms of his undertaking, and that his liability cannot be extended beyond the exact terms thereof, would, in many cases, be practically meaningless. See, in addition to the authorities above cited, 23 Cal. Juris. p. 1062.

The order sustaining the demurrer to the second amended complaint was proper. The averments remaining after the order striking out was made stated no cause of action against the defendant.

We now reach the question whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion of plaintiffs to set aside and vacate the order sustaining the demurrer to the second amended complaint without leave to amend and the judgment thereupon entered.

The judgment, after stating that the portions of the complaint referred to above were stricken from both counts, and that the demurrer to the remaining portions of that pleading was sustained, recites:

"Counsel for plaintiffs thereupon and in open court announced that plaintiffs did not desire leave to file an amended complaint, and would not file an amended complaint, whereupon the court sustained defendant's general demurrer to said second amended complaint without leave to amend, and ordered that judgment for defendant be given by reason thereof."

The motion was made in pursuance of the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and upon the specific ground that the order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend was "taken against" the plaintiffs "through his inadvertence and mistake." The motion was supported by "the papers and files in this action" and an affidavit of merits by one of the plaintiffs. The salient averments of the affidavit are:

"That, at the time said court sustained the demurrer to plaintiffs' second amended complaint, the former counsel for plaintiffs announced in open court that plaintiffs did not desire to file an amended complaint, whereupon the court, as affiant is informed and believes, solely by reason of said announcement, sustained said demurrer to said second amended complaint without leave to amend, and ordered that judgment be entered for defendant. That, as affiant is informed and believes, his said former counsel were of the opinion that but one ground to recover was available to plaintiffs in the above-entitled action, viz. that the action on the bond was based solely upon a contract of indemnity for liability, and that said counsel were of the opinion that, under the ruling of the court in striking out certain portions of said second amended complaint, and sustaining a general demurrer to the balance of said complaint, the plaintiffs would be unable to amend their complaint so as to state a cause of action in any other way and protect their interests, and said counsel therefore stated to the court that they did not wish to amend said complaint. That the refusal to file an amended complaint was made through the mistake and inadvertence of said former counsel, and without the knowledge of said plaintiffs or any of them."

The affidavit further states that "plaintiffs are advised by their present counsel of record that they have a good and meritorious cause of action against said defendant, and that said complaint can be amended to contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against said defendant, which will more fully appear in the proposed third amended complaint, which is hereto attached, and which is filed herewith."

The proposed third amended complaint seems to state a good cause of action against the defendant. The respondent, however, as one of the grounds upon which they resist a reversal of the order now under consideration, contends that the bond or undertaking is void for the following reasons: That it purports to be the bond authorized by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to mechanics' liens; that said section does not have reference to or contemplate contracts of the nature of the one in question here, albeit the parties believed that it did, and therefore so phrased the undertaking as to bring under its protection mechanics and laborers performing labor upon and materialmen furnishing materials for use and used in the manufacture of the articles. But it is not necessary to investigate that question here. Conceding that the undertaking is valid as a common-law bond (and we do not intend to intimate that it is not, or that it falls within the ruling in Miles v. Baley, 170 Cal. 151, 149 P. 45), the real question which is presented to us on the appeal from the order denying the motion to vacate the judgment is whether, in denying that motion, the trial court transcended the bounds of a sound judicial discretion.

[10] It has with no infrequency been decided that a judgment by default may be vacated and set aside on the ground that such judgment was brought about and entered through a mistake in law on the part of the moving party or through the erroneous advice given to the former by his attorney. See 14 Cal. Jur. § 99, p. 1044, and cases named in the footnotes. Of course, in such cases whether the court has abused its discretion in making the order is a question which must be determined by the light of the circumstances peculiar to each case. Among the cases which it is claimed present a situation analogous to the instant case, as to the matter of the facts, and in which relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure was applied for on the ground of mistake of law on the part of the party seeking such relief or his attorney, are the following: Douglass v. Todd, 96 Cal. 655, 31 P. 623, 31 Am. St. Rep. 247; O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 P. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105; Waite v. S. P. Co., 192 Cal. 467, 221 P. 204. The cases of Douglass v. Todd and O'Brien v. Leach were appeals from orders granting motions to set aside the defaults and vacating the judgments. In the first named of those cases the specific ground upon which the default and the judgment were vacated was that the defendant, upon being served with summons, consulted an attorney at law, and stated his case to said attorney, who erroneously advised him that he (defendant) had no defense, and, believing and relying upon said advice, he filed no answer to the complaint. In the last-named case the defendant, residing in Alameda county, was served with summons in the city and county of San Francisco. He consulted and retained an attorney to represent him in the case without informing him as to the county in which the service was made, there being nothing on or in the papers which he delivered to the attorney indicating the place of service. "From the circumstances under which he received the papers, the attorney naturally supposed that the service was made at the place of residence of the defendant, and therefore, that thirty days would be allowed in which to appear. It was an inadvertence [continued the court] which might occur, even to a reasonably careful man. It was discovered on the day on which the default was taken, and measures to obtain an extension of time, and to vacate the default, were promptly taken and diligently prosecuted." The court also made the following significant observations:

"In matters of this sort the proper decision of the case rests almost entirely in the discretion of the court below, and this court will rarely interfere, and never unless it clearly appears that there has been a plain abuse of discretion. This court will usually sustain the action of the court below upon the same facts, whether that decision is for or against the motion; but it is much more disposed to affirm an order when the result is to compel a trial upon the merits than it is when the judgment by default is allowed to stand, and it appears that a substantial defense could be made. This will explain what would otherwise seem to be a conflict in the decisions." (Italics ours.)

In Waite v. S. P. Co. the action was for damages for the loss of a quantity of goods delivered to defendant, a common carrier in interstate commerce, to be transported from Portland, Or., to Los Angeles, Cal. The complaint was filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county on January 19, 1921. On January 31, 1921, defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint, and at the same time filed a petition for the removal of the cause to the United States District Court, on the ground that the action was founded upon a federal law. On February 15, 1921, the demurrer was overruled, and the petition for removal denied, the defendant being given ten days within which to file an answer. On the 2d of March, 1921, the defendant filed in the federal court a transcript of the record and a petition for removal of the cause to said court, and, while the cause was still pending in that court, the petition for removal not then being disposed of, and no answer to the complaint being filed in the state court, the plaintiffs, on March 26, 1921, caused a default to be entered against the defendant for failure to file such answer, and judgment was entered thereon on April 14, 1921. The defendant, in the meantime, filed its answer in the federal court, and on April 11, 1921, the plaintiffs filed a motion to remand the cause to the state court. Said motion was submitted for decision on April 18, 1921, and was granted on August 6, 1921. On September 12, 1921, the defendant filed in the state court a notice of motion to set aside and vacate the judgment taken by default; said motion being denied on September 19, 1921. Defendant appealed from the order denying said motion, and the same was reversed. The court, among other things, said:

"It must be conceded that while the determination by both the federal and state courts was in favor of the jurisdiction of the latter, the defendant was not without plausible grounds for its contention, and the fact that the United States District Court retained the case under advisement for many months would seem to be sufficient indication that the question of law involved was in doubt and was one upon which an attorney might very well be mistaken. In any event, if it be conceded that the defendant's mistake of law was a reasonable one under the facts set forth in the complaint, we believe that its neglect to file an answer because of such belief is at least excusable."

It is clear that the mistake of law for which the defendant was excused in that case occurred under circumstances which strongly called for the relief asked for. There was plausible ground for an honest belief on the part of the defendant that the appropriate forum in which to try the cause was the federal court, for the reason that the action grew out of interstate carriage of freight, which is regulated by rules established by Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is therefore quite apparent that, acting under that belief, the defendant seriously felt that it was safe in awaiting the decision of the federal court upon the motion of plaintiff to remand the cause to the state court before filing an answer, which, however, it did do in the federal court while the motion to remand was still pending.

[11] The case before us is entirely different in the facts and circumstances from those just considered. In the first place, it may be repeated that two of those cases involved appeals from orders granting motions to set aside defaults, in one of which (O'Brien v. Leach) the court, as seen, declared: "This court will usually sustain the action of the court below upon the same facts, whether that decision is for or against the motion," and that the inclination of appellate courts to affirm rather than reverse an order granting such relief, where it is made to appear that a substantial defense could be made, "will explain what would otherwise seem to be a conflict in the decisions." In the second place, it is to be observed that relief upon the ground of a mistake of law on the part of the moving party will be granted in cases only of peculiar or exceptional circumstances—cases of which Waite v. S. P. Co., supra, may be said to be typical. In the instant case, the whole groundwork of the proceeding and motion to set aside the default was that the attorney originally representing the plaintiffs was incapable of drafting a complaint which would state a cause of action against the defendant because of his alleged inability to grasp and understand the real nature of the obligation assumed by defendant by virtue of her undertaking. That attorney, after a demurrer to the complaint originally filed was sustained, was given by the court, on two different occasions, leave to try his hand at preparing a complaint that might state a cause of action against the defendant, but failed in both those attempts, the last time (the second amended complaint) counsel stating that plaintiffs did not desire to file a third amended complaint, and that they would not do so. It was proper for the trial court to assume from the statement of the attorney that the plaintiffs, speaking through the former, had concluded to abandon any attempt further to proceed against the defendant on her undertaking. The plaintiffs, although, as may be assumed, laymen, and unfamiliar with the rules of pleading, or without a correct understanding of the legal nature of various contractual obligations which may be created or arise between men in the usual course of business, yet were, presumably, of sufficient intelligence to perceive, after the original and the first amended complaint had yielded to the force of a demurrer, that their attorney, having failed in two attempts to prepare a sufficient complaint, was incapable, if such was the fact, of drafting a complaint that would stand against a demurrer or other assault which appropriately, in a technical sense, might be made against it, and, so perceiving, should then have retained another lawyer to prepare the second amended complaint not subject to the objection that it was bad for want of sufficient facts. But, regardless of these considerations, we think the trial court was more than liberal in the exercise of its discretion favorably to the plaintiffs, to the end that they might in a proper way get into court with their grievance against defendant. Besides, there must be a line drawn somewhere in matters of this kind, so that what would often amount, even in meritorious cases, to mere trifling with the courts, may be prevented. If a litigant may in any case at any time escape the consequences of his attorney's ignorance of the law of his case, there would be no end to the trouble and inconvenience to which the trial courts would be put in such instances. We cannot doubt, however, that, under the circumstances existent here, the trial court was not guilty of an abuse of discretion in denying the application of plaintiffs to set aside the default judgment entered herein. The case here clearly comes within the case of Porter v. Anderson, 14 Cal. App. 716, 113 P. 345. In that case, as here, the plaintiff's attorney failed to state a cause of action for the relief sought. The opinion states fully the circumstances under which the question arose in that case. They need not be repeated here; but what is said therein as follows is forcefully pertinent to the situation in the case at bar:

"He merely had an erroneous view of the requisites of a sufficient complaint in this kind of action, and the last ruling of the court upon that question was a disappointment rather than the 'surprise' contemplated by said section. [Citing many cases.] Lawyers are constantly receiving the 'surprises' that counsel complain of here. As well could it be maintained that every ruling of the court upon a question of evidence during the progress of a trial, contrary to counsel's notion of the law of evidence, and which admitted testimony that they had not prepared themselves to meet or overcome, would constitute the 'surprise', which, under section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, may be made the basis of a motion for a new trial. * * * The 'surprise' from the effect of which it is within the power of the courts, under our Code sections, upon a satisfactory showing, to relieve a party, is defined to be 'some condition or situation in which a party to a cause is unexpectedly placed, to his injury, without any default or negligence of his own [citing many cases], which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against.' "

It is well to state that a petition to the Supreme Court for a hearing of Porter v. Anderson was denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

MORRICE v. FITCH et al. (Civ. 3318.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 24, 1927.

1. Trial $\S$ 397(5)—Court's failure to find on issue of limitations held not error, where no indebtedness was found.

In suit to recover for services rendered and money advanced at the special instance and request of defendants, in which court found that there was no indebtedness, failure of court to find on issue of statute of limitations pleaded held not error.

2. Trial $\S$ 397(5)—Finding as to nonjoinder of personal representative of husband, in suit against spouses, was rendered unnecessary by finding that plaintiff had no claim against wife.

Where, in suit against husband and wife, plaintiff failed to join husband's personal representative after husband's death, finding that plaintiff had no claim against widow rendered unnecessary finding as to nonjoinder of representative.

3. Husband and wife $\S$ 232(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that services rendered and moneys advanced husband conducting hotel business, subsequently opening bank account in wife's name, constituted sole liability of husband.

In action against widow for services rendered and amounts advanced to her husband in husband's conduct of hotel, account being subsequently opened with bank in wife's name, evidence held to sustain finding that husband alone was debtor and that wife was not liable, especially in view of plaintiff's entries made solely against husband.

4. Evidence $\S$ 69—Heading of account of person furnishing money and services is presumed to show whom he considered debtors (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 20).

Heading of account of person rendering services and advancing money to hotel keeper, indicating persons to be charged, is presumed to show whom plaintiff considered at the time to be the debtors, under presumption of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 20, that the ordinary course of business has been followed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by George Morrice against C. S. Fitch and M. Q. Fitch. Judgment for defendant M. Q. Fitch, after the death of defendant C. S. Fitch, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for appellant.

Edwin L. Forster, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought suit in Tuolumne county against C. S. Fitch for $1,289 upon an alleged account due plaintiff from defendants, for services rendered and money advanced at the special instance and request of defendants. This complaint was filed July 26, 1920. A demurrer by both defendants was filed July 26, 1923. Defendant M. Q. Fitch answered on June 11, 1926. Said answer denies all the allegations of the complaint. As a separate answer and defense to said complaint, defendant M. Q. Fitch alleged that C. S. Fitch died August 19, 1923, and that the personal representative of the deceased has not been made a party to the action, and that no claim has been presented to the personal representative of the deceased, for the claim of plaintiff, and that, therefore, there is a nonjoinder of parties defendant. For another defense M. Q. Fitch pleaded the bar of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure, and also separately subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 thereof. For still another defense said defendant pleaded section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, and separately specified subdivisions 1 and 2 of said section.

The action was tried without a jury, and on December 31, 1926, findings and judgment were filed and entered against the plaintiff. The plaintiff appeals to this court from said judgment. There are no findings upon the first separate defense, nor upon the defense of the statute of limitations. The findings of the trial court are upon the issue tendered by the denial of all the allegations of the complaint. No findings were made as to the other special defenses. Judgment was for the defendant M. Q. Fitch.

Appellant presents three points upon which he contends the judgment should be reversed: (1) That there was no finding as to the statute of limitations. (2) That the finding that M. Q. Fitch is not indebted to plaintiff is not supported by the evidence. (3) That on the facts disclosed by the evidence plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

[1] We can see no reason for a reversal of this judgment because the trial judge did not find upon the statute of limitations pleaded. In view of the finding of the court that there was no indebtedness, it was unnecessary to find upon the issue tendered by a plea of these statutes.

[2] The same reasoning applies to the first separate defense. The finding that there was no claim whatsoever against M. Q. Fitch rendered unnecessary a finding as to nonjoinder.

The second and third contentions of the appellant are, in substance, but one question; namely, Was there anything due appellant from the defendant M. Q. Fitch?

The facts, briefly stated, were as follows: C. S. Fitch and M. Q. Fitch were husband and wife. Plaintiff began in the year 1908 working for C. S. Fitch, who was then conducting the City Hotel, at the town of Sonora, in Tuolumne county. At about that time the City Hotel, both the real estate and the personal property used in and about this hotel, belonged to Mrs. Fitch, Sr., the mother of C. S. Fitch. The "business" then being conducted in the hotel property and with the said hotel furniture and fixtures was owned by C. S. Fitch. Some time shortly before plaintiff began working for C. S. Fitch, Mrs. Fitch, Sr., by a deed of trust, conveyed the said hotel and the personal property used therein to Mrs. M. Q. Fitch, in trust for the children of C. S. Fitch and his said wife, Mrs. M. Q. Fitch. The exact terms and conditions of this trust are not made to appear. This trust deed was recorded about July, 1910. At about this last-named date an account was opened in a local bank at Sonora in the name of May Fitch, this being the defendant herein, M. Q. Fitch. Into this bank account there was deposited all the earnings of the hotel venture. Mrs. M. Q. Fitch would draw all checks against this deposit account, both for the maintenance of herself and family and for the conduct of the hotel business. At the time this system of depositing the earnings in the name of May Fitch began there was already owing to plaintiff a sum largely in excess of the sum now sued for. C. S. Fitch continued to run the business down to August 19, 1923, at which time he died. His personal representative was not made a party, and no claim was presented against his estate. Mrs. M. Q. Fitch testified that up to the time of the death of her husband she never had anything whatsoever to do with the hotel business, either as owner or manager. She further testified that she permitted the earnings of the hotel to be deposited in her name, at the request of and for the accommodation of her husband, C. S. Fitch. The record does not disclose any withdrawals of moneys from the bank for her personal use, except for such bills as her husband, C. S. Fitch, would be legally obligated to pay. There was, however, an exception in this way: C. S. Fitch had made some small speculations in mines and in lands; these investments, according to the testimony, yielded no returns, and these properties had been conveyed to Mrs. M. Q. Fitch. After the death of C. S. Fitch, Mrs. M. Q. Fitch continued the business as it had been conducted by C. S. Fitch prior to his death.

Plaintiff contends that M. Q. Fitch and C. S. Fitch were jointly conducting the business at all times. Plaintiff continued as an employee at the hotel until shortly after the death of C. S. Fitch. In the later years of plaintiff's employment he personally took out his wages as they became due, crediting them upon his account; and his present contention is that these several credits last referred to were applicable to the first items of his account against C. S. Fitch, and that since the time of the deposit of funds in the name of May (M. Q.) Fitch, and up to the death of C.

S. Fitch, the later earnings of plaintiff were obligations of M. Q. Fitch jointly with her husband. After this suit was brought, and before the death of C. S. Fitch, the plaintiff upon demand furnished a bill of particulars in this action. This bill of particulars corresponded with an account book of the plaintiff which showed an account of plaintiff against "C. S. Fitch" from July 1, 1908, until January, 1912, at which time his account book was by plaintiff changed to show an account against "C. S. and M. Q. Fitch, trustee, and M. Q. Fitch." In April, 1912, plaintiff again changed his account to read "C. S. Fitch and M. Q. Fitch, trustee, and M. Q. Fitch, successors to C. S. Fitch."

[3, 4] As we view this record it became a question of fact whether Mrs. M. Q. Fitch was a partner in the business from the beginning, or whether Mrs. Fitch, either directly or by implication, gave permission for the application of later payments of salary of the plaintiff as credits to the items of the bill of plaintiff against C. S. Fitch. The trial court heard all the evidence in the case, including the testimony of the plaintiff above referred to, and determined both these disputed points in favor of the defendant.

Appellant has included in his opening brief the opinion of the judge of the trial court, and we quote therefrom the following portion thereof, and we adopt the same as our opinion herein:

"At the time he [the plaintiff] ceased his employment in 1910 there was due him for his services as clerk, according to his book of accounts, the sum of $1,168.60. During the year he was away from the hotel he paid the following bills for C. S. Fitch and entered said items in his book as a charge against C. S. Fitch, to wit: 'B. Meyers, $37.75; J. Michel & Co., $118.29; P. C. C. T. Ass'n, $22.50; and J. J. Burkett Company, $19.10; or a total of $197.64.' * * * At the time Mrs. Fitch opened said bank account and began to have the moneys from the business deposited in her name, there was due and owing to the plaintiff according to his book of accounts, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1, the sum of $1,168.60 as above stated. This balance, together with the $197.64, is a part of the claim sued upon; in other words, it was carried on in the account against M. Q. Fitch. There is nothing in the evidence to in any way show that Mrs. Fitch ever assumed this liability or ever agreed to do so, nor is any reasonable explanation offered by plaintiff for carrying this item into the latter account other than his conclusion that she was a partner, owner of, or principal in the business from the beginning, a statement which is not supported by the evidence. His own book of accounts, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1, would tend to show to the contrary. The account in this exhibit was opened at the time of his entering the employment of C. S. Fitch and is a full and complete account of the entire claim and all the transactions incident thereto. This book is silent evidence of what was truly in the mind of the plaintiff at the time he made the entries, and, I think, reveals the true facts so far as the ownership of the business may have been concerned. An inspection of this exhibit shows that plaintiff opens his account solely against C. S. Fitch on July 1, 1908, and the account is thereafter carried in that name until the beginning of January, 1912, where the name of the debtor is changed to read 'C. S. and M. Q. Fitch, trustee, and M. Q. Fitch,' and is then carried under that heading until April, 1912, when the account was changed to read 'C. S. Fitch and M. Q. Fitch, trustee, and M. Q. Fitch, successors to C. S. Fitch.' If these headings of the account have any meaning so far as showing whom plaintiff considered at the time to be the debtors, and I presume they do, or it is one of the presumptions of evidence 'That the ordinary course of business has been followed.' Section 1963, subd. 20, Code Civ. Proc. It is reasonable for the court to infer that C. S. Fitch was the true debtor and solely so, at the time prior to the making of the change. There is also a notation in this exhibit, at page 25, that the accounts which he paid for Mr. Fitch, totaling $197.64, as above mentioned, were paid for C. S. Fitch. Having the above conclusions in mind, let us see if there is anything due plaintiff. The amount of the claim sued for is $1,282. From this amount we must deduct the $1,168.60, plus the $197.64, as these items were carried into the account which the court finds Mrs. Fitch would be liable for, and we have a situation wherein the plaintiff has been paid, so far as any legal liability rests upon the defendant M. Q. Fitch."

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

HIRAM LODGE NO. 18, FREE AND ACCEPTED MASONS, OF DELAWARE, OHIO, et al. v. COX et al.

(Civ. 5835.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 22, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 20, 1928.

1. Charities ☞31—Court will endeavor to carry charitable donations into effect, if consistent with rules of law.

Courts look with favor on all attempted charitable donations, and will endeavor to carry them into effect, if it can be done consistently with the rules of law.

2. Charities ☞10—Reception of profit in connection with its work is factor in determining whether institution is charitable or eleemosynary.

In determining whether or not an institution is charitable or eleemosynary in character, a considerable factor is whether or not it receives any kind of profit in connection with its work.

3. Charities ☞10—Eleemosynary character of institution, whose main purpose is charity, is not lost because some of its objects are not charitable.

That some objects of the institution may not be charitable does not deprive that institution of its eleemosynary character, providing the main purpose is charity.

4. Charities ☞11—Society does not lose its charitable character because its charitable acts are confined largely to its members.

A corporation or a society is not shorn of its charitable or eleemosynary character because the relief from sickness, suffering, want, and woe which it extends is largely, if not entirely, confined to its members.

5. Charities ☞10—Whether or not it is lessening burdens of government is one of tests in determining charitable character of society.

One of the tests in determining whether or not a society or corporation is of a charitable or eleemosynary character is whether or not it is lessening the burdens of government.

6. Evidence ☞22(2)—It is matter of common knowledge which court may judicially notice that leading object of Masonry is charity.

It is a matter of common knowledge, of which appellate court may take judicial notice, whether the trial court did or not, that the leading object of Masonry and of all Masonic lodges is charity.

7. Perpetuities ☞8(7)—Masonic lodge held "charitable institution or society," and bequest of perpetuity to it was for "eleemosynary purposes," and valid (Const. art. 20, § 9).

A Masonic lodge is a "charitable institution or society," and a bequest of a perpetuity to it, though providing that income of fund was to be used for current expenses of lodge, was for "eleemosynary purposes," within Const. art. 20, § 9, and hence valid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Petition by Hiram Lodge No. 18, Free and Accepted Masons, of Delaware, Ohio, and another, for the distribution of the estate of Gary Wirt, deceased, to which Charles H. Cox and others filed objections. From the decree of distribution, petitioners appeal. Decree reversed in part, with instructions.

Harry K. Sargent, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondents.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. Gary Wirt died, leaving a will, the clauses whereof that are here material are as follows:

"Item 2nd. All the residue of my estate both personal and real, of every kind and nature, wheresoever situate, which I may own or have a right to dispose of at the time of my decease, I give and devise and bequeath to Fred P. Hills, in trust however, for my brother Sam V. Wirt [here follow trust provisions], and at the death of my said brother, Sam V. Wirt, or if he should die before my decease, then all the residue of shall be equally divided between Hiram Lodge, Number 18, F. & A. M. of Delaware, Ohio, and Jackson Lodge, Number 146, F. & A. M. of Seymour, Indiana, share and share alike, said lodges shall place said place said (sic.) fund in a special funds (sic.) to be known as the Gary Wirt fund, and only the income of of (sic.) said funds shall be used for current expenses, and in case my brother shall live longer than I do then at his death I direct that said trustee shall [after paying certain expenses] distribute said fund as directed above, and shall pay an equal amount to each of said lodges as aforesaid, but in case that my brother shall die before my decease then my executor shall, after paying my debts and expenses as aforesaid, distribute the residue of my estate equally between the above mentioned lodges as aforesaid."

From the above quotations it will be observed that the will was prepared by a novice, and not by an expert scrivener.

The brother, Sam V. Wirt, predeceased the testator. Upon the death of the latter the will was admitted to probate by the superior court of Los Angeles county.

Thereafter, and in due course of probate, the administrator filed his first and final account, and petitioned for distribution, showing that he had on hand $3,274.51 in cash and securities.

Thereupon respondents filed objections to distribution upon the ground that the bequests to the two Masonic lodges were void under article 20, § 9, of the Constitution of the state of California, which reads as follows:

"No perpetuities shall be allowed except for eleemosynary purposes."

In its decree of distribution, among other things, the court found that "the bequest to Hiram Lodge No. 18, Free and Accepted Masons, of Delaware, Ohio, and Jackson Lodge No. 146, Free and Accepted Masons, of Seymour, Ind., was void under the provisions of article 2 (evidently meaning article 20), § 9, of the Constitution of the state of California," and ordered distribution of the estate of the respondents. The two Masonic lodges appeal from said order.

A reading of the will "from its four corners" makes it certain that a perpetuity was intended by the testator. His first statement is that the residue of his estate should be equally divided between "the two Masonic lodges"; "said lodges shall place said fund in the special funds, * * * and only the income of said funds shall be used for current expenses." The next reference to the lodges is in the phrase, "my trustees shall * * * distribute said fund as directed above, and shall pay an equal amount to each of said lodges as aforesaid"; and finally directs his trustee to "distribute the residue of my estate equally between the above mentioned lodges as aforesaid."

We think that by the use of the words "as aforesaid" the testator referred to the establishment of said "Gary Wirt fund," only the income whereof was to be used for current expenses.

The main question is thus presented: "Is such a perpetuity one for eleemosynary purposes?" This, in turn, offers two correlated questions: (a) Are the lodges receiving said bequests eleemosynary institutions? and (b) if they are, does the limiting of the expenditure of income to "current expenses" impair the eleemosynary character of the perpetuity so as to render it void within the provision of the Constitution?

Courts look with favor upon all attempted charitable donations, and will endeavor to carry them into effect, if it can be done consistently with the rules of law. "A bequest intended for charity is not void, and there is no authority to construe it to be legally void, if it can possibly be made good." Estate of Hinkley, 58 Cal. 457, 513; Estate of Willey, 128 Cal. 1, 12, 60 P. 471; Estate of Merchant, 143 Cal. 540, 77 P. 475; Estate of Dwyer, 159 Cal. 687, 115 P. 242; Estate of Peabody, 154 Cal. 178, 97 P. 184; Fay v. Howe, 136 Cal. 602, 69 P. 423; Estate of Goodfellow, 166 Cal. 412, 137 P. 12; Ould v. Washington Hospital, etc., 95 U. S. 303, 24 L. Ed. 450.

"The instruments creating them [charities] should be so construed as to give them effect, if possible, and to carry out the general intention of the donor, when clearly manifested, even if the particular form or manner pointed out by him cannot be followed." Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 95, 59 P. 317.

What is an eleemosynary purpose? "The word 'eleemosynary' in article 20, § 9, of the Constitution, 'is synonymous with 'charitable' as the latter word is used and understood in treatises and decisions upon the subject of trusts." Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 734, 102 P. 920, 922.

"A charity, in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift to be applied, consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves for life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government.' This definition, as applied to charitable perpetuities, must be read with the opening phrase constantly in mind that the benefit is for 'an indefinite number of persons,' and not for any particular person or persons, and it must be for all persons falling within a described class indefinite in number." Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 736, 102 P. 920, 923.

"Eleemosynary has come in the law to be interchangeable with the word 'charitable.'"

A charitable trust or a charity is a donation in trust for promoting the welfare of mankind at large, or of a community, or of some class forming a part of it, indefinite as to numbers and individuals. It may, but it need not, confer a gratuitous benefit upon the poor. It may, but it need not, look to the care of the sick or insane. It may, but it need not, seek to spread religion or piety. Schools and libraries, equally with asylums, hospitals, and religious institutions, are included within its scope. It is impossible to enumerate specifically all purposes for which an eleemosynary trust may be created. The difficulty is inherent in the subject-matter itself. With the progress of civilization new needs are developed, new vices spring up, new forms of human activity manifest themselves, any or all of which, for their advancement or suppression, may become the proper objects of an eleemosynary trust. As was said by this court in People v. Dashaway Ass'n, 84 Cal. 114, [24 P. 277, 12 L. R. A. 117]: "The enforcement of charitable uses cannot be limited to any narrow and stated formula. As has been well said, it must expand with the advancement of civilization and the daily increasing needs of men. New discoveries in science, new fields and opportunities for human action, the differing condition, character, and wants of communities and nations, change and enlarge the scope of charity, and where new necessities are created new charitable uses must be established. The underlying principle is the same; its application is as varying as the wants of humanity." People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 138, 45 P. 270, 271 (35 L. R. A. 269). See, also, Fay v. Howe, 136 Cal. 600, 69 P. 423; Estate of Dol, 186 Cal. 65, 198 P. 1039; City of Petersburg v. Petersburg Benefit Assn., 78 Va. 431, 436; Ould v. Washington Hospital etc., supra.

Charity, particularly with reference to fraternal orders, has been defined as follows:

"* * * It is a matter of common knowledge that the charity dispensed by fraternal orders and societies and other like charitable institutions does not consist alone of the material assistance, represented by dollars and cents, they give to the orphan, indigent poor, the sick and afflicted who may be in need of help, by furnishing them with food, clothing, shelter, and medical aid, but that they also bestow other kinds of charity which in many cases are just as essential and just as potent in their effect for doing good and in relieving distress as is the material assistance rendered by them. We refer to the charity which is the embodiment of sympathy and kindness; charity which causes

"Me to feel another's woe, To hide the fault I see,"

—and which comes of the spirit of brotherhood, good fellowship and benevolence generally found to exist in these fraternal orders and societies, and which actuates the members thereof to take an interest in the general welfare of each other, and which by words and acts of kindness and moral suasion, guides, cheers, and encourages those who, because of misfortune and trouble, have become discouraged and depressed in spirit, and who are thereby impelled and urged on to renewed effort. The uniting and blending of the two kinds of assistance mentioned, namely, the moral with the material, is charity in its highest and most perfect form.

"As suggested, it is a matter of common knowledge that it is the aim of fraternal orders generally to teach, foster, and encourage this kind of charity as one of their cardinal principles." Salt Lake Lodge No. 85, B. P. O. E., v. Groesbeck, 40 Utah, 1, 18, 120 P. 192, 197, (Ann. Cas. 1914C, 940).

[2] A considerable factor in determining whether or not an institution is "charitable" or "eleemosynary" in character is whether or not it receives any kind of profit in connection with its work.

"The test which determines whether such an enterprise is charitable or otherwise is its purpose. If its purpose is to make profit, it is not a charitable enterprise. If it is to heal the sick and relieve the suffering, without hope or purpose of getting gain from its operation, it is charitable." Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Artist, 9 C. C. A. 14, 18, 60 F. 365, 368 (23 L. R. A. 581).

"When the charity is public, the exclusion of all idea of private gain or profit is equivalent, in effect, to the force of 'purely' as applied to public charity in the Constitution." Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229, 247.

And, in discussing a certain charitable trust, our Supreme Court states, among other qualities, to show its charitable character:

"Nothing is reserved for profit or gain." People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 139, 45 P. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269.

To the same effect see, also, Morrow v. Smith, 145 Iowa, 514, 124 N. W. 316, 318, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 384; Plattsmouth Lodge, F. & A. M., v. Cass Co., 79 Neb. 463, 113 N. W. 167, 170; Fitterer v. Crawford, 157 Mo. 51, 57 S. W. 532, 50 L. R. A. 191.

[3] That some objects of the institution may not be "charitable" does not deprive that institution of its eleemosynary character, providing the main purpose is "charity." In discussing the character of the "Los Angeles Pioneer Society," and holding it to be a "charitable" society, our Supreme Court, in Estate of Dol, 186 Cal. 64, 67, 198 P. 1039, 1040, says:

"It may be urged that the articles contain no provision whereby any person not a member thereof may receive any benefit from the carrying out of its corporate purposes. This may be true as to the cultivation of social intercourse and friendship among its members, although as there is no limit as to the number of members, or as to the conditions of admission, the membership may embrace a large and indefinite portion of the public. But a reading of the article on the subject shows that the carrying out of the purposes defined will in the main benefit the general public as much as the members."

See, also, City of Petersburg v. Petersburg Benefit Ass'n, 78 Va. 431; Church M. E. South v. Hinton, 92 Tenn. 188, 21 S. W. 321, 19 L. R. A. 289.

That charity as hereinabove defined predominates in Masonry and in Masonic lodges has been held in numerous cases. In King v. Parker and others, 9 Cush. (63 Mass.) 71, 82, it is said:

"It appears by evidence, as well as by general notoriety, that a Masonic lodge is a voluntary association of persons, closely united by rules, usages, and ceremonies, maintaining a perpetual succession, by the admission of new members; and, whatever other objects they may have, one leading one is that of charity, supporting the poor and indigent members, their widows, and orphans. This object is essentially perpetual, for 'the poor ye have always with you.'"

To the same effect see Fitterer v. Crawford, supra; Morrow v. Smith, supra; Burdine v. Grand Lodge, 37 Ala. 478; Mason v. Zimmerman, 81 Kan. 891, 106 P. 1005.

[4] Neither is a corporation or society shorn of its charitable or eleemosynary character because the relief from sickness, suffering, want, and woe which it extends is largely, if not entirely, confined to its members. The Supreme Court of Kentucky in Widows' & Orphans' Home of O. F. v. Commonwealth, 126 Ky. 386, 397, 103 S. W. 354, 358 (16 L. R. A. [N. S.] 829) says:

"The convention meant by the word 'purely' to describe the quality of the charity, rather than the means by which it is administered, that it should be wholly altruistic in the end to be attained, and that no private or selfish interest should be fostered under the guise of charity; but it was never meant that, because a charity was limited by its terms to objects belonging to a certain sect or fraternal order, or color or class, it was a private, and not a public, charity. The members of the convention were wise and practical, and knew that men, as a rule, administer their charity through the organization or organizations to which they belong. Thus, Catholics will naturally distribute their charity through the organization of the Catholic church; Presbyterians through those of the Presbyterian church; Masons through the organization of the Masonic order, etc., etc. But, while each is discharging for the state a particular and limited part of its duty to the objects of the public's bounty, together they are fulfilling the state's whole duty far more completely and efficiently than could be done by means of a system of involuntary taxation administered through the hands of hired officialism. The difference between these two systems—the one actuated by love, and the other serving for pay—is as marked as the difference between the ministrations of a mother at the bedside of her sick child and that of a hired nurse. If one fixes his eye narrowly on the work of only one of the various bodies and organizations engaged in relieving the necessities of misfortune, he might reach the conclusion that it was not a public charity, because limited (in theory, never in actuality) to the members of the particular order or body; but he would make the mistake of one who would conclude that, because a regiment of a battle line had a flag bearing a name or number different from the other flags in the line, it was not a part of the army as a whole, and was not engaged with the other regiments in the mutual purpose of resisting the common enemy. The charities of the various religious and fraternal organizations we are contemplating may seem, when viewed separately and with a narrow and atrabilious vision, to be too limited in their ministrations to be called public; but, when viewed as a whole, the compass of their good work is as wide as the circle of human suffering, and as universal as the love of the heart of man.

"Seeing, then, that the various charities, which the generous portion of the community administer through the separate organizations to which the donors belong, as a practical proposition cover the whole field of the state's duty to her indigent and helpless citizens, and that they together contribute to the whole public burden, where would be the wisdom in discouraging such charity? And what good purpose can be subserved by indulging in a strained construction of a phrase in order to reach the conclusion that the members of the constitutional convention meant to throw away as useless the powerful aid which the state could otherwise enjoy in the contributions of charitable men? What good purpose is subserved in attaching the word 'private' to the charity of Catholics for Catholics, Presbyterians for Presbyterians, Masons for Masons, or Odd Fellows for Odd Fellows? Are the poor and helpless of these various bodies and organizations any less worthy, or any less a part of the public, because they are also members of the particular church or society to which they belong? Are not all charitable institutions necessarily limited to the relief of only a small part of the destitute public? Can any one institution administer to the wants of all? And, if this be true, is it necessary to brand as 'private' a charity which, by its terms, marks out a particular part of the public field in which it is to be administered? Who would say that an orphan asylum endowed for the benefit of colored children only was a private charity, or that an orphanage for destitute white children only was not public? And yet the operation of each would be exclusive of a large portion of the community. Who would say that a home for poor and aged men was a private charity, or a home for poor and aged women was not a public charity, although manifestly excluding, the one the female, and the other the male, indigent from participation in the bounty?" (Italics ours.)

See, also, Indianapolis v. Grand Master, etc., 25 Ind. 518, 522; City of Petersburg v. Petersburg Benefit Ass'n, supra; Hibernian Society v. Kelley, 28 Or. 173, 42 P. 3, 30 L. R. A. 167, 52 Am. St. Rep. 769; Burd Orphan Asylum v. School Dist., 90 Pa. 21; Estate of Lubin, 186 Cal. 326, 199 Pac. 15.

The Burd Case is in a sense overruled by City of Philadelphia v. Masonic Home, 160 Pa. 572, 28 A. 954, but the reasoning in Burd v. School District is so far superior to that in Philadelphia v. Masonic Home that we adopt it here without quoting it at length. Suffice it to say that it coincides with that in Widows' & Orphans' Home of O. F. v. Commonwealth, 126 Ky. 386, 103 S. W. 354, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 829. But even in City of Philadelphia v. Masonic Home, the court there says:

"The legal definition of the word 'charity' has been the subject of much discussion in the courts, especially in those of England, but its meaning here, discarding all technical sense, is 'a gift to promote the welfare of others.' The appellee clearly is a charity. It provides for and maintains in the 'Masonic Home' indigent, afflicted, and aged freemasons. This, too, from voluntary contributions, without charge to the beneficiaries, and with no profit either to the corporation or to its officers. Not one of the corporate officers receives a cent of compensation for administering its affairs. Such unselfishness excites the admiration and approval of all friends of humanity. Gen. Wagner, president of the home, testified: 'The number of inmates at present is thirty. Their average age is 72 years. All are decrepit. If they could support themselves, they would not be admitted. The money to support them is contributed by different Masonic lodges, individuals, Masons, men and women. The receipts are always less than the expenses, and a deficit has to be made up at the end of the year. No one is benefited except the inmates. They are fed, clothed, and lodged during life, and buried at death, at the expense of the home.' Of course, if this be not purely charity, nothing is. But is it a public charity?" (Italics ours.)

After lengthy reasoning, too narrow for us to follow, the court, with two justices dissenting, arrived at the conclusion that such an institution, although based on "such unselfishness" that it "excited the admiration and approval of all friends of humanity," was not a "purely public charity," within the meaning of the tax-exemption statutes. The reasoning and construction set forth in Widows' & Orphans' Home of O. F. v. Commonwealth, supra, far more nearly follows the canons of construction announced in the earlier part of this opinion.

[5] Another of the tests to determine whether or not a society or corporation is of a charitable or eleemosynary character is whether or not it is "lessening the burdens of government." Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 736, 102 P. 920.

In Molly Varnum Chapter, D. A. R., v. City of Lowell, 204 Mass. 487, 494, 90 N. E. 893, 895 (26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 707), it is said:

"The diffusion of knowledge, the relief of the poor, the fostering of love of country and of respect for our civil institutions, all tend to raise the standard and improve the quality of citizenship, and not only relieve the burdens of government but advance the public good. Donahugh's Appeal, 86 Pa. 306; Ould v. Washington Hospital for Foundlings, 95 U. S. 303, 311, 24 L. Ed. 450. The gratuitous benefit thus conferred serves only charitable purposes and entitles the plaintiff to the statutory exemption."

The above case received approval of our Supreme Court in Estate of Dol, 186 Cal. 64, 66, 198 P. 1039. See, also, Widows' & Orphans' Home of O. F. v. Commonwealth, supra, where the court said:

"Without undertaking to be technically accurate, a "purely public charity" may be defined as one which discharges, in whole or in part, a duty which the commonwealth owes to its indigent and helpless citizens. Undoubtedly, it is the duty of the state to educate its poor children, and thus fit them for discharging the duties of citizenship; to care for the indigent, insane, its helpless orphans, and its poor who are sick and afflicted; and therefore any institution which, serving no selfish interest discharges, in whole or in part, any such duty, is a "purely public charity.""

[6] That the leading object of Masonry and of all Masonic lodges is charity as hereinabove defined is, in this jurisdiction, and throughout the United States, a matter of common everyday knowledge, and such fact is certain and indisputable, about which there is no reasonable question. That fact is as certain and as well known as are the general doctrines of any religious denomination in this jurisdiction. Hence this court may take judicial notice thereof, whether the trial court did or not. Varcoe v. Lee, 180 Cal. 338, 243, et seq., 181 P. 223, 225.

Other courts in the Union have taken judicial notice of the charitable character of Masonry and Masonic lodges:

"The society known as Free Masons has long existed in this country, and in almost or quite every part of it. The purpose and objects of the society have been made public in numerous books, periodicals, and public addresses. From all of these sources of information, and from the generally received and accredited judgment of the public, the sole purpose and object with which Masonic institutions acquire money and property, beyond their current expenses as a society (furniture, lights, fuel, stationery, and the like), are for the bestowal of reliefs and charities to the needy. In addition, the 3d and 4th sections of the act to incorporate Masonic lodges in the state of Alabama, tend to confirm the belief that the society is eleemosynary in its aims. Under these circumstances, we hold, that we will take judicial notice, that the grand and subordinate lodges of Free Masons within the state of Alabama constitute a charitable or eleemosynary corporation." (Italics ours.) Burdine v. Grand Lodge of Alabama, supra.

"The order of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons is an association of persons that has existed for several hundred years, and exists generally in all civilized countries. In the state of Kansas there are 379 local, or subordinate, lodges, organized under the supervision and direction of said Grand Lodge, and subject to its jurisdiction. The lodges of this state are independent and separate from those of any other state or county, except that all Masonic lodges are bound by certain ancient landmarks and principles, which are not subject to change by either a subordinate or grand lodge. The objects and purposes of the Masonic order and of the Masonic lodges of Kansas are to inculcate in their members the principles of morality, temperance, benevolence and charity, and teach them their duty to one another and to all mankind; to care for the sick and afflicted, to relieve the wants of the needy and destitute, and to promote the general good and welfare of their members and their families, or the widows and orphans of such members." Mason v. Zimmerman, 81 Kan. 799, 106 P. 1005.

Many courts of the United States have held, after a more or less extensive review of the authorities, that Masonry and Masonic lodges are charitable institutions.

"Our conclusion is that Masonic lodges are organized for charitable and benevolent purposes, with no incentive to private or corporate gain, but whose revenues, derived from whatever sources they may be, are applied to the payment of their current expenses, and the relief of their afflicted and needy members and their families; and, although their charity is restricted to such use, they are charitable institutions." Fitterer v. Crawford, supra. See also, Mason v. Zimmerman, 81 Kan. 799, 106 P. 1005; Burdine v. Grand Lodge, supra; King v. Parker (Mass.) supra; Morrow v. Smith (Iowa) supra; Plattsouth Lodge v. Cass Co. (Neb.) supra; State v. Board of Assessors, 34 La. Ann. 574; Duke v. Fuller, 9 N. H. 536, 32 Am. Dec. 392; Masonic Education, etc., v. Boston, 201 Mass. 320, 87 N. E. 602; Mayor, etc., v. Solomon's Lodge, 53 Ga. 93; Mayor, etc., v. Grand Lodge, 60 Md. 280; State v. Grand Lodge, 2 S. C. 499; Grand Lodge v. New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 659, 11 So. 148, 153.

Even in tax-exemption cases, where relief has been denied for reasons appearing in the opinions, nevertheless the charitable nature of Masonry and Masonic lodges has been recognized. City of Philadelphia v. Masonic Home, supra; City of Newport v. Masonic Temple Ass'n, 108 Ky. 333, 56 S. W. 405, 49 L. R. A. 252; Bangor v. Rising Virtue Lodge, 73 Me. 428, 40 Am. Rep. 369. (But later the same exemptions denied to Rising Virtue Masonic Lodge were granted to an Odd Fellows lodge.) Curtis v. Androscoggin Lodge No. 24, I. O. O. F., 99 Me. 356, 59 A. 518; Morning Star Lodge v. Hayslip, 23 Ohio St. 144; Fitterer v. Crawford, supra; Morris v. Lone Star Lodge, 68 Tex. 693, 5 S. W. 519. And our appellate court has held that a Masonic lodge was a charitable institution. Kauffman v. Foster, 3 Cal. App. 741, 86 P. 1108. And our Supreme Court has held that a Masonic lodge could act as trustee for funds left to it for use of widows and orphans of its members. Estate of Wiley, 138 Cal. 301, 71 P. 441.

[7] In view of the foregoing, we hold that a Masonic lodge is a charitable institution or society, and that the bequests in this case were for "eleemosynary purposes," unless that purpose is destroyed by the provision that the income of the fund was to be used for current expenses of the lodges. We do not think that such was its effect. Every charitable society, corporation, or institution must have funds with which to defray its expenses before it can legitimately expend anything for charity. How can the charitable purpose of the society or institution be destroyed because some one assists in defraying its expenses? Can it be said that money paid for expenses of a charitable institution or society is not expended for charitable or eleemosynary purposes? We think not. Suppose the gift had been in a lump sum without any "strings," and the lodges should expend a portion thereof for expenses—could it be said that such payments were not for eleemosynary purposes? Again we think not. A clause very similar to the one here in question was before our Supreme Court in Estate of Peabody, 154 Cal. 173, 176, 97 P. 184. It is as follows (italics by the court):

"Ninthly. All the residue of my property, now in bonds, a list of which will be enclosed with this document, together with real estate which may be sold at any time it is my wish to have invested (after paying all debts) as a permanent fund, allowing the income only to be used in aiding to meet the expenses of "The House of Rest.""

The clause (with others) was upheld.

In The Estate of Royer, 123 Cal. 615, 56 P. 461, 44 L. R. A. 364, the gift was to the University of California, "for the sole purpose of founding a professorship," thus entailing an expense on the university in the form of the professor's salary, yet the gift was upheld as a charity.

In Estate of Coleman, 167 Cal. 212, 138 P. 992, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 682, a fund was left "to be used in erecting a suitable fountain for the benefit of thirsty animals and birds," and it was upheld, although there would be considerable expense in erecting the fountain.

In Estate of Dwyer, 159 Cal. 680, 115 P. 242, a fund was left to "found and maintain" (i. e., "to keep up, to support"—Standard Dictionary) "a home for aged persons."

In People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 138, 45 P. 270, 272 (35 L. R. A. 269), the trust provided for the erection and maintenance of a polytechnic college, "the salaries of the professors, teachers and instructors are to be paid out of the trust funds. Suitable college buildings are to be erected." The trust was upheld, the Supreme Court saying:

"The objects and purposes of the present trust are purely charitable. The mode of effectuating the charity by the erection and maintenance of a polytechnic college is clearly set forth. The salaries of the professors, teachers, and instructors are to be paid out of the trust funds. Suitable college buildings are to be provided. Tuition is to be absolutely free so long as the resources of the trust will permit, and when a tuition fee is charged it is only to aid in maintaining the institution. Nothing is reserved for profit or gain."

In Fitterer v. Crawford (Mo.) supra, Masonic lodges were held to be charitable institutions, although it was said:

"Revenues, derived from whatever sources they may be, are applied to the payment of their current expenses, and the relief of their afflicted," etc.

In Burdine v. Grand Lodge, etc. (Ala.) supra, it was stated:

"The sole purpose and object with which Masonic institutions acquire money and property, beyond their current expenses as a society * * * are for the bestowal of reliefs and charities," etc.,

—and it was held that they were charitable, or eleemosynary, institutions.

In City of Petersburg v. Petersburg Benefit Ass'n, supra, the court said:

"Its revenues * * * are wholly applied to the payment of its current expenses, the assistance of its indigent members, and the families of such" members "as may have died in needy circumstances. These are charitable purposes."

Therefore we hold that the bequests to Hiram Lodge No. 18, Free and Accepted Masons of Delaware, Ohio, and of Jackson Lodge No. 146, Free and Accepted Masons of Seymour, Ind., are for eleemosynary purposes, and are not void under article 20, § 9, of the California Constitution.

The decree of distribution, in so far as it declares said bequests void, is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to distribute said estate in accordance with the will of the deceased.

DILLER v. SCHINDLER et al. (Civ. 6001.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California. Jan. 6, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 3, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 5, 1928.

1. Evidence ⇨441(9)—Written contract of sale not restricting seller's right to re-engage in similar business, may not be altered by oral evidence showing contrary.

Where duly executed, formal, written contract of sale of business contains no question on right of seller to re-engage business of same character, oral evidence that he agreed not to do so is inadmissible as varying terms of written instrument.

2. Evidence ⇨441(1)—Rights under contract in writing depend on its terms, irrespective of prior parol agreements.

Where parties have reduced their contract to writing, their rights under it must depend on the true interpretation of its terms, irrespective of any parol evidence of what took place previously to or at time of making of agreement.

3. Good will ⇨6(4)—Sale of good will does not furnish grounds for implying that seller will not re-engage in same business.

In contract for sale of business, clause in bill of sale by which seller conveyed good will is no ground for implying that seller will not re-engage in same business.

4. Contracts ⇨116(1)—Agreement of seller not to re-engage in same business is valid, if not in undue restraint of trade.

Agreements restricting seller of business from re-engaging in business of same character, if not in undue restraint of trade, may be valid and binding when expressly made.

5. Evidence ⇨441(9)—Oral evidence that seller would not engage in similar business held inadmissible to vary written bill of sale for "Kosher" restaurant, in absence of claim of fraud.

Where bill of sale of "Kosher" restaurant did not contain any provision against seller's re-engaging in same business, but where it was attempted to be shown by parol that seller had so agreed, held that to permit proof of such agreement was to prove contract different from that contained in written agreement, which law will not allow in absence of claim of fraud.

6. Good will ⇨6(4)—Seller can re-engage in same business, in absence of contrary agreement.

Seller of restaurant business has right to re-engage in same line of business, in absence of such agreement with buyer to the contrary.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by B. Diller against Charles Schindler and another for damages for breach of contract in sale of business. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

William Klein, of San Francisco (Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. [1] Action for damages for breach of contract in the sale of a business. In January, 1924, Diller, the plaintiff and respondent herein, purchased from defendant and appellant Charles Schindler, a "Kosher" restaurant on Golden Gate avenue, San Francisco, for the sum of $1,500. A bill of sale was executed in an attorney's office and delivered by Schindler to Diller. The instrument disposed of the going business, the good will, cash register, furnishings and cooking utensils. Some six months later Schindler purchased a going restaurant of the same character, which was situated on an upper floor two doors from the restaurant he had sold to Diller. The latter thereupon brought this action, praying for damages and an injunction restraining defendant from con-ing and carrying on his newly acquired business. The action was based upon an alleged collateral agreement made at the time of the sale by Schindler to plaintiff of the business above referred to, under which Schindler was said to have promised and agreed that he would not at any time conduct any restaurant in the neighborhood of the business he had sold. Defendant Schindler by answer denied inter alia the making of any such agreement and as a further and separate defense set up the plea of the statute of frauds, claiming that an agreement of the character relied upon by plaintiff should be in writing. It was stipulated at the trial that if any such agreement was made by Schindler, it was a verbal one between the parties. There was offered by the plaintiff and received oral evidence to the effect that at the time of the sale Schindler had agreed not to open a restaurant within ten blocks from the place he was selling. Defendant admitted that the subject of incorporating a clause of this character in the bill of sale was discussed just before the instrument was executed, as plaintiff wanted it in writing, but defendant claimed that he refused to enter into any such agreement. Defendant's view would seem to be confirmed by the evidence, which shows that the subject was brought up by the attorney who drew the bill of sale, but, as stated, no mention of the matter appeared in that instrument. However this may be, judgment went for plaintiff for a permanent injunction and damages were assessed in the sum of $1,000. From this judgment defendant Schindler appeals. Under plaintiff's pleadings and the proof adduced to support them it is clear that the judgment rests on the breach of the parol agreement. This being so, we are of the opinion that the judgment cannot be sustained without doing violence to the parol evidence rule. While counsel have not favored us with any direct authority upon the subject, the law seems to be settled that where a duly executed, formal, written contract of sale of a business contains no restriction on the right of the seller to re-engage in the same character of business, oral evidence that he agreed not to do so is inadmissible as varying the terms of the written instrument.

[2-5] As was said in Bassett v. Percival, 5 Allen (Mass.) 345, the parties having reduced their contract to writing, their rights under it must depend on the true interpretation of its terms, irrespective of any parol evidence of what took place previously to or at the time of the making of the agreement. No such agreement can be implied from the clause in the bill of sale by which the vendor conveyed the good will of the business. Agreements of this character, if not in undue restraint of trade, may be valid and binding when expressly made, but they cannot be implied from the sale of the good will, nor can oral evidence be introduced to establish them. 28 Corpus Juris, p. 739; Smith v. Gibbs, 44 N. H. 335; Costello v. Eddy, 12 N. Y. S. 236,¹ affirmed in 128 N. Y. 650, 29 N. E. 146; Wessell v. Havens, 91 Neb. 426, 136 N. W. 70, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1377. To permit plaintiff to prove that the contract was something different from that contained in the bill of sale would be to permit a written agreement to be added to or varied by parol, which the law will not allow. Even conceding, therefore, that the findings of the court are fully supported by the evidence that Schindler did orally agree not to re-engage in said business, so long as this stipulation was not incorporated in the written agreement which was subsequently made, and so long also that no claim is made that any fraud was practiced in connection with the making and execution of the written contract in question, plaintiff has failed to show a case that entitles him to relief. Zanturjian v. Boornazian, 25 R. I. 151, 55 A. 199. In case of a mistake or omission in this respect, doubtless the contract could be reformed in equity, but this is not such a proceeding. In an action at law the terms of the contract in such a case must prevail and the legal rule that all agreements of parties are merged in their writings must also control.

[6] We conclude therefore that the trial court erred in receiving parol evidence to establish the limitation in question and ingrafting it on the bill of sale, as it is inconsistent with the written instrument. In the absence of such an agreement the seller of a business has a right to re-engage in the same line of business. This is a valuable right, and to prevent him from so doing in the manner indicated is in effect making a new contract between the parties and one which contains more onerous terms than those agreed upon under the written contract.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for defendant.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION, LIMITED, OF LONDON, ENGLAND, v. JOHNSON et al. (Civ. 4490.)★

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Feb. 20, 1928.

Insurance — 188(2)—Testimony of witness, based on general recollection relating to matters assured was required to keep records of under policy, held properly excluded.

In suit for premiums under employers' liability policy, basing premium upon entire remuneration earned during policy period by all assured's employees, and making assured's failure to keep records of remuneration earned by employees classified according to kind of work performed cause for insurer to apply to entire remuneration earned premium rate applicable to most hazardous work performed, testimony of assured's witness seeking to show segregation of employees so as to secure lower rate based on witness' general recollection, assured having failed to keep books to supply the proper information, held properly excluded.

Collier, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, of London, England, against Henrietta Johnson and another, doing business under the firm name and style of the Pioneer Transfer Company, to recover unpaid premiums for employer's liability insurance. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. L. Hubbell, of Escondido, for appellants.

George H. Moore and Hubert Starr, both of Los Angeles, and Dorsey Whitelaw, of El Centro, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. The transaction out of which this action arose is one of employer's liability insurance. The suit is for unpaid premium thereon. The counts are contained in the complaint. The first count alleges that the defendants became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,113.77 on account of premiums earned on a written policy of workmen's compensation insurance covering a period of one year, of which only $591.89 had been paid, and $521.79 was due and unpaid. The second count alleges an account stated upon the same transaction by which the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff $1,113.77, and had paid $591.89. From the bill of exceptions it appears that at the trial plaintiff introduced evidence to show that it issued a policy as alleged, that the work covered by it as stated in the contract was "truckmen, general trucking (not otherwise classified), classification No. 7208, premium rate $3.77. Pay roll to include all such employees as drivers, drivers' helpers, chauffeurs, chauffeurs' helpers, stablemen, blacksmiths, repairmen, and riggers, excluding only clerical office employees and storage warehouse employees." Also, that the place stipulated as that where the work was to be done was "Calexico, Imperial county, Cal." Section H of the policy is one over which the controversy principally arose. It reads, in part, as follows:

"The premium is based upon the entire remuneration earned during the policy period by all employees of the assured, and all employees of any contractor or subcontractor of the assured, engaged in the trade, business, or work described in said declarations. * * * The assured shall keep complete and accurate record of the remuneration earned by employees classified according to the kind of work performed, and shall cause contractors and subcontractors to do likewise by inserting in all contract agreements entered into a provision requiring such records to be kept for examination by the assured and the corporation. Failure to keep such records on the part of the assured shall entitle the corporation to apply to the entire remuneration earned the premium rate applicable to the most hazardous work performed."

Evidence was introduced sufficiently establishing the account stated as alleged in the complaint, by which the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff's bill of $1,021.79, and that of this only $591.89 was paid. The prima facie case was also proved on the other count.

Both sides rely upon Frankfort Marine Accident & Plate Glass Ins. Co. v. California Artistic Metal & Wire Co., 28 Cal. App. 74, 151 P. 176, to sustain their respective contentions as to the law bearing upon the issues presented by the first count. The facts of the case are similar to those in the one before us. The policy there construed contained a provision similar to section H of the contract here presented, but counsel construe the language of the opinion differently.

It was sought by testimony of the secretary of the defendant company to segregate the pay roll, but the evidence offered was simply the "general recollection" of the witness, and this was founded upon no substantial data. The ruling of the trial court refusing admission of such testimony was sustained. The principles upon which the decision was based are, we think, applicable here. They are most clearly expressed in the opinion of the court in denying the application for rehearing. One reason which is indicated as sufficient to uphold the ruling of the superior court is:

"That the proposal to prove the fact by the 'general recollection' of an officer of the defendant, after the latter had said that there were available to him no data upon which an estimate could be made, was properly rejected by the court as involving proof incompetent for that purpose.

"We do not hold that a witness, in some instances, may not properly be permitted to give his 'best recollection' as to the existence or non-existence of a particular fact relevant and material to some ultimate issue, in cases where the issue thus sought to be proved is not required to depend wholly for its establishment upon that character of proof and where there exists possible opportunity for the party against whom it is received to offer adversary proof upon the point to which it is addressed. In the case at bar, however, the ultimate question to be affected by the proposed proof, based entirely upon the 'general recollection' of the witness, is the most vital in the case to the plaintiff. And, it is to be said, equally vital to the defendant; yet readily it can be perceived how impossible it would have been for the plaintiff to have met or attempted to overcome the force and the possible effect of testimony of so dubious an evidentiary nature and how easily thus its rights might be wholly destroyed. Through no fault of its own, the plaintiff was wholly without means of knowing, or the ability even to approximate (not even enjoying the doubtful advantage of general or the best recollection) how much of the total compensation paid to its employees by the defendant was received by the 'outside employees,' and, manifestly, had the defendant been allowed to make proof of that fact by a witness upon his mere 'general recollection' thereof, based upon no data of a substantial character, the plaintiff's rights would have been placed at the mercy of testimony possessing little or no probative value and as to which an adversary showing was wholly impossible."

This quotation is most apt in its application to the facts of the instant case. While it is claimed here that the rejected testimony was the definite recollection of the witness as to employment of particular employees, it was based upon no "substantial data," and in fact upon no data of the character required by the contract of the parties. In the Frankfort Case the books included a record of all time spent by the employees whether within or without the shop. The issue was upon the segregation on that basis, and the books failed to supply the information. In the instant case it appears that the books are in identically the same condition. They show all of the time spent, but do not segregate it as to the character of work done or place of its performance. As to the lack, all data capable of being used for segregation purposes, the situations are the same. In the absence of such data stipulated by the parties as thus necessary, it is of no moment that here a witness stated that he knew the employees, nor would it meet the stipulations agreed upon by the parties themselves as to data required to show such segregation if he could tell what each did and where each worked. As in the opinion quoted, such testimony would have been determinative of the most vital issue in the case. The insurer would have been utterly at a loss to have secured or produced adversary proof. The insured had full opportunity to have kept and preserved competent evidence, and its failure to do so was not only neglect of its own interests, but a clear disregard and dereliction of a duty owed the insurer in a confidential relation of agency for the latter; and, finally, the injury which the appellants may sustain by being refused permission to use the evidence offered is the natural result of their own neglect, and to permit them now to foreclose the respondent from its day in court (which would be the practical result of allowing the issues in question to be established by the mere unsubstantiated recollection of the witness) would violate the maxim which forbids a party taking advantage of his own wrongful act.

Appellants further contend that there was testimony to the effect that $2,500 of the pay roll was paid to warehousemen, and that their work is not covered by the policy. The most that can be said to sustain this claim is that some conflict in the testimony appears to exist, but the only evidence to be found in the bill of exceptions indicating that any of the pay roll covered work of warehousemen is the statement of the witness Hill, based merely upon his general recollection, as to the competency of which evidence we have stated our views.

Finally, appellants make the contention that a part of the pay roll as reported by respondent's auditor was for work in Mexicali, whereas the policy provided that it should cover work only in Calexico, Imperial county, Cal. The only place where the word "Mexicali" occurs is in a statement rendered by the company to defendants which was introduced in evidence as a part of the proof of the alleged account stated. The bill of exceptions does not contain the entire statement. It merely quotes the summary of which all that is germane to the question here under consideration is, "Total $31,547.36; Mexicali $1,093.88." With no more of the context than this from which to judge, it would be mere speculation to conclude that the word "Mexicali" as here used indicates that any work was performed outside of Calexico. On the other hand, the bill of exceptions contains the statement, which, of course, we must accept as true, that:

"On the trial evidence was introduced by plaintiff in support of all findings of fact made by the court."

One of the findings to which reference is made is that all of the allegations in paragraph 3 of the plaintiff's first cause of action are true. These allegations contained one to the effect that the defendants became indebted to the plaintiff in this transaction in the sum of $1,113.77, which, according to the statement above mentioned, rendered by the plaintiff, includes the item, "Mexicali, $1,093.88"; hence the necessary inference that the work was done in Calexico. Upon the meager information contained in the bill of exceptions bearing upon this point we are not in a position to say that the trial court's finding in this behalf is unsupported by the evidence.

In view of our decision concerning the issues presented in the first count, it is unnecessary to pass upon appellants' contention concerning the court's rulings to do with the alleged account stated as set forth in the second cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON, J. (concurring). I concur in the affirmance of the judgment, but attach more importance to the stipulation of the parties than appears to me to be made manifest in the prepared opinion. Very substantial rights and liabilities of the parties were largely dependent upon the proper segregation and classification of the pay roll by the defendants during the period in which the premium was being earned. For the very reason that the only parties who could have knowledge sufficient to make the classification were the defendants, that duty was made to rest upon their shoulders, with this contractual proviso that "failure to keep such records" (that is, classified according to the kind of work performed) "on the part of the assured shall entitle the corporation to apply to the entire remuneration earned the premium rate applicable to the most hazardous work performed." Having made the assured its agent for the purpose of segregation and classification, it is readily discernible that liability for compensation might depend upon the acts of defendants in making the classification. It ill becomes the assured, after the premium has been earned and the liabilities determined, to attempt to avoid the controlling force of the contractual obligation, and this is especially true after a lapse of time when presumably it would be extremely difficult for the insurance carrier to controvert the "personal knowledge" of the bookkeeper. I am not suggesting that instances of specific and unquestioned errors of bookkeeping may not be corrected by proof as has been suggested in the authorities mentioned, but rather that a failure as extensive in its character as the one here involved to comply with the requirements of the written agreement should not be permitted to be proved in the manner here attempted, in contravention of the stipulation of the parties thereto.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. (dissenting). I dissent. I cannot agree with the main opinion for the following reasons:

In the first place, the testimony is undisputed that a set of books was kept by the defendants which showed the entire pay roll of all of the activities of the defendants, which included a contracting and other businesses not covered by the policy. Neither is it claimed that the books of account were incomplete in any particular. The whole difficulty was that the defendants did not keep a "record of the remuneration earned by the employees, classified according to the work performed." The record of remuneration was kept, but it was not classified.

The witness B. Hill testified that he was employed as bookkeeper for the defendants from the date of the issuance of the policy until he entered the military service in September, 1918, which was after the termination of the insurance period. He further testified that defendants were in businesses not covered by the policy, to wit, contracting, excavating, buying and selling hay and fertilizer, renting of live stock, etc.; that he had checked over the pay roll; that approximately $2,500 of the pay roll covered work of warehousemen (who were not covered by the policy); that he arrived at the figures from a personal knowledge of the employees; that the pay roll was not segregated so as to show the class of work performed by the employees, but was together in one book: that it could be segregated by the recollection of himself and Mr. Isom (one of the defendants), and would take one or two days to segregate the several amounts earned by the various employees. The witness was then directed to take the next item in the segregation, whereupon the objection was sustained that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and not tending to prove or disprove any of the issues in the case; that it appeared, from the undisputed evidence, that an account or statement had been made by the defendants showing their entire pay roll, and showing the classification of their employees and the rate at which said employees were paid; and that under paragraph H of the policy the assured was required to keep an accurate and exact record of the pay roll of all employees and of the kind of work they were engaged in. Whereupon the following colloquy took place:

"Mr. Hubbell (Attorney for Defendants): Do I understand, your honor, that we cannot show any of the other items [meaning items not included in the work as a transfer and dray company] because we have not kept the books right?"

"The Court: Absolutely. He must keep it and must cause all subcontractors to keep it."

Defendants then offered to prove, by competent testimony other than the books and records, that one-half of the money spent for the pay roll was for contract work in Mexico. This offer was refused by the court.

I have set these matters forth in detail for the reason that one or more of them will be material in the following discussion:

First. I disagree with the statement in the main opinion that the testimony of the witness Hill was based upon "no substantial data and in fact upon no data." The Standand Dictionary defines "data" as the plural of "datum," which it defines as:

"Something assumed, known, or conceded, as the basis of an argument, or a ground for a conclusion, or as material for an investigation or statement; a premise, a starting point, or a given fact."

Webster gives this definition:

"Something given or admitted; a fact or principle granted or presented; that upon which an inference or an argument is based; or from which an ideal system of any sort is constructed."

The books as kept by the defendant certainly contained "something * * * known * * * as the basis of an argument, or a ground for a conclusion." They certainly were sufficient "as material for an investigation," and were even more surely a "starting point" from which to proceed. With the pay roll, that is to say, "a list of those entitled to pay, together with the amount due them" (Standard Dictionary) before him, and a "personal knowledge of the employees," the witness Hill certainly had a "starting point" and "material for an investigation," as well as "a ground for a conclusion," to wit, that some of those employees whom he could segregate and designate by name labored as warehousemen, or in the contracting business, or in Mexico, etc., all of whom were specifically excluded from the policy.

I further take exception to the statement that Hill's testimony was based upon his "general recollection"; for he testified without contradiction that he had a "personal knowledge of the employees," which is entirely different from a "general recollection."

This brings us to the case of Frankfort Marine Accident & Plate Glass Ins. Co. v. California Artistic Metal & Wire Co., 28 Cal. App. 74, 151 P. 176. It is true that the clause in the policy in the instant case is obviously similar to the one considered in the Frankfort Case so as to make the reasoning in the latter case applicable here. The difficulty arises in agreeing as to what the case decides. In the Frankfort Case the secretary of the defendant testified that the only way by which he could determine the amount that was expended for labor on the outside would be from an estimate, but that:

There "would be no data for such an estimate, except my general recollection of what it has been. * * * As far as I know, there would not be any way of determining by examination of the books, or by questioning the bookkeeper, the exact amount that was expended for labor outside of the shop," etc.

In the instant case we have the witness Hill, who was the bookkeeper and who did testify, and testified from personal knowledge of the employees. Based on that personal knowledge, he testified that he could segregate the employees named on the pay roll into their proper classifications. When that was done the men could be summoned before the court to testify for the plaintiff, if there were any doubts as to the correctness of the segregation. Hence the question of "adversary proof," so fully discussed in the Frankfort Case, is disposed of; and it is not reasonable to presume that all of the men on the pay roll had died or vanished at the time the trial was had. Furthermore, the plaintiff would not be combating a mere "estimate" or "general recollection," but would be presented with a list of names which could be carefully checked against.

Again, in the Frankfort Case there were 50 men employed part of the time "inside" and part of the time "outside." Here it was proposed to prove that one-half of the pay roll was for work in Mexico, and $2,500 thereof was for wages paid to warehousemen. Any of these men would have no difficulty in answering a question as to whether or not he had ever worked in Mexico for the defendants, or whether he had ever worked for them in any other capacity than as warehouseman, etc.

I think the true rule is set forth in the main opinion in the Frankfort Case, as follows:

"In a sense, as before suggested, the defendant, by the provision requiring it to keep an accurate account of the pay roll to which the policies related was to that extent impressed with the character of agent of the plaintiff. It imposed upon the defendant the performance of a certain duty to the plaintiff involving the latter's rights under the contracts. At any rate, the defendant, as shown, was the only party to the contract authorized to keep a record of its pay roll for the purposes of the contracts. Indeed, as is plainly manifest, it was the only one in a position to do so. The plaintiff was not authorized to perform that duty, and had it been it would have been impracticable for it to have done so, or, indeed, as was the case when ultimately it sought to inspect the defendant's books, it might have been met with a refusal of the privilege of performing that duty. It was, therefore, up to the defendant to discover to the plaintiff the pay roll affected by the contracts. And if, as the defendant contends, the compensation paid to outside employees was intended to constitute the exclusive basis of the amount to be paid to the plaintiff as premiums, the burden was upon the defendant to show what proportion of the total amount paid as compensation to all its employees was paid to the inside employees [citing cases]. This proposition follows from the rule, which we think applies to this case, that where offsets to an account upon which a party sues exist in favor of the defendant, the burden is upon the latter at the trial to specifically point out and prove such offsets. Or, as has been elsewhere said, so it is correct to say here: 'The plaintiff having established a prima facie case by introducing the account kept by the defendants, it was incumbent upon the defendants, if they desired to show that they had not kept the accounts as required by the contract, but had confused other matters therewith, to point out such matters specifically. They cannot be permitted to destroy the plaintiff's claim by vaguely impeaching in general terms accounts which it was their duty to keep for the benefit of the plaintiff, and, if there are specific items which properly should be excluded, it was the duty of the defendants to point them out specifically." Gilbane v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 163 F. 673, 678, 90 C. C. A. 265." (Italics mine.)

In the instant case, "at the trial," the defendants desired to show "that they had not kept the books as required by the contract, but had confused other matters therewith," and "to point out such matters specifically." They tried and offered to "specifically point out in the proof such offsets," but were not allowed to do so. The evidence of the witness Hill, coming as it did from "personal knowledge," was competent to supplement the pay roll account. The pay roll account of the defendants was no more sacred than any other books of account, and the relation between the plaintiff and defendants in the instant case was no more of a fiduciary character than that of the partnership which existed in Schurtz v. Kerkow, 85 Cal. 277, 279, 24 P. 609, 610, where the court said:

"While the books were admissible evidence on the issue of profits they did not exclude other evidence. If the defendant or any other witness knew anything about those profits he should have been allowed to tell it. Of course, mere conclusions or opinions should be excluded." (Italics quoted.)

See, also, Shields v. Rancho Buena Ventura, 187 Cal. 569, 574, 203 P. 114, 117, where the court said:

"The books of account being properly admitted, it was not error to permit the plaintiff to read in evidence summaries of the accounts therein, for the purpose of avoiding delay. Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5. Nor was error committed in admitting, in addition to these accounts, the testimony of the plaintiff concerning the transactions on the ranch during each of the years mentioned. If plaintiff was able to corroborate the accounts by testifying to facts from his own personal knowledge, certainly the admission of this testimony furnishes the defendant no ground of complaint." (Italics mine.)

The defendant Isom would also have been a competent witness as to those matters in his own knowledge, independent of the bookkeeper, Hill. See Globe Mfg. Co. v. Harvey, 185 Cal. 255, 261, 196 P. 261, 264, where it is said:

"An itemized summary of the expenditures of defendant under the contract was admitted in evidence under the issue of damages. Plaintiff assigns this as error, for the reason that the person who kept defendant's books did not testify to their correctness. The statement, or summary, was admitted under subdivision 5 of section 1855 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because the original consisted of 'numerous accounts or other documents, which cannot be examined in court without great loss of time.' Defendant maintains a card system of bookkeeping and testified that he personally made up the statement in question by going over the cards and checking up the entries thereon with the original bills which he retained and which he knew had been paid. Therefore, the statement was, in fact, made from the original bills, of the payment of which defendant had personal knowledge, and defendant was competent to testify to the correctness of the items thereof upon his own knowledge, which he did. For this reason, testimony by the bookkeeper as to the correctness of the books of defendant was unnecessary and the statement was properly received in evidence." (Italics mine.)

Indeed, it has been held that in such cases evidence based on personal knowledge is not only admissible but "is of the highest character." Whitcomb v. Oller, 41 Okl. 331, 137 P. 709. Or, as another court has said:

"But, if we concede they [the books of account] were evidence, they constituted no higher evidence of the sale and delivery of the goods, than the positive proof of the witness, who testifies to their sale and delivery." Godbold v. Blair, 27 Ala. 595.

To the same effect see Hetzfeld v. Walsh, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 573, 120 S. W. 525, 526; Keene v. Meade, 3 Pet. (28 U. S.) 1, 7 L. Ed. 581; Crosland Co. v. Pearson, 86 S. C. 313, 68 S. E. 625, 626.

With the Appellate Court of Illinois (New Amsterdam Casualty Co. v. Saloman, 165 Ill. App. 264, 273), I "express the hope that if there be another trial of the case no obstructions will be placed in the way of an ascertainment of the truth concerning the number of persons and their compensation employed by the defendant during any policy period and purporting to be covered by a policy. The object of a trial on the facts is to ascertain the facts. That, and not any effort to conceal them, ought to be the end to which all efforts of counsel should tend. No competent evidence throwing light on the actual number and compensation of persons employed and covered by the policies should be excluded in this case. We deem it one in which the rulings of the trial court should be liberal in this regard."

Furthermore, the insurance policy was a "specialty." "A specialty is any sealed contract or obligation; a special contract as distinguished from an oral or verbal contract, a parol or unsealed contract, and a contract or obligation of record." Anderson's Law Dictionary. The distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments has been abolished in this state. Section 1629, Civ. Code. "An account stated" cannot "become a substitute for an action * * * upon a specialty, such as a promissory note or a bond for money. In such cases no subsequent statement of the amount due thereon, although agreed to by the payer, could supersede the special promise so as to form the basis of an action * * * upon an account stated to recover the original debt. * * * The action in such a case must be upon the original promise in writing and not upon account stated." Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 745, 183 P. 156, 160. In the instant case the court has found upon both the "original promise in writing" and upon the account stated. Hence the judgment, if based on the findings as to an account stated, is erroneous. There is and can be no evidence to support it.

Again, if plaintiff relies upon an account stated, the court committed error in admitting any testimony regarding the items of the original account, except in case of fraud, mistake, omission, etc. "The action upon an account stated is not upon the original dealings and transactions of the parties. Inquiry may not be had into those matters at all. It is upon the new contract by and under which the parties have adjusted their differences and reached an agreement. * * * As has been said, the original transactions between the parties are not the subject of inquiry and may not be made the subject of inquiry except upon such equitable considerations as fraud, duress, or mistake. And if it be sought to avoid the legal effect of the account stated upon any of these grounds, they must be pleaded." Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 574, 150 P. 994, 995. See, also, Klein-Simpson Fruit Co. v. Hunt, Hatch & Co., 65 Cal. App. 625, 633, 225 P. 14, and McLellan Co. v. East San Mateo Land Co., 166 Cal. 736, 740, 137 P. 1145. And the court refused to allow the defendants to prove mistakes and/or to amend their answer.

Should it be held that an account stated was before the court, then we are faced with the dilemma that the defendants asked leave to amend their answer to plaintiff's second cause of action (account stated) to allege as follows:

"As a further and separate answer to the complaint defendants allege that at the time of the account stated as alleged in paragraph 2 of plaintiff's second cause of action defendants acknowledged said account through a mistake of fact, believing that they were indebted to plaintiff and later discovered that they were not."

To which the court replied:

"I will allow the amendment to conform to the proof, whatever the proof shows, but I think you will want to make your answer a little more elaborate than that."

At the conclusion of defendants' case they offered to prove:

"That defendants' acknowledgment of the account stated by plaintiff was made through mistake of fact."

This offer was refused by the court, and such refusal was assigned as error by defendants. If the account stated was before the court, this last ruling was erroneous.

An account stated "does not * * * operate as an estoppel, and it may be impeached for fraud or mistake." Judge Story says: 'If there has been any *mistake, or omission, or accident, or fraud, or undue advantage, by which the account * * * is in truth vitiated, and the balance is incorrectly fixed, a court of equity will not suffer it to be conclusive upon the parties, but will allow it to be opened and re-examined.*' 1 Story, Eq. Juris. § 523." Green v. Thornton, 96 Cal. 67, 72, 30 P. 965, 966; Union Lumber Co. v. J. W. Schouten & Co., 25 Cal. App. 80, 83, 142 P. 910; White v. Thompson. 40 Cal. App. 447, 450, 180 P. 953. "Where an account has been adjusted by the parties, if any mistake is subsequently discovered, the whole account need not be opened and readjusted but the mistake may be corrected and the rights of the parties readjusted as to such mistake. * * * In such actions, the court may allow evidence of omissions and errors therein and find in accordance with the developed facts." White v. Thompson, supra; Adams v. Gerig, 25 Cal. App. 638, 145 P. 106. (Italics mine.) Furthermore, an account stated "may be impeached for fraud or mistake either at law or in equity whenever it is brought forward as a defense or cause of action." White v. Thompson, supra, page 449 (180 P. 954).

Neither can I agree with Justice THOMPSON in his conclusions. Let us suppose that the defendants had segregated the pay roll as required. Further, let us suppose that the witness Hill, the bookkeeper, made the segregation at the time it should have been done. Would he not have made it then, as at the time of the trial, from his "personal knowledge" of the men and the work they did? In what manner would the plaintiff have been worse off than if the segregation was made at the time of trial? In either event, plaintiff would have either relied on defendants' records as kept by Hill, or made a check. And what prevented them from making the same check at the time of trial? And what would have prevented the court from finding that certain men did or did not work as warehousemen, or in Mexico, or elsewhere? The burden was on defendants to establish by competent proof the errors claimed by them, and the court could have compelled them to bring in the various workmen that they might be examined and cross-examined.

Again, I do not read the contractual proviso as does Justice THOMPSON. The penalty for not classifying the pay roll is not that the defendants shall be charged a premium based on their entire pay roll, whether covered by the policy or not, but that the plaintiff might apply "the premium rate applicable to the most hazardous work performed" to the "entire premium earned." But the plaintiff did not and could not earn any premium on the pay roll of defendants' employees who worked anywhere outside of Calexico, or as warehouse employees, or as clerical office employees. The very issue in this case was to determine the "premium earned." This the defendants were not allowed to show. Had they been allowed to show that fact, then unquestionably it would bear "the premium rate applicable to the most hazardous work performed."

From the foregoing it seems to me that the judgment must be reversed because:

(1) The judgment on the account stated is erroneous, as there cannot be an account stated on a specialty.

(2) As there was an account stated before the court, the defendants should have been allowed to amend their answer and set up errors and mistakes. This right was denied them in two ways: (a) The court said it would allow the amendment to conform to the proof, which it did not do; and (b) the court refused to allow defendants to make the proof upon which to base an amendment to conform thereto.

(3) The evidence offered and rejected was competent and should have been admitted, either to correct the account stated or as matters going very materially to the defense on the contract itself.

TATTERSON et al. v. KEHRLEIN et al.★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 28, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Corporations ⇨121(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that sellers of all the stock of theater corporation acquiesced in buyers' rescission by attempting to sell property.

In action for rescission of contract for sale of all the stock of a theater corporation, evidence that defendants assumed possession of all property and right to possession of all of the stock held sufficient to support finding that defendants accepted and acquiesced in plaintiff's rescission by attempting to sell the property of the theater as their own.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1071(3)—That finding is not sustained by evidence is immaterial, where remaining findings are sustained and are sufficient to support judgment.

The fact that a finding is not sustained by the evidence is immaterial, where remaining findings are sustained and are sufficient to support judgment.

3. Corporations ⇨117—On mutual rescission of contract of sale, note given by buyers must be returned.

On mutual rescission of contract for sale of all the stock of a theater corporation, note given by buyer to seller must be returned.

4. Sales ⇨92—Offer and acceptance of rescission of sale are governed by rules governing inception of contracts generally.

Though offer of rescission of contract of sale on one side must be accepted on other, such offer and acceptance are governed by same rules as govern inception of contract generally.

5. Sales ⇨92—Seller's assumption of ownership of subject-matter of sale ratifies rescission of sale contract.

Seller's assumption of ownership of the subject-matter of a sale, such as selling it, is a ratification of the rescission of the contract of sale.

6. Sales ⇨92—Rescission of sale contract by consent may be implied from acts of parties.

A rescission of a contract of sale by consent may be implied from the acts of the parties.

7. Licenses ⇨39—Evidence held to sustain finding that theater corporation stock was issued in violation of statute, entitling buyers to rescind (Corporate Securities Act, as amended by St. 1919, p. 231, St. 1921, pp. 1008, 1114, and St. 1923, p. 87).

In action for damages and rescission of contract of sale of theater corporation stock on ground of fraudulent representations, evidence held to sustain finding that sellers issued stock in violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) as amended by St. 1919, p. 231, St. 1921, pp. 1008, 1114, and St. 1923, p. 87; and hence, contract being illegal and void, buyers were privileged to repudiate it and reclaim money.

8. Licenses ⇨39—Buyer of stock issued in violation of Corporate Securities Act may recover money paid and have contract, stock certificates, and promissory notes canceled (St. 1917, p. 673).

The penalties prescribed by the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) being all laid on seller and none on buyer, and statute being for benefit and protection of buyers, parties are not in pari delicto, and buyer of stock issued in violation of the statute may have judgment for money paid out and cancellation of contract, stock certificates, and promissory note.

9. Licenses ⇨39—Buyers, induced to enter into contract violating Corporate Securities Act by fraud of sellers and withdrawing while contract was still executory, are not in pari delicto (St. 1917, p. 673).

Buyers under contract for sale of theater corporation stock which was illegal because stock was issued in violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) are not deemed in pari delicto, where contract was induced through fraud of sellers and buyers withdrew while contract was still executory.

10. Licenses ⇨39—That transfer of portion of stock under contract involving illegal issuance of stock did not violate Corporate Securities Act does not render contract only partially illegal (St. 1917, p. 673).

That portion of stock transferred under contract for sale of all the issued stock of a theater corporation was not in violation of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) does not render contract only partially illegal, where issuance of other stock transferred was illegal, since if any part of consideration of contract is illegal the contract is wholly void.

11. Corporations ⚡121(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that one of buyers seeking rescission of contract of sale was secretly agent of sellers.

In action by buyers for damages and rescission of contract for sale of theater corporation stock for fraudulent representations, evidence held to sustain finding that one of buyers who acted for others in the purchase was secretly the agent of the sellers.

12. Corporations ⚡121(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding of fraud and misrepresentations in sale of theater corporation stock.

In action by buyers for damages and rescission of contract for sale of all the issued stock of a theater corporation for fraudulent representations, evidence held to sustain finding of fraud and misrepresentation in stating to purchasers that theater had always been a paying business, that a good deal of money had been made, and that corporation was free from all debt, when, as matter of fact, theater had been losing venture and was not free from debt.

13. Corporations ⚡117—Buyers held not to have waived right of rescission of contract for sale of theater stock by operating theater for 20 weeks.

Buyers seeking rescission of contract for sale of theater stock for false representation did not waive their right of rescission by operating theater for period of 20 weeks, where true records of theater were withheld from them, since it would require averaging over a period of number of weeks' operation to determine whether theater was a paying proposition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by George W. Tatterson and others against Oliver Kehrlein and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jesse Robinson, of Oakland, for appellants.

Crosby, Naus & Crosby and Daniel Rygel, all of Oakland, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. On November 4, 1916, the "Franklin Amusement Corporation" was incorporated under the laws of the state of California, and two years later certain issued stock was purchased by appellants. On September 28, 1923, the agreement, which is the foundation of this litigation, was entered into between appellants and respondents.

The agreement is very lengthy and need not be set out in hæc verba. We summarize it, setting forth merely such portions as are necessary to an understanding of the questions involved in this appeal: Preamble: "This memorandum of agreement made and entered into on the 28th day of September, 1923, by and between Oliver Kehrlein, Emil Kehrlein and Emil Kehrlein, Jr., hereinafter known and referred to as parties of the first part, and George W. Tatterson, J. M. Maurer and L. B. Gross, hereinafter known and referred to as parties of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas the parties of the first part are the owners of all of the issued and outstanding stock of the Franklin Amusement Corporation, a California corporation, and whereas, said parties of the first part are desirous of selling to parties of the second part said stock in said corporation under the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth and the parties of the second part are desirous of buying said stock upon said conditions." Article I: The parties agree respectively to sell and buy 2,800 shares, "being all of the issued stock of said corporation." Price $90,000, payable in installments as follows: $250 down; $450 on November 14, 1923; $700 on December 14, 1923, and $700 on the 14th day of each and every month thereafter until the whole sum of $90,000 shall have been paid. There shall be deposited and paid on or before October 14, 1923, the sum of $10,000 as security for the payment of the sums to be paid monthly and of the performance of the terms and conditions of the agreement. Article II: "All of the stock of the Franklin Amusement Corporation mentioned in paragraph I herein and in the preamble hereto, together with a certificate or certificates issued to the parties of the second part jointly covering the treasury stock of the Franklin Amusement Corporation now and hereafter issued, shall be deposited in the Trust Department of the Central National Bank of Oakland under written escrow instructions hereto attached and made a part of this agreement," etc. Article III provides for contingency of default in payment of installments. Article IV provides that the corporation at the time of the transfer of the stock shall be free and clear of all debts and liabilities other than those arising under the lease now covering the property and provides further remedies in case of default by the buyers. Article V provides that on or before October 14, 1923, the corporation shall execute a sublease of the stores in the theater building to parties of the first part at a yearly rental of $1. Article VI: "It is mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto that the parties of the first part will upon the due execution of this agreement and the payment of the sum of $10,000.00 herein mentioned and the opening of the escrow with the Central National Bank of Oakland as per the terms of Exhibit A attached hereto, deliver to the parties of the second part five shares of the capital common stock of the said Franklin Amusement Corporation to qualify as directors in the said Franklin Amusement Corporation. The said five shares shall not become a part of the escrow under Exhibit A herein, but shall be in absolute ownership in parties of the second part herein," etc.

Exhibit A attached to the agreement is entitled "Escrow Instructions" and is directed to Central Bank of Oakland, trust department, and is signed by all the parties to the agreement and reads in part:

"The undersigned herewith hand you in escrow certificates Nos. 30, 31, 29 and 37, the same constituting all but three shares of the capital stock of the Franklin Amusement Corporation, a California corporation, the said stock being indorsed to Oliver Kehrlein, Emil Kehrlein and Emil Kehrlein, Jr. This stock you are to hold subject to the following instruction, to wit: If there shall be paid to you to the order of Oliver Kehrlein, Emil Kehrlein and Emil Kehrlein, Jr., the sum of $450.00 on the 14th day of November, 1923, $700.00 on the 14th day of December, 1923, and $700.00 on the 14th day of each and every month thereafter until the entire sum of $79,950.00 shall have been paid, then and in that event all of said certificates of stock hereinabove enumerated shall be delivered by you to the order of George W. Tatterson, J. M. Maurer and L. B. Gross, administrators, successors or assigns."

Then follow provisions in case of default in payments.

On a strip of paper which was glued to the margin of article VI of the agreement is the following paragraph:

"It is further agreed that for the purpose of conducting the affairs of the Franklin Amusement Corporation that the capital stock now issued and placed in escrow as a pledge with the Central National Bank of Oakland shall be and is owned by the parties of the second part, and may be voted by them for all purposes in conformity with this agreement and not contrary thereto."

The agreement we have summarized is the basis of three suits: This one in which George W. Tatterson, J. M. Maurer, and L. B. Gross are plaintiffs and Oliver Kehrlein, Emil Kehrlein, and Emil Kehrlein, Jr., are defendants, in which plaintiffs allege fraud on the part of defendants and seek to recover $31,030 damages and in which judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs in the sum of $12,071.86; the second suit in which Oliver Kehrlein is plaintiff and George W. Tatterson is defendant, wherein plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $1,500 on a promissory note executed by George W. Tatterson, the defendant in the action, and in which judgment was entered for defendant; and the third suit wherein Oliver Kehrlein, Emil Kehrlein, and Emil Kehrlein, Jr., are plaintiffs and the Franklin Amusement Corporation (a corporation), George W. Tatterson, J. M. Maurer, and L. B. Gross are defendants, in which plaintiffs seek damages for breach of covenant to keep the rental paid, with consequent damages arising from loss of rent from subtenants, in which judgment was entered for defendants.

This appeal is prosecuted by appellants herein, who are also appellants in the other two actions mentioned. The three actions were consolidated in the trial court, and the appeals are presented upon one set of briefs. Should the case under consideration be affirmed, in view of the fact that the two other actions are based upon the same transaction, a similar order must be entered in each of the other two cases.

Appellants urge the following points on this appeal: (1) Insufficient evidence to support certain findings. (2) Certain findings are outside the issues of the case. (3) The judgment is erroneous in point of law.

Under the heading "Insufficient Evidence to Support Certain Findings," appellants complain of the following facts found by the court which they assert there is insufficient evidence to support:

Finding I: "On February 29, 1924, these defendants became and ever since have been indebted to these plaintiffs George W. Tatterson and J. M. Maurer in the sum of $10,907.50 for money had and received by these defendants to and for the use and benefit of said plaintiffs, no part of which sum, nor any interest thereon, has been paid." Finding II that "the said 2,204 shares were issued, as hereinafter set forth, without any permit or certificate or authority from said commissioner and/or said department, and in violation of the Corporation Securities Act." Finding IV: "That continuously and for several weeks to and including the 28th day of September, 1923, the plaintiff Gross was, without the knowledge of his coplaintiffs Tatterson and Maurer, secretly the agent of, and in the employ of, the defendants for the purpose of selling the capital stock and/or the assets of said Franklin Amusement Corporation to the said Tatterson and Maurer, and the efforts and negotiations and representations of the said Gross were the procuring cause of the execution by said Tatterson and Maurer, and each of them, of the contract hereafter referred to" (contract hereinabove summarized). Finding V: "The plaintiffs Tatterson and Maurer relied upon the judgment and discretion of their coplaintiff Gross in fixing the terms of said contract, and relied upon the said Gross to obtain the most favorable terms possible in buying said stock from the defendants; and the price of $90,000, together with the amounts and times of payment of installments thereof, were first fixed and suggested by Gross to the defendants, then assented to by the latter, whereupon said Gross represented that price to said Tatterson and Maurer, as and because thereof the plaintiffs Tatterson and Maurer believed it to be, the lowest price at which defendants would sell to the plaintiffs." And finally finding VI: "And prior to the time of making said contract, the defendants, with intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiffs Tatterson and Maurer, falsely and fraudulently represented to them and each of them that the theater business of said corporation had always been profitable and paid well. Neither of said plaintiffs knew that said representation was false and untrue, and the said plaintiffs, believing in and relying on the truth of said representations, executed said contract."

Appellants concede the following facts found in finding II:

"Franklin Amusement Corporation was incorporated under the laws of the state of California on November 4, 1916, and not earlier, with an authorized capital stock of $50,000, divided into 5,000 shares of the par value of $10 each; and on November 15, 1916, received from the commissioner of corporations of California a certificate or permit authorizing it to sell and issue 2,800 shares of said stock, and no more, said certificate or permit being the only certificate or permit of authority ever received by said corporation from, or issued or given to it by the commissioner of corporations and/or the State Corporation Department of California. The said corporation issued the said 2,800 shares in November, 1916, and the remaining 2,200 shares of the capital stock remained in the treasury of said corporation unissued, until September 28, 1923,"—but do not concede the remainder of the finding—"when the said 2,200 shares were issued, as hereinafter set forth, without any permit or certificate of authority from said commissioner and/or said department, and in violation of the Corporate Securities Act."

Under the escrow instructions addressed and delivered to Central National Bank of Oakland, four certificates of stock were deposited with the bank, being certificates Nos. 30, 31, 29, and 37. The old certificates for 2,800 shares of the issued and outstanding stock were transferred into three new certificates as follows: Certificate No. 29 for 933 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares to George W. Tatterson; certificate No. 30 for 933 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares to J. M. Maurer; and certificate No. 31 for 933 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares to L. B. Gross.

The 2,200 shares of treasury stock were issued simultaneously to respondents as follows: Five shares as qualifying shares and the remaining 2,195 shares were issued under certificate No. 37 jointly in the names of George W. Tatterson, L. B. Gross, and J. M. Maurer. The certificates thus aggregating 4,995 shares out of the total capitalization of 5,000 shares, were indorsed in blank and went into escrow, and as thus indorsed, were held by Central National Bank of Oakland, pursuant to the escrow instructions.

As between themselves, Tatterson and Maurer arranged that each should pay half of the payment of $10,000 required to be made on or before October 14, 1923. Maurer paid his $5,000. Tatterson paid $3,000 of his half on October 8, 1923, and $500 on October 17, 1923, leaving a balance of $1,500 for which the sellers accepted his note, which note is the basis of the suit brought by Oliver Kehrlein against George W. Tatterson hereinbefore mentioned. The $10,000 thus being taken care of, the buyers were let into possession of the property of the corporation on October 14, 1923, and operated the theater at a loss for 20 weeks, when they surrendered the property to the sellers and served the following notice of rescission, which notice bears date February 29, 1924, and is signed by respondents George W. Tatterson, J. M. Maurer, and L. B. Gross, and addressed to appellants Oliver Kehrlein, Emil Kehrlein, and Emil Kehrlein, Jr.:

"Take Notice. That that certain agreement made and entered into by and between you and the undersigned on the 20th day of September, 1923, for the mutual purchase and sale of all of the stock of the Franklin Amusement Company, together with the personal property and lease owned by said company and the business of the Franklin Theater, is hereby rescinded for and upon the grounds of the fraud and misrepresentations practiced upon the undersigned by you, and further performance of said agreement is refused and the lease to said building and property, together with the modification thereof, the possession thereof and of the personal property therein, together with five shares of stock of said corporation, in the possession of the undersigned, the stock certificate book, the stock ledger, the stock journal, the by-laws of said corporation and any and all other things of value received from you by the undersigned are hereby tendered to you and offer of the delivery thereof is made to you and consent is hereby given you to withdraw from the escrow of the Central National Bank of Oakland all of the stock of said Franklin Amusement Corporation on deposit in said bank.

"And demand is hereby made upon you for the repayment to the undersigned of the sum of $12,000.00 paid upon said contract by us, and the further sum of $5,555.94 paid under the terms of said lease by the undersigned, and the further sum of $13,074.12 losses caused the undersigned by the said fraudulent representations made by you in inducing the undersigned to enter into said agreement, to wit: That said business was a paying business, paying large profits; that said corporation was free of debts and all of the other representations made by you to the undersigned for the purpose of inducing the undersigned to enter into said agreement, all of which were false and untrue, and for which reasons the said agreement is hereby rescinded."

Thereafter, on March 1, 1924, the Kehrleins resumed possession of the corporation's property and operated the theater until April 22, 1924, when they abandoned it, the lease being then forfeited by them to the landlord in unlawful detainer, and the corporation went into involuntary bankruptcy.

The evidence shows that appellants are indebted to respondents George W. Tatterson and J. M. Maurer in the sum of $10,907.50, with interest from February 29, 1924, which in equity and good conscience ought to be paid, because at approximately that date the parties mutually rescinded the agreement of September 28, 1923. The respondents rescinded the agreement by the notice of rescission and tendering to appellants the five shares of qualifying stock, the personal property in their possession, the stock certificate book, the stock ledger, the stock journal, the by-laws of the corporation, and every other thing of value, together with consent that appellants might withdraw from escrow all of the stock of the Franklin Amusement Corporation on deposit in Central National Bank, and as the theater had been run at a loss there were no profits to return or offer to return, and as stated, appellants resumed possession of the property of the corporation on March 1, 1924.

Appellant Oliver Kehrlein testified that he was the manager of the Franklin Amusement Corporation up to the time of the sale to Tatterson, Maurer, and Gross, approximately five years; that the theater was taken back and he assumed the management of it about February 29, 1924.

The witness Carl H. Nieper testified:

"I had a conversation with Mr. Oliver Kehrlein regarding the Franklin Theater about the time he took it over from Tatterson, Maurer and Gross. It was not very long after March 1, 1924. Nobody present but Mr. Kehrlein and myself in his office in the Tribune Building. I approached Mr. Kehrlein regarding the sale of the lease of the Franklin Theater, and I ask Mr. Kehrlein for a price. At that time Mr. Kehrlein quoted me a price of $30,000, but I said that I had approached with the idea of giving $25,000. Those figures at that time did not seem to interest Mr. Kehrlein, because he thought he ought to get more than $25,000. I was then in the real estate business, a broker. I knew that the landlord was Williams, and there was a lease from him to the Franklin Amusement Corporation, and I was after that lease. Afterwards I came back—quite regularly afterwards—because I was interested in getting that lease, and I kept on. I saw Mr. Kehrlein a half dozen times or so. In the two months following the time in which he took the theater over, I saw him sometimes twice a day. I know I made a call twice a day possibly the first week, and every other day after that, because I was very anxious at that time to get hold of the lease. I came back again and asked him if he would not take $25,000, and he asked me who my people were. I did not tell him who they were because I thought it was my personal business, and he said the reason he asked me was that these people, whoever they were, should be expert show people, in other words, they should know the business in order to run the theater, because the people who were handling it knew nothing about it, and didn't make any money for the reason they didn't know their business. I said my people qualified, and then near the close of the meeting he referred to Mr. Jesse Robinson, to confirm the price that he quoted me. Mr. Kehrlein quoted me a price. He wanted $30,000, and I offered him $25,000, and he says: 'You take it up with my attorney, Mr. Jesse Robinson.' I called on Mr. Robinson personally. Nobody present but Mr. Robinson and myself. Mr. Robinson came out of his office and talked to me in the ante-room, and he asked me what I wanted. I told him, and he said: 'Make a price.' He didn't make any price. He said: 'Get a deposit and bring it in, and we will take it up.' Later Mr. Kehrlein called me up. He said if my party was still interested to get busy, he could not let that lease go, and I went back and saw Mr. Kehrlein and talked it over with him, and asked him if he could give me 30 days I might be able to put it over. He said, no, he wanted to give it up. He said, 'there is a time to give it up, and it is now,' but he would give me a little time to go and see my man. Later, after the lease was up, I met Oliver on the street a couple of times, and he said he was sorry he did not take me up on my $25,000. Kehrlein did not explain to me in any of those conversations that he was running the theater for the account of Tatterson, Maurer, and Gross. Mr. Robinson said for me to bring in a deposit, and that he would take it up with his client, but nothing was ever mentioned regarding Mr. Tatterson or Mr. Maurer. Mr. Robinson said something about some trouble that Mr. Kehrlein was having, but no names were mentioned. I am positive that Mr. Robinson did not say that Mr. Kehrlein was not in any legal position to make any agreement."

"Subsequently to March 1, 1924, these defendants accepted and acquiesced in said rescission by attempting to sell the property of said theater as their own."

They assumed possession of all of the property and were armed with a written authorization contained in the notice of rescission to withdraw all of the stock from escrow, which stock was properly indorsed by respondents—being indorsed in blank and appellants could at their pleasure have the shares of stock issued to them by the corporation and make a transfer of the stock to the purchaser.

[2, 3] If this finding is supported by sufficient evidence, and we think it is, even assuming the findings complained of to be erroneous—which, however, we do not concede—it would in no way affect the judgment or be ground for reversal, for the fact that a finding is not sustained by the evidence is immaterial, where the remaining findings are sustained and are sufficient to support the judgment. As was said in Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 436, 51 P. 630, 633:

"It is not necessary to consider whether objections to these findings are well taken or not, for, however erroneous, the judgment cannot be set aside inasmuch as it may rest upon finding 'F'—here finding XII.

See, also, Ehat v. Scheidt, 17 Cal. App. 430, 438, 120 P. 49; Lovell v. Frost, 44 Cal. 471, 475.

Therefore, if the contract was rescinded, the note given by Tatterson to Kehrlein must be returned. "Upon a mutual rescission of a contract the law requires each party to restore whatever he has received under it" Dugan v. Phillips, 77 Cal. App. 268, 278, 246 P. 566, 569; Green v. Darling, 73 Cal. App. 700, 239 P. 70. "If the minds of the parties met on the proposition that they would rescind, it was not necessary that the defendant stipulate to return to the plaintiff the money which he had received, for the law requires him to do this as a consequence of having agreed that the contract be abrogated" Green v. Darling, supra.

[4-6] In the present case the corporation owned the theater, and only the corporation could sell it. At the time the witness Nieper testified that appellants offered to sell the theater for $30,000, appellants could act for the corporation only through acceptance of the indorsed stock certificates restored to appellants when they were served with the notice of rescission. The notice of rescission was an offer of rescission; Nieper's testimony supports a finding of acceptance of that offer, thus creating a mutual rescission. While the offer of rescission on the one side must be accepted on the other, such offer and acceptance are governed by the same rules as govern the inception of contracts generally. Assumption of ownership of the subject-matter of a sale, such as selling it, is a ratification of the rescission of the contract. Sauble v. Gary S. C. Agency, 56 Cal. App. 606, 611, 206 P. 141. A rescission by consent may be implied from the acts of the parties. Hogan v. Anthony, 40 Cal. App. 679, 684, 182 P. 52; Tomkins v. Davidow, 27 Cal. App. 327, 335, 149 P. 788.

[7] While discussion of the remaining objections urged by appellants is not necessary to an affirmance of the judgment, it may be said that the finding that the "2,200 shares were issued as herein set forth without any permit or certificate or authority from said commissioner or said department and in violation of the Corporate Securities Act" is supported by the evidence. Five of these shares were issued and delivered to respondents as qualifying shares, and the remaining 2,195 shares were issued and deposited with the bank to be delivered to respondents upon making certain payments. Respondents contend that while the stock under the escrow instructions given to the bank was evidently intended originally as an escrow, the last-minute change in the contract at the foot of article VI "that the capital stock now issued and placed in escrow as a pledge with the Central National Bank of Oakland shall be and is owned by the parties of the second part, and may be voted by them for all purposes in conformity with this agreement and not contrary thereto," changed the character of the stock from an escrow to a pledge as security for the payments due under the contract. While we think this is true, it would make no difference, as the issuing of the stock and placing it in escrow is as much a violation of the Corporate Securities Act as though the stock had been sold outright.

The Corporate Securities Act, chapter 532, Statutes 1917, as amended by chapter 148, Statutes 1919, chapters 597 and 658, Statutes 1921, and chapter 50, Statutes 1923, defines in section 2, subdivision 7, the term "sale" as including "issue." Section 3 prohibits "sale" (which includes "issue") without securing a permit from the commissioner of corporations; section 12 makes security issued without a permit void; section 13 makes the "issuing" corporation guilty of a public offense; and section 14 makes the officers, agents and employees of the corporation guilty of a public offense.

The contract of September 28, 1923, being prohibited and the making thereof subject to a penalty, the contract is illegal and void; the penalty implies a prohibition (Levinson v. Boas, 150 Cal. 185, 88 P. 825, 12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 575, 11 Ann. Cas. 661; Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14; Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., 72 Cal. App. 409, 237 P. 784; Napa Valley E. Co. v. Calistoga E. Co., 38 Cal. App. 477, 176 P. 699), and respondents, having paid money in consideration of an executory contract which is illegal, were privileged to repudiate the agreement and reclaim the money (Smith v. Bach, supra). In Smith v. Bach at pages 262, 263 (191 P. 15), the court uses this language:

"Here it is manifest from a reading of the entire act that the statute in question was passed for the protection of the public and not as a revenue measure. * * * In such a case a contract made in violation of its terms should be held to be void. * * * The general rule controlling in cases of this character is that where a statute prohibits or attaches a penalty to the doing of an act, the act is void, and this, notwithstanding that the statute does not expressly pronounce it so, and it is immaterial whether the thing forbidden is malum in se or merely malum prohibitum. A statute of this character prohibiting the making of contracts, except in a certain manner, ipso facto makes them void if made in any other way. * * * The imposition by statute of a penalty implies a prohibition of the act to which the penalty is attached, and a contract founded upon such act is void."

The Corporate Securities Act was passed for the protection of the public and "every case from every court recognizes that when a statute has been made for the protection of the public a contract in violation of its provisions is void." Payne v. De Vaughn, 77 Cal. App. 399, 403, 246 P. 1069, 1071. As it was illegal for the corporation to issue the 2,200 shares of treasury stock without a permit from the commissioner of corporations, it was likewise illegal for the Kehrleins, as agents, officers or representatives of the corporation, to join with it, or aid or abet or assist it in committing the illegal act, or to commit the act for the corporation. King v. Johnson, 30 Cal. App. 63, 157 P. 531.

Appellants contend that respondents were buying the theater and not the stock of the Franklin Amusement Corporation except as a means to that end, and that if respondents received what they bargained for and wanted, they should not be permitted to contend that what they were buying was stock which meant nothing and represented nothing. What respondents sought was the property of the corporation which was represented by the stock, and it was this stock they were buying so that they could control the corporation, and which was so expressed in the contract. To hold otherwise would require the court to change or modify the express terms of the agreement of the parties. The defenses of estoppel, waiver, and ratification are not available in the case of an illegal contract. "This is one of the distinctions between void and voidable contracts. The doctrines of estoppel by contract and ratification have no application to a contract which is void because it violates an express mandate of the law or the dictates of public policy. Such a contract has no legal existence for any purpose and neither action nor inaction of a party to it can validate it and no conduct of a party to it can be invoked as an estoppel against asserting its invalidity." Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., supra. See, also, Colby v. Title Ins. Co., 160 Cal. 632, 117 P. 913, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 515; MacRae v. Heath, 60 Cal. App. 64, 72, 212 P. 228; Reilly v. Clyne, 27 Ariz. 432, 234 P. 35, 39, 40 A. L. R. 1005.

[8] The penalties prescribed by the Corporate Securities Act being all laid on the seller and none on the buyer, and the statute being for the benefit and protection of buyers, the parties are not in pari delicto, and the buyer may have judgment for the money paid out by him under the illegal contract, and may have the contract, the stock certificates and promissory note given in payment of such stock canceled. Reilly v. Clyne, 27 Ariz. 432, 234 P. 35, 40, A. L. R. 1005; Karamanou v. Green Co., 80 N. H. 420, 124 A. 373; Vercellini v. U. S. I. Realty Co., 158 Minn. 72, 196 N. W. 672; Edward v. Ioor, 205 Mich. 617, 172 N. W. 620, 15 A. L. R. 256; Landwehr v. Lingenfelder (Mo. App.) 249 S. W. 723; Reno v. Am. Ice Machine Co., supra. The foundation of the right of the plaintiff to recover in these cases, although a party to the illegal contract, is the rule of the common law declared by Lord Mansfield in Browning v. Morris, 2 Cowp. 790, 98 Eng. Reprint 1364 (quoted from in the Arizona and New Hampshire cases, supra), as follows:

"The rule is, in pari delicto potior est conditio defendantis. * * * Where the contract is executed, and the money paid in pari delicto, this rule * * * certainly holds * * * and the party who has paid it cannot recover it. * * * For instance, in bribery, if a man pays a sum of money by way of a bribe, he can never recover it in an action; because both plaintiff and defendant are equally criminal. But, where contracts or transactions are prohibited by positive statutes, for the sake of protecting one set of men from another set of men; the one from their situation and condition, being liable to be oppressed or imposed upon by the other; there, the parties are not in pari delicto; and in furtherance of these statutes, the person injured, after the transaction is finished and completed, may bring his action and defeat the contract."

In Reilly v. Clyne, supra, it is said:

"The complaining party is especially protected by the law where the agreement is not illegal per se but is merely prohibited. * * * The purpose of the Blue Sky Laws is to protect the public against imposition. The defendant was one of the public for whose benefit the law was enacted."

And in Irwin v. Curie, 171 N. Y. 409, 64 N. E. 161, 58 L. R. A. 830, the court says:

"It is safe to assume that whenever the statute imposes a penalty upon one party and none upon the other, they are not to be regarded as pari delictum."

And in Edward v. Ioor, supra, the court uses this language:

"It is very material that the statute itself, by the distinction it makes, has marked the criminal; for the penalties are all on one side."

In contravention of the rule announced in the authorities quoted, appellants have cited us to Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock Co., 189 Cal. 475, 209 P. 36, as holding that a buyer of stock sold in violation of the Blue Sky Law (St. 1917, p. 673) is in pari delicto with the seller. That case is not authority for such a broad rule, and the law therein stated is confined to the facts of that case and is therefore distinguishable from the present case. That it was not understood as laying down such a broad rule is apparent, for subsequent to the decision in the Domenigoni Case, which was decided in 1922, the Supreme Court in 1925 denied a petition for a transfer in Reno v. American Ice Machine Co., supra. In the Domenigoni Case the record shows that the corporation was organized for the purpose of lending money upon the security of live stock as an instrument of mutual aid among stock men, and by selling 190,000 shares of its capital stock at $10 per share, as permitted by the corporation commissioner, a fund of approximately $1,900,000 would be created for lending purposes. Domenigoni's acquiring stock through the medium of his "myself" notes instead of cash was in the nature of a fraud upon the other purchasers of stock who paid cash. Domenigoni conspired with the corporation to do a wrong to the other buyers—the very class of persons the Blue Sky Law was designed to protect.

[9] But even though respondents had been in pari delicto, as they withdrew from the illegal contract while it was still executory, they were in a position to reclaim the money paid (Smith v. Bach, supra), and further, even though the locus poenitentiae had gone, nevertheless the respondents having, as found by the court, been induced to contract through the fraud of appellants, they are not deemed in pari delicto. Webb v. Fulchire, 25 N. C. 485, 40 Am. Dec. 419; Woodward Quasi Contracts, § 141.

Appellants urge that the 2,200 shares of treasury stock had no value. Whether a covenant is of value or is valueless is to be determined by the appetite of the contracting parties. 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 19. "The slightest consideration is sufficient to support the most onerous obligation; the inadequacy, as has been well said, is for the parties to consider at the time of making the agreement, and not for the court when it is sought to be enforced. It is competent for the parties to make whatever contracts they please." 13 C. J. 365, and cases cited. Here the testimony of Tatterson, Maurer, and Gross is direct to the effect that if the treasury stock had not been included they would not have signed the contract with the Kehrleins, and appellant Oliver Kehrlein in his testimony admitted that the issuance of the treasury stock was indispensable to the signing of the contract.

[10] There is no merit in appellants' contention that, although the issuances of the 2,200 shares of treasury stock might be bad, yet the transfer of the 2,800 shares of outstanding stock was good, and that the bad can be severed from the good—that the contract is only partially illegal.

There is a distinction between partially illegal contracts and partially unenforceable contracts. This distinction is noted in Nicholson v. Ellis, 110 Md. 322, 73 A. 17, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 942, 132 Am. St. Rep. 445, in a case involving a covenant in restraint of trade. There the court says:

"Contracts in" undue "restraint of trade are loosely spoken of as 'illegal contracts.' It would be more accurate to style them 'unenforceable contracts.' * * * Even if it [the trade restraint covenant] be illegal as against public policy, it contains nothing contrary to good morals, and nothing for which a legal penalty is incurred [italics ours], and therefore it does not taint the whole agreement so as to render it void in toto. As was said by Chief Baron Pollock in Green v. Price, 13 Mees & W. 695: 'It is not like a contract to do an illegal act. It is merely a covenant which the law will not enforce, but the party may perform if it chooses.'"

In this state it is the rule that if any part of the consideration of a contract is illegal, the contract is wholly void. In Teachout v. Bogy, 175 Cal. 481, 166 P. 319, the court uses this language:

"If any part of a single consideration for one or more promises be illegal, or if there are several considerations for one promise, some of which are legal and others illegal, the promise is wholly void, as it is impossible to say which part or which one of the considerations induced the promise. Thus if the consideration for a note or other promise to pay a certain sum of money be the sale of goods, some of which it is legal and some which it is illegal to sell, the note or promise cannot be enforced." 9 Cyc. 566. See, also, 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 248; Moffatt v. Bulson, 96 Cal. 112, 30 P. 1022, 31 Am. St. Rep. 192; Vulcan Powder Co. v. Hercules Powder Co., 96 Cal. 510, 31 P. 581, 31 Am. St. Rep. 242; Humboldt Co. v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 P. 324.)"

In the present case "every part of the consideration goes * * * to the whole promise and therefore, if any part of it is contrary to public policy, the whole promise falls." Hazelton v. Shekells, 202 U. S. 71, 26 S. Ct. 567, 50 L. Ed. 939, 6 Ann. Cas. 217. See, also, Prost v. More, 40 Cal. 347; Mission Brewing Co. v. Rickert, 39 Cal. App. 668, 179 P. 720; Teachout v. Bogy, supra.

[11] As to the findings of fraud and the dual secret agency of Gross, the evidence shows that Gross had been in the employ of appellants almost continuously from July 1, 1921, until the purchase contract of September, 1923, in charge of the exploitation and promotion work of the Franklin Amusement Corporation in the operation of the Franklin Theater. The appellants were experienced theater operators, a dozen theaters having been bought and sold by them. Oliver Kehrlein managed the Franklin Theater from the time that the Kehrleins bought the corporation stock in September, 1918, until September, 1923. Tatterson and Maurer were in the automobile stage business, wholly inexperienced in the theater business, and Gross first met Tatterson in May, 1923, and Maurer in July, 1923; the meeting with Tatterson occurring through the solicitation of theater screen advertising from him by Gross. During the time of Gross' employment, appellants had changed managers of the theater, and Gross had complained to Oliver Kehrlein because the latter had not given the former the appointment; Kehrlein testified that in his opinion Gross was a good publicity and exploitation man, but not competent to manage the theater. Gross conceived the idea of finding a buyer of the corporation, and becoming manager for the new owner. Gross asked Oliver Kehrlein if he would sell, and the latter said he would. Kehrlein testified:

"The idea of selling stock to Tatterson, Maurer, and Gross first came to me in June, 1923, when Gross came to me. I knew that Gross was seeking to buy from me on behalf of Tatterson and Maurer when he first informed me before I went to Alaska."

When Gross learned that Kehrlein would sell, he began endeavors to sell to Tatterson. A few weeks prior to the time that Gross first broached the subject of sale, the appellants had optioned "all of the capital stock" of the corporation to one Eckstein, at a price of $52,500. Eckstein did not go through with the deal. It was a few weeks later that

Gross approached Kehrlein. Kehrlein testified:

"Gross asked me how much do you want for your theater, and I said I would like to get about $55,000 for it."

Gross stated that he would expect a selling commission from appellants. Gross testified:

"I asked Kehrlein what I was going to get out of the transaction, and he told me that he would not name any specific sum, because he did not know how the deal would work out, and on what terms the deal would be consummated, and how much cash he would get, and therefore he was not in any position to state any definite sum, but to go ahead and do my best and he would take care of me in the end."

Gross then fixed the price terms on which the sale was ultimately made—$10,000 down and $700 a month until $90,000 was paid, with interest at 7 per cent. on deferred payments.

Hence the situation was that Gross was "to go ahead and do his best" for the Kehrleins and receive a commission, the size of which depended on how good a deal he made for the Kehrleins. Upon being named a selling price of $55,000, he proposed and induced respondents, with whom he was to be associated in the business and who were to give him a third interest because of his experience and who reposed confidence in him and trusted him, to contract to pay for the stock $90,000. Oliver Kehrlein also testified that "he (Gross) conveyed the impression to me that I was to retain the stores." These were the two stores that ultimately under the contract of sale the buyers caused the corporation to sublet to the Kehrleins for $1 per year, and which Kehrlein testified: "I was planning to get $250 or $300 a month for 10 years in exchange for a dollar a year." Adding the profit to the Kehrleins of these stores at Oliver Kehrlein's lowest estimate of $3,000 per year to the contract, Gross secured for them considerably in excess of $100,000 for the corporation stock which they were willing to sell and had shortly before contracted to sell for $52,500. This evidence is sufficient to support the finding that Gross was secretly the agent of appellants.

[12] In support of their contention that the evidence does not support the finding of fraud and misrepresentation as inducing respondents to enter into the contract, appellants cite Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 250, 8 S. Ct. 882, 31 L. Ed. 678, quoted approvingly in Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 318, 75 P. 901, holding that to justify a court of equity in setting aside a contract on the ground of fraud "the complainant must show by clear and decisive proof: First, that the defendant has made a representation in regard to a material fact; secondly, that such representation is false; thirdly, that such representation was not actually believed by the defendant; * * * fourthly, that it was made with intent that it should be acted on; fifthly, that it was acted on by complainant to his damage; and, sixthly, that in so acting on it the complainant was ignorant of its falsity, and reasonably believed it to be true."

Without further lengthening this already lengthy discussion of the numerous questions presented, it may be said that the facts in the record showing fraud and misrepresentation measure up to the standard quoted from Southern Development Co. v. Silva. Aside from the testimony set out, the record shows that appellants represented to respondents Tatterson and Maurer through Gross, whom the court found to be the secret agent of appellants, that the theater of the Franklin Amusement Corporation had always been a paying business, that they had made a great deal of money out of moving pictures, and that the corporation was free of all debt, when as a matter of fact the theater had been a losing venture during all of the time appellants had conducted it and was not free from debt. This the books of the company disclosed when produced at the trial, which books appellants refused to permit respondents to inspect until they were produced in court, as also is this loss disclosed by the income tax returns made for the corporation by appellants as its officers. These misrepresentations respondents testified were not discovered by them until the date of serving the notice of rescission.

[13] Appellants, however, urge that respondents have not acted promptly upon discovering the misrepresentations, and that therefore the notice of rescission was too late, and point to Gratz v. Schuler, 25 Cal. App. 117, 142 P. 899, as laying down a rule of law which, if applicable to the facts in the present case, would require a holding here that the notice of rescission was not served with sufficient promptness. In Gratz v. Schuler, the representation was that a certain business (the exhibition of a panorama) had been earning $20 a day, while the first exhibition by the buyers brought in receipts of only $12.50, the second exhibition brought in but 75 cents, and the third but 15 cents. While the court did say, "The result of the single exhibition given by the plaintiff prior to the payment of the purchase price should have been sufficient, we think, to put him upon further inquiry concerning the past earning capacity of the Panorama," the court, however, further says: "The evidence clearly and without conflict shows that the plaintiff did not rely upon and was not deceived by the statement that the panorama had been earning twenty dollars per day while owned and operated by the defendants," and the fact that he was not deceived by the misrepresentation was the basis for the decision in that case. There the facts are not analogous to the facts here. The policy of the theater in the present case was changed to a secondrun house to handle it more economically and with less capital, which change was known to appellants.

When Gross first approached Oliver Kehrlein in the original negotiations, he went to Kehrlein with a slip of paper containing an estimate of expense for running the house on a second-run principle and went over the figures with him.

Oliver Kehrlein testified that it takes a certain length of time to initiate the patrons of a theater in a change of policy, and that the Franklin Theater covered a certain particular area; that it was not a neighborhood theater. The operation of the theater by respondents resulted in losses week by week for nearly the whole of the twenty weeks from October 14, 1923, to March 1, 1924. Oliver Kehrlein gave plausible explanations to Tatterson and Maurer concerning the losses. Maurer testified:

"I used to meet Mr. Kehrlein in the office in the mornings, and we discussed with him why the business was falling off, and he said, 'You know that the street is being torn up, and the building on the other corner is being erected,' and he says, 'The sidewalk is blocked.' He says: 'You have got to just keep up. You will come out all right. Just sit pretty.'"

Tatterson testified:

"Mr. Kehrlein explained that the excavation across the street and the opening of 15th street, and the fact of the building on the Alameda County Title Insurance Company building, and other obstructions, were responsible for the losses."

Tatterson further testified:

"I said nothing to Kehrlein or any one representing him, and did not intimate to him that I had been defrauded, because the things that were brought to my attention about the street opening and the building at the other corner seemed to be plausible reasons. I had been in business before when things were not always rosy, and I was hopeful that the excuses that were given was the real trouble, and that the people would come, but they never came and that is all there is to it."

The losses continuing, Oliver Kehrlein advised respondents to change the theater back to a first-run house. This change back to a first-run house was made after four weeks of losses as a second-run house. When appellants took the theater back on March 1, 1924, they changed it to a third-run house.

Under these circumstances, Gratz v. Schuler, supra, is inapplicable. Respondents lost no rights in the operation of the Franklin Theater for a period of 20 weeks, inasmuch as it would require an averaging over a period of a number of weeks' operation to determine what a motion picture house would do under the change of policy, and Oliver Kehrlein kept constantly in touch with the buyers and continually gave what, to the buyers, were plausible reasons for the continuance of the losses week after week. Of course, if respondents had had access to the true records of Franklin Amusement Corporation, the truth would have been disclosed to them at once, but the court found, and the evidence supports the finding, that those records were withheld from respondents for the purpose of concealing information from them.

Respondents were never fully or at all apprised of their rights, nor did they have sufficient or any knowledge of the truth constituting their title to relief prior to the time they served their notice of rescission on February 29, 1924. Tatterson testified:

"After me and my associates took possession of the Franklin Theater, we lost money at once during the first four weeks of our operation but no suspicion entered my mind that the business was not as it had been represented."

Maurer testified:

"I first discovered that we had been defrauded about the last part of February, 1924—February 29th. I had no suspicion prior to that time that we had been defrauded. We weren't in the theater long enough to find out, we hadn't run it long enough and could not tell whether the business paid."

Tatterson thus described now the conclusion finally formed in his mind that he had been defrauded:

"I first discovered that I had been defrauded some time in the latter part of February—I should say about the 27th or 28th. I had not discovered it prior to that time. We needed the books in order to make tax returns to the Government and had been asking for the books so we could make proper report, and the place had been represented as free and clear and we had just been attached for a bill for the Kehrleins, and when the books were again refused I concluded there was something rotten in Denmark and declined to go any further. It was about the 27th or 28th of February, or the 26th, that I last asked for the books so we could make up the tax reports."

This evidence supports the finding that plaintiffs Tatterson and Maurer did not discover the falsity of the representations until after February 25, 1924, and never waived their right to rescind the contract.

This disposes of the questions raised, and from what has been said it follows that we find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte HALL. (Cr. 1553.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 31, 1927.

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 114—Prior conviction for same offense in police court held to authorize punishment for second offense, though conviction was in municipal court supplanting police court.

In complaint in municipal court charging violation of Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), allegation of prior conviction in "police court of the city of Los Angeles" held to justify imposition of penalty as for a second offense, though police court had ceased to exist on day previous to former conviction, which actually took place in municipal court.

2. Courts $\S$ 118—Jurisdiction and functions of court rather than its name determine its character.

Character of court is determined by its jurisdiction and functions rather than by its name.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1202(5)—Verdicts submitted in prosecution for second offense, held insufficient in failing to require jury to determine truth of charge (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1158).

In prosecution for second offense under Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), form of verdicts submitted, reciting "Verdict as to judgment in complaint No. 03016" and in "complaint No. 05923" held insufficient for failure to require jury to find that charge of former conviction is "true" or "not true" as required by Pen. Code, $\S$ 1158.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1202(5)—Form of verdict in prosecution for second offense should require direct answer as to truth of charge of former conviction (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1158).

Verdict in prosecution for second offense should be in such form as to provide for direct answer as to whether charge of former conviction is true or untrue under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1158.

5. Habeas corpus $\S$ 92(1)—Evidence at trial may not be considered in proceeding for habeas corpus after conviction.

In habeas corpus proceeding to secure petitioner's release from custody after conviction, court may not go into evidence introduced before trial court.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1202(5)—Verdict of guilty as to alleged previous offense does not support conviction as second offense (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1158).

In prosecution for second offense under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1158, defendant's guilt as to previous offense of which he was charged to have been convicted is immaterial, only issue being his conviction of such offense, and verdict of guilty as to previous offense does not support conviction as for second offense.

7. Criminal law §1202(5)—Verdicts in prosecution for second offense, entitled "Verdict Possession," held sufficient to permit conviction as for first offense; verdicts as to prior conviction being insufficient (Wright Act).

In prosecution for second offense under Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), verdict rendered bearing caption "Verdict Possession" held sufficient to enable court to render judgment as for a first offense, where verdicts on question of prior conviction were insufficient to sustain conviction as for second offense.

Application by Frank Hall for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles, to secure petitioner's release from custody after a conviction for violation of the Wright Act. Petitioner remanded to custody, with directions.

A. T. Folsom, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. J. Lickley, City Prosecutor, and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Dep. City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. Hearing on writ of habeas corpus. There are but two issues involved. The first point is whether an allegation in a complaint in the municipal court, alleging a prior conviction in the "police court of the city of Los Angeles" on a day after such police court had ceased to exist, is a sufficient allegation of a judgment of prior conviction in the municipal court of said city to justify the court in imposing a penalty as for a second offense; and, second, Are the verdicts rendered in the form "guilty of the offense charged" a sufficient finding of the truth of the allegation of a prior conviction, when the former action is referred to in the verdicts only by the number of each case, and the judgment in each former case is before the jury as an exhibit, but in the complaint in the action in which the petitioner is being now held in custody is referred to only by date of convictions and not by number?

[1, 2] As to the first issue, the fact is that the municipal court has and had at the dates alleged in the complaint all the powers of the former police court of the city of Los Angeles, and in addition thereto other powers granted by the Constitution. The allegation that there had been a conviction of the defendant in the "police court of the city of Los Angeles" was, to say the least, a careless way of making the allegation, but we have concluded that it is legally sufficient. The jurisdiction and functions rather than the name of the court determine its character. City of Colton v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 257 P. 909.

tion of a prior conviction, the amended minutes of the municipal court, as shown by the return to the writ herein, together with the forms of verdict which on their face contain the words, "Verdict as to judgment in complaint No. 03016" in one instance, and, in the other instance, "Verdict as to judgment in complaint No. 05923," are not sufficient, in substance, to show that the jury intended to find that former conviction was an established fact. The requirement of the Penal Code, § 1158, on such an issue, is that the jury shall find that the charge of former conviction is "true" or that it is "not true."

The form of these verdicts should have provided a direct answer to the question. But the complaint in this action does not mention action No. 03016 or No. 05923. We would have to examine the evidence before we could ascertain whether those are the actions as to which former convictions are alleged in the complaint. But we are precluded upon a hearing of this kind from going into the evidence introduced before the trial court. In re Jacobs, 175 Cal. 661, 166 P. 801; In re Horr, 177 Cal. 721, 171 P. 801; In re Williams, 183 Cal. 11, 190 P. 163. We cannot say that there has been any finding by the jury as required by section 1158 of the Penal Code.

[6] Even if we were allowed to examine the evidence and exhibits filed herein, we could not say from an inspection of the two verdicts which bear the words, "Verdict as to judgment in complaint No. 03016," and "Verdict as to judgment in complaint No. 05923," that the jury had found that the defendant had suffered a prior conviction, as such verdicts on their face only show that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged in those two complaints, and the jury failed, and apparently refused, to find whether he had ever been found guilty of the crimes which they say he committed. In other words, it is immaterial to any issue in the instant case whether he was guilty or not guilty of the crimes charged in those other complaints, but only is it material herein whether or not he suffered a conviction therein. The absence of any finding of prior conviction leaves the principal verdict standing alone as a conviction upon a first offense.

[7] In case of a conviction under the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) of a first offense, the court is prevented from ordering any imprisonment except only as an alternative for payment of a fine. Therefore the judgment rendered herein for straight imprisonment was a judgment fixing a penalty which was beyond the power of the court to invoke. The verdict rendered in the instant case, known as verdict No. 08393, which bears the caption, "Verdict Possession," is a sufficient verdict for the court to render a judgment as for a first offense.

Therefore the prisoner is ordered remanded to custody, and it is directed that he be returned into the trial court in order that proper judgment may be rendered.

AMERICAN MUT. LIABILITY INS. CO. v. CHICAGO-LOS ANGELES BLDG. CORPORATION. (Civ. 4644.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 11, 1928.

1. Account stated ⇐1—Account stated presupposes absolute acknowledgment or admission of certain sum due or adjustment of accounts, striking of balance, or assent to correctness thereof.

An "account stated" presupposes an absolute acknowledgment or admission of certain sum due or adjustment of accounts between parties, striking of balance, or assent, express or implied, to correctness of balance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Account Stated.]

2. Account stated ⇐5—Definite acknowledgment of debt in amount specified or definitely ascertainable by reference to something is prerequisite to account stated.

To constitute account stated, there must be a clear and definite acknowledgment of debt and a specification of amount due or reference to something by which amount can be definitely and certainly ascertained.

3. Account stated ⇐5—Stipulation that plaintiff demanded payment of sum claimed and that defendant disputed, refused to pay, and did not acknowledge claim disproved account stated.

Stipulation that demand was made by plaintiff on defendant for payment of sum claimed, that such claim was disputed by defendant, and that defendant refused to pay it and did not acknowledge claim, clearly showed that no account was stated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by the American Mutual Liability Insurance Company against the Chicago-Los Angeles Building Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John D. Home, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. This was an action on an alleged account stated in the sum of $655.67. The answer denied that defendant, the appellant herein, became indebted to plaintiff on an account stated or otherwise in said or any sum, or that any sum was owing or unpaid from defendant to plaintiff. No other issue was presented by the pleadings.

A stipulation of facts was made by the parties and was considered by the lower court, in which stipulation the parties agreed, among other things, that plaintiff "had demanded of the defendant the sum of $655.67, claiming the same was due upon a policy * * * of compensation insurance issued by plaintiff, as insurer, to defendant, as insured, under which plaintiff insured defendant as employer against liability under the Workmen's Compensation Law, and that at all times after the making of such demand, defendant had refused to pay the same, or acknowledge liability therefor; * * * that the said amount of $655.67 was the correct amount * * * without having deducted the dividend which defendant claimed on account of the participating clause (in the policy); that defendant had notified plaintiff that it was entitled to an accounting under the clause of said policy providing for participation by the insured in the earnings of the insurer, but that such right to an accounting had been at all times disputed by plaintiff on the ground that it was not permitted to allow any such participation on account of said policy, by reason of the provisions of section 602b of the Political Code of the state of California."

The facts that demand was made by plaintiff upon defendant for the payment of the sum claimed, that the claim was disputed by defendant, that defendant refused to pay it, and that there was no acknowledgment by defendant of the claim are established by the stipulation.

Defendant (appellant) contends that "the court erred in making its finding that the defendant accepted and acquiesced in the demand or account stated sued upon," and that "the court erred in finding that the sum of $655.67 became due, owing and unpaid." The question to be determined is whether an account was stated between the parties.

[1-3] Our courts have uniformly held that:

"An account stated presupposes an absolute acknowledgment or admission of a certain sum due or adjustment of accounts between the parties, the striking of a balance, or an assent, express or implied, to the correctness of the balance. If the acknowledgment or admission is qualified and not absolute, or if there is but an admission that something is due without specifying how much, there is no account stated, nor does an account stated exist if there is but a partial settlement of accounts without arriving at a balance, or if there is a dissent from the balance as struck." 1 Corpus Juris, p. 695, par. 287; Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 556 [37 P. 504]. Craig v. Lee, 36 Cal. App. 335, 171 P. 1089.

"There must be a clear and definite acknowledgment of the debt, a specification of the amount due, or a reference to something by which such amount can be definitely and certainly ascertained." [Citing cases.] Outwaters v. Brownlee, 22 Cal. App. 535, at page 539, 135 P. 300; Merchants' National Bank v. Carmichael, 178 Cal. 446, at page 448, 173 P. 999; Ah Tong v. Earle Fruit Co., 112 Cal. 679, at page 682, 45 P. 7; Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, at page 63, 15 P. 371.

It clearly appears that no account was stated.

The judgment is reversed.

AZADIAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 5862.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 11, 1928.

1. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 150(2)—Where divorce judgment is granted by default, findings of fact are unnecessary.

Where defendant in divorce action neither answers complaint nor appears in the action, on the granting of an interlocutory decree no findings of fact are necessary.

2. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 153(1)—"Rendition of judgment," within statute relating to vacation thereof, occurred when court's order for judgment was entered in official minutes (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

"Rendition of judgment," within Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that the lower court may relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, and that, if summons was not served on defendant, court may allow defendant to answer it at any time within one year after the rendition of judgment, held to be when court's order for judgment was entered in official minutes, and not when judgment was finally entered.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Rendition of Judgment.]

3. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 161—Superior Court held without jurisdiction to vacate default and set aside divorce judgment on motion made more than year from rendition, though within year from entry of judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, superior court held without jurisdiction to vacate default and set aside divorce judgment on motion made over a year from the rendition of the judgment though the motion was made within a year from the date judgment was entered.

Application for certiorari by Henry Azadian against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles, and H. S. Gans, a Judge thereof, to review an order vacating default and setting aside an interlocutory decree of divorce obtained in an action between petitioner and Alma Azadian. Order annulled.

Charles G. Young, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Charles L. Nichols and R. H. Purdue, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. Certiorari. The salient facts upon which the temporary writ herein was issued appear to be that on August 18, 1926, in an action for divorce pending between petitioner and his wife, Alma Azadian, wherein the default of said defendant for her failure to answer the complaint, or to appear therein, had been entered, the superior court caused to be entered on its official minutes an order granting to petitioner an interlocutory judgment of divorce from said Alma Azadian; that on August 24, 1926, such interlocutory judgment was entered; and that more than one year after the order for judgment, to wit, on the 23d day of August, 1927, on a motion made by the defendant, based upon the grounds of her surprise and excusable neglect, the superior court made an order vacating the default of the defendant and setting aside said interlocutory decree of divorce between said parties.

Among other things, section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains a provision that the lower court may relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, provided that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment was rendered; but that —

"* * * When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action."

It appearing that the summons in the divorce action was not "personally served on the defendant," the precise point presented to this court for its determination is whether the lower court had jurisdiction to vacate the default of the defendant and to set aside its judgment more than one year after the order for such judgment was entered on its official minutes.

It will be noted that the statute provides, in substance, that such an order may be made at any time within one year after the rendition of the judgment. In that connection, respondents concede that ordinarily the rendition of a judgment occurs when it is entered in the minutes of the court, and that the time for seeking relief under the statute (section 473, Code Civ. Proc.) begins to run from the time when the judgment was so entered.

In the Estate of Wood, 137 Cal. 129, 133, 69 P. 900, 901, the court had occasion to consider the meaning of the word "rendered" as used in another section of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, in passing upon the matter, used the following language:

"* * * The meaning of the word 'rendered' as applied to decrees and judgments is well settled, and when a decree or judgment is rendered it has full force and effect. Even the entry of it does not go to its validity. It has full force and effect regardless of the mere ministerial act of entering it upon the judgment book. Mr. Freeman in his work on Judgments declares (volume 1, § 38): 'Expressions occasionally find their way into reports and text-books indicating that the entry is essential to the existence and force of the judgment. These expressions have escaped from their authors when writing of matters of evidence, etc. * * * The rendition of a judgment is a judicial act; its entry upon the record is merely ministerial. A judgment is not what is entered, but what is ordered and considered. The entry may express more or less than what was ordered by the court, or it may be neglected altogether, yet in neither of these cases is the judgment of the court any less its judgment than though it were accurately entered. * * * It is therefore not indispensable to the validity of an execution, and a sale made thereunder, that a judgment should have been actually entered before the writ issued.' See, also, Estate of Hughston, 133 Cal. 321 [65 P. 742, 1039]. This principle of law applies even with more force to decrees in probate and equity. And this court has held more than once that when a decree of divorce is rendered that decree is of full force and effect. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 221 [16 P. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146]; In re Cook, 77 Cal. 232 [17 P. 923, 19 P. 431, 1 L. R. A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267]; In re Cook, 83 Cal. 417 [23 P. 392]."

In the case entitled In re Cook, 83 Cal. 415, 23 P. 392, it is held that a judgment of divorce is effective to dissolve the marital tie when the order for judgment is rendered and entered upon the minutes. In the case of Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 109 P. 91, the authorities are reviewed and in effect it is held that the judgment is rendered when it is entered in the official minutes of the court; and the same declaration of the law is to be found in the language of the opinion in the case of Aspegren & Co. v. Sherwood, Swan & Co., 199 Cal. 532, 537, 250 P. 400, 402, as follows:

"These several authorities indicate the rule to be that whenever findings are required the judgment is not rendered until they are signed and filed. But, whenever findings are waived or are not required the judgment is rendered when entered in the minutes of the court. With this rule we are in accord."

[1] In accordance with part of the law as announced in the Aspegren Case, 199 Cal. 532, 537, 250 P. 400, it is urged by respondents that the principle to which reference has been had applies in those cases only where no findings of fact are required. But, conceding the existence of such an exception to the rule, the result would be unaffected thereby. Waldecker v. Waldecker, 178 Cal. 566, 174 P. 36, is authority to the effect that in an action for divorce, where it appears that the defendant neither answered the complaint, nor appeared in the action, on the denial of a decree no findings of fact are necessary. To the same effect, see Cal. Jur. vol. 24, p. 950, and cases cited; Hamblin v. Superior Court, 195 Cal. 364, 370, 233 P. 337, 43 A. L. R. 1509; Shepard v. Shepard, 65 Cal. App. 310, 314, 223 P. 1012; Hittson v. Stanich (Cal. App.) 258 P. 405.

[2, 3] In the instant case it becomes clear that when the order of the court for judgment was entered in its official minutes the decree was rendered; and as more than one year elapsed after such rendition of the judgment before the motion was made by the defendant in the action to vacate the default and to set aside the interlocutory decree, it follows that the court was without jurisdiction in the premises; from which it finally results that the order of the lower court should be annulled.

So ordered.

SENEY v. PICKWICK STAGES, NORTH-
ERN DIVISION, Inc. (Civ. 5738.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 10, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 8, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇐800—Failure to file transcript in time held not ground for dismissing appeal, where transcript was on file at time of notice to dismiss (Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal rule 5).

Failure of appellant to file transcript within time required by law held not available as ground for dismissal of appeal, where transcript was actually on file at time notice to dismiss was given under Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal rule 5.

2. Appeal and error ⇐653(1)—Appellate court may direct amendment of record to show true situation.

Appellate court has inherent power to direct lower court to so amend its certificate or settlement of the record on appeal as to make it speak the truth.

3. Appeal and error ⇐640—Failure to secure certificate and settlement of transcript of testimony on first trial, which counsel stipulated might be annexed to record on second trial, held not to require dismissal of appeal.

Where second trial of action was had partly on basis of testimony introduced at first trial, transcript of which counsel stipulated could be introduced in evidence and annexed to transcript of testimony taken at second trial and settled as transcript on appeal, omission of counsel to procure reporter's certificate or settlement of transcript of testimony on first trial held not to require dismissal of appeal, since appellate court, under circumstances, could direct an amendment of the record to have such testimony certified to, and settled by, the trial judge.

Action by Hattie L. Seney against the Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, Inc., for personal injuries. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. On defendant's motions to dismiss the appeal and affirm the judgment. Motions denied.

See, also, 255 P. 279.

Edwin S. Earhart, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Warren E. Libby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This matter involves two separate motions; the first of which being a motion to dismiss an appeal, and the second being a motion to affirm the judgment rendered in the lower court.

In part, the ground specified in each of such motions is identical with the other, and consists of a contention on the part of respondent to the effect that the record on appeal was not certified by the shorthand reporter, or settled by the judge before whom the cause was tried. In the motion to dismiss the appeal, the additional ground is specified that the reporter's transcript was not filed "within the time required by law."

[1] As affecting the ground last stated, rule 5 of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal contains the following:

"If the transcript of the record or appellant's points and authorities be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed on motion, upon notice given. If the transcript, or the points and authorities, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion. * * *

Although the register in the clerk's office discloses facts from which it may be concluded that the reporter's transcript was not originally filed "within the time required by law," it appears that the transcript was on file at the time the notice to dismiss the appeal was given. It follows that respondent may not avail itself of appellant's dereliction in the first instance.

[2, 3] With reference to the grounds that the reporter's transcript was not properly certified by the shorthand reporter who transcribed the testimony given at the trial, nor settled by the judge before whom the cause was tried, it appears that two cases were pending between the same parties; that, the first case having been tried, it was stipulated by respective counsel in substance that, so far as applicable on the trial of the second case, the transcript of the evidence produced in the first case might be used on the trial of the second case. It is also shown that other evidence, in addition to that produced on the trial of the first case, was introduced on the trial of the second case; that, in making up the record on appeal, that part of the evidence only which was actually produced at the trial of the second case independently of the transcript of the evidence in the first case was certified by the shorthand reporter and settled by the judge; and that, as to the remainder of the evidence, the parties stipulated as follows:

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the undersigned, attorneys of record for the respective parties in the above-entitled action, that the annexed and attached transcript of testimony taken in case No. 111521, wherein the above-named plaintiff was also plaintiff and the above-named defendant was also defendant, heretofore tried in the above-entitled court, is a full, true, complete, and correct transcript of the evidence taken in the trial of said case No. 111521; that said annexed and attached transcript is also a full, true, and correct and complete transcript of testimony heretofore submitted to the above-entitled court in the trial of the above-entitled action pursuant to and as provided for in that certain stipulation heretofore made and filed in the above-entitled action as dated April 4, 1924; that the evidence and testimony set forth and recited in said annexed and attached transcript, together with the oral and documentary evidence introduced at the trial of the above-entitled action, comprises and constitutes all of the evidence introduced before the court in trial of the above-entitled action, and which was considered by said court in rendering its judgment herein; that a copy of said stipulation of April 4, 1924, is contained in the clerk's transcript prepared in the above-entitled action; that said clerk's transcript, together with the reporter's transcript of the evidence introduced at the trial of the above-entitled action, together with the annexed and attached transcript of evidence in said case No. 111521, constitute a complete transcript of the proceedings and evidence in the above-entitled action resulting in judgment heretofore made and entered therein, and that the above-entitled court may attach this stipulation and the annexed transcript of testimony to the transcript in the above-entitled action and settle the same as the transcript on appeal in the above-entitled action."

The affidavit of the judge who presided at the trial of the second case shows that, by stipulation of the parties to the action, the evidence which was received in the former case was read and considered in evidence in the second case; that a date was set for the settlement of the transcript and record in the second case, which resulted in the first instance in the settlement of the transcript of the testimony which was actually given on the hearing of the second case; that, according to the recollection of the judge, he refused to settle the copy of the transcript of the evidence taken in the first case, for the reason that, in his opinion, it was necessary to incorporate the transcript in the first case in the transcript in the second case, or for respective counsel to stipulate that such transcript might be used without being so incorporated; that he was subsequently informed by counsel representing the plaintiff in the second action that he had secured such written stipulation, and that the transcript of the oral testimony taken in the second case might be settled; that he suggested to counsel that he would settle the transcript if the portions of the testimony considered in the first case were recopied, certified by the reporter, and presented for settlement, but that no such transcript as suggested by him was ever presented to him for settlement; and that he refused to settle the copy of the transcript filed in the first case for the reasons hereinbefore set forth.

The record herein further discloses the facts that, notwithstanding the stipulation by the parties, the reporter's transcript affecting such evidence was not certified by the shorthand reporter, nor settled by the judge, but that that part of the transcript which had been certified and settled was filed with the clerk of this court as a part of the record on appeal.

Respondent cites authorities to the effect that, in the absence of a properly authenticated transcript, notwithstanding a stipulation by the parties covering the situation, no record is presented upon which a reversal of the judgment of the lower court might be predicated, and consequently that this court is authorized to dismiss the appeal and affirm the judgment. 2 Cal. Jur. 608, 631. See, also, In re Barney, 191 Cal. 18, 214 P. 853. However, the later case of McMahon v. Hamilton (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 793, indicates in principle that the appellate court has the power to direct the lower court to so amend its certificate or settlement of the record on appeal as to make it speak the truth. In that case the court, in part, used the following language:

"We have concluded that our order of July 11, 1927, authorizing the withdrawal and amendment of the transcript herein in the particulars above referred to, was a proper exercise of our appellate jurisdiction. In so concluding we are not unmindful of the numerous authorities, many of which are relied upon by the appellant and moving party, which declare, and correctly so, that a trial court is without power to and may not amend a record to be used upon appeal more than six months after the same has been certified as a correct transcript of the proceedings had and taken in such court. Fountain Water Co. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 648, 73 P. 590; Baker v. Borello, 131 Cal. 615, 63 P. 914; Sprigg v. Barber, 118 Cal. 591, 50 P. 682. It is also well settled that a record authenticated by the trial court cannot be changed by an appellate court. Mendocino County v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 24, 27, 82 P. 1122, and authorities there cited. Our research has failed to disclose, however, any authoritative expression which would preclude this or any appellate court having jurisdiction over a record regularly on file, from authorizing the temporary withdrawal thereof at any time during the pendency of the appeal, so that the same might be corrected and amended in conformity to the direction of the appellate court. In such a case we are not confronted with a want of power or jurisdiction in the trial court, assuming the six months' period to have expired, but rather with the inherent power of an appellate court to cause the amendment of a record before it so that the same might speak the truth. The trial court in such a case receives its power to act in the premises from the order of the appellate court. That an appellate court may have a record before it amended so as to speak the truth has long since been the subject of judicial decision. Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 387, 396. In that case this court adopted with approval the following declaration from Johnson v. Whitlock, 13 N. Y. 344, 349 [3 Kern. 344]: 'If this statement has been imperfectly made, we have no doubt of the power of the Supreme Court to direct a re-settlement, and to reform the proceedings in any manner not inconsistent with the actual finding of the Judge or Referee upon the facts. The facts, as found, cannot be changed and found differently, nor can leave be had to insert exceptions never in fact taken, but within these limitations it will always be proper to move in the Supreme Court, not to turn the case into a bill of exceptions—a proceeding which has no existence under the Code—nor into a special verdict, but so to amend the case itself as to fitly present the questions which are to be examined in this court.' * * * It has repeatedly been held by this court that technical objections are not favored and that a record may and will, when necessary, be corrected unless a right of the adverse party is injuriously affected thereby. Cal. Wine Assoc. v. Commercial etc. Co., 159 Cal. 49, 53, 112 P. 858; Perri v. Beaumont [88 Cal. 108, 25 P. 1109]. Moreover, this court looks with favor upon an amendment the effect of which 'is simply to enable this court to review the decision of the lower court, in view of all the facts which that court had before it when it made such decision.' In re Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 408, 30 P. 568, 571."

In the instant case, the evidence produced in the first case was, by means of a transcript thereof, used in the trial of the second case. Clearly, it was the intention of the parties to the litigation that such evidence should be certified to and settled by the judge before whom the second case was tried, as a part of the record on appeal, and that it should be included within that part of such record as had already been settled by the judge. In such circumstances, and considering the inherent power of the court, as announced in the case of McMahon v. Hamilton (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 793, to direct the amendment of the record, it would seem that the respondent should not be permitted to prevail with reference to his motion to dismiss the appeal. The motion to affirm the judgment, being wholly dependent upon the granting of the motion to dismiss the appeal, necessarily fails as a result of the denial of the latter motion.

It is ordered that each of the motions be, and it is, denied.

COLLINS v. COMBS. (Civ. 5786.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 9, 1928.

1. Partnership ⇨120—Complaint held to state action for contribution, based on special agreement between partners to wind up business.

Complaint, alleging agreement of partners to dissolve and wind up business, and that plaintiff would collect and sell assets, and from funds liquidate partnership obligations, and that obligations exceeded assets, and that plaintiff paid difference, and defendant was liable for one-half excess, held to state action for contribution based on special agreement, it being unnecessary to allege therein defendant's agreement to pay share of excess of liabilities over assets; promise therefor being implied.

2. Partnership ⇨120—Complaint for contribution between partners held not demurrable, where payment by defendant of his share of deficit was only remaining business.

Complaint by one partner against another to recover one-half excess of liabilities over assets in liquidation of firm's business paid by plaintiff held good as against general demurrer, where complaint showed that all firm's assets were disposed of, and obligations liquidated, and payment by defendant of his share of deficit was only remaining business of the firm.

3. Trial ⇨396(3)—Finding that one of original partners sold interest to plaintiff and defendant, who equally assumed payment of firm's debts, held within issues in action for contribution.

In action by partner who liquidated firm's business to recover from remaining partner one-half excess paid by him in liquidating firm's obligations over amount received from sale of assets, finding that original firm consisted of plaintiff, defendant, and B., but that B. sold his interest to plaintiff and defendant, who equally assumed payment of firm's debts at that time, held within issue as to members of partnership and their proportion of liability, notwithstanding complaint made no reference to B.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by Thomas Collins against G. B. Combs. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Raymond E. Hodge and P. N. McCloskey, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The appeal comes before us on the judgment roll alone.

The allegations of the complaint material to our discussion may be summarized as follows: That on or about the 10th day of February, 1920, plaintiff and defendant entered into a copartnership agreement for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing and selling crushed rock and sand at San Bernardino; that the defendant and plaintiff each, at the time of the formation of the copartnership, paid into the business the sum of $2,000; that the copartnership business continued for a period of about 22 months, until on or about the 10th day of December, 1922, when the plaintiff and defendant mutually agreed to discontinue the business and dissolve the copartnership; that, at the time it was agreed to discontinue the business and wind up the affairs of the copartnership, it was further mutually agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff would proceed to take possession of all of the assets of the copartnership, and collect all of the moneys owing to the copartnership; also to gather together all of the obligations owing by the copartnership; that the plaintiff was further authorized to sell all of the assets of the copartnership, and, from the funds belonging to the copartnership, liquidate all of the obligations of the copartnership; that, if any funds were left over from the assets of the copartnership, after paying all of its obligations, the plaintiff was to pay over to the defendant his full share of such excess. The complaint further alleges that, pursuant to the agreement to dissolve and wind up the affairs of the copartnership, the business was discontinued, and the plaintiff did collect all the moneys due the firm, and took possession of all of the equipment and personal property, and converted the same into cash; that the total amount of the funds thus acquired belonging to the copartnership was the sum of $12,002.76; that plaintiff paid all of the outstanding claims against the copartnership, which amounted to the sum of $16,089.56; that the total amount of the liabilities exceeded the total amount of the assets; and that the defendant was liable for one-half of such excess, which the defendant had refused to pay. Judgment is prayed for against the defendant for one-half of the amount which plaintiff alleges he was required to pay out in liquidating the obligations of the copartnership business over and above the total amount he received from the disposal of its assets.

A general and special demurrer filed to the complaint was overruled.

In his answer the defendant denies every material allegation contained in the complaint, except that he admitted that he had not paid the plaintiff the sum claimed by plaintiff as owing him. In addition to the denials, defendant's answer contains an affirmative defense, wherein it is alleged that in February of 1920, the copartnership which was then formed consisted of the plaintiff, defendant, and one L. E. Beckley, the three being owners of equal shares in the assets of said firm, and each to share equally in its profits and losses; that the defendant contributed to the copartnership in money and material a sum in excess of $400; that the amounts contributed by plaintiff and Beckley were unknown to the defendant; that, about two months after the copartnership was formed, Beckley sold and conveyed all of his interest in the copartnership business to the plaintiff, and, as a part of the consideration running from the plaintiff to Beckley, plaintiff agreed to assume the payment of the portion of the partnership indebtedness that was then owing by Beckley; that at all times since the withdrawal of Beckley from the copartnership the plaintiff was the owner of the two-thirds interest and share in the partnership business, while the defendant was the owner of only one-third interest in the copartnership business; that, after the withdrawal of Beckley from the copartnership in April of 1920, plaintiff and defendant were actively engaged in conducting the business until the month of May, 1920, at which time the defendant "ceased further active participation in said business, and said plaintiff assumed, and thereafter continued, the operation of said business without the assistance or presence of the defendant"; that on September 20, 1920, the business was discontinued, and, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, plaintiff sold and disposed of a portion of the assets of the copartnership; that in November or December following the plaintiff informed the defendant that he had disposed of a portion of the assets of the copartnership, and that he proposed to sell the remainder of the assets, and apply the proceeds derived therefrom toward the payment of the indebtedness owing by the firm; that the plaintiff did subsequently dispose of the assets, but that he has never made an accounting to the plaintiff for the money so received; and that the defendant had no knowledge of what disposition was made by the plaintiff of the moneys received from the sale of the assets of the firm. The defendant further alleges in his answer that the value of the assets of the firm was in excess of the obligations of the firm, and the prayer of the answer is "that plaintiff take nothing by reason of this action, and that he be henceforth dismissed, with his costs."

The court found in its findings of fact that during the month of January, 1920, plaintiff and defendant and L. E. Beckley formed the copartnership in question, each having an equal share in the business; that this copartnership continued until about the 10th day of February, 1920, at which time Beckley withdrew from the copartnership, and conveyed all of his right, title, and interest in the business and the assets of the copartnership to the plaintiff and defendant; that the consideration running to Beckley for his interest was the payment of $800 in cash, and the agreement by the plaintiff and defendant to pay the share of the indebtedness of the copartnership that Beckley would be liable for as a copartner; that at all times subsequent to the withdrawal of Beckley plaintiff and defendant constituted the copartnership, and were the owners of its property and assets in equal shares, and that the defendant at all times subsequent to the withdrawal of Beckley was liable for one-half of the obligations of the copartnership; that the plaintiff and the defendant continued to carry on and operated the copartnership business after the withdrawal of Beckley until December 1, 1922, at which time, by mutual consent, the business was closed, and the copartnership firm dissolved.

The court further specifically found that, at the time of the dissolution, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff should collect all moneys owing to the firm, take possession of all of the equipment and assets of the firm, and convert the same into cash; that he (the plaintiff) was to gather in all of the outstanding obligations of the copartnership, and, with the funds in his hands derived from the disposal of the assets of the firm, to liquidate all the firm's obligations, and on the final adjustment of the affairs of the firm, if any money remained in plaintiff's hands derived from the sale of the firm's assets after the payment of all of its obligations, plaintiff was to pay over to the defendant his share of such money. The findings further set forth that, pursuant to this agreement, plaintiff did take possession of all of the assets of the copartnership, and sold the personal property and equipment, and the total amount of funds he so became possessed of belonging to the copartnership amounted to the sum of $11,943.72; that plaintiff did pay and liquidate all of the claims against the copartnership, and paid out therefor the sum of $15,143.72; that there was an excess of obligations over assets, which amount had been paid by the plaintiff; and that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff by reason thereof in the sum of $1,500. The findings further negative all of the allegations of the answer, except such as were specifically found.

[1] Appellant urges as grounds for a reversal of the judgment: (a) That the demurrer to the complaint was erroneously overruled; (b) that the findings are outside of the issues, and do not sustain the judgment; (c) that the findings do not state an account; and (d) that the accounting was not complete.

In support of his first point appellant urges that the complaint is uncertain, in that it cannot be determined therefrom whether it is an action for a full accounting of all of the affairs of the copartnership, or a proceeding for contribution by the defendant under a special agreement of liquidation of the affairs of the copartnership; and he urges further that, if the action is construed as one for contribution, then the complaint does not state a cause of action, for the reason that it contains no allegation of a complete accounting had, and without such allegation an action for contribution cannot be maintained by one partner against another.

To this contention respondent replies that the action is one for contribution, based on a special agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant.

We are satisfied that respondent's contention on this point must be sustained. In fact, it would seem to us that the only reasonable interpretation of the complaint is that it is an action for contribution based upon an agreement between the parties. As we have heretofore set forth, the complaint contains all of the necessary allegations to support such an action. There may be allegations not necessary to support such an action. If so, they are nothing more than surplusage. While it is true the complaint does not specifically allege that the defendant, in the agreement for dissolving the copartnership, agreed to pay any share of the excess of liabilities over the assets, or that the plaintiff was authorized to make any such excess payment, in the event that the funds derived from the sale of assets were insufficient to pay the liabilities in full, such an allegation is not necessary in order to support an action for contribution, for the reason that either party was liable for all of the obligations of the copartnership, and a promise to pay his share of any deficit was implied in the agreement made by the defendant with the plaintiff to close up the business and liquidate the affairs of the copartnership. Sears v. Starbird, 78 Cal. 225, 20 P. 547; Kazman v. Light, 53 Cal. App. 732, 200 P. 768. Inasmuch as the complaint clearly sets forth an action for contribution under a special agreement, the special demurrer was properly overruled.

[2] The general demurrer was also properly overruled. It clearly appears from the complaint that all of the assets of the copartnership had been disposed of and all of its obligations liquidated. There only remained, for the purpose of winding up the affairs, the payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of his share of the deficit. Kazman v. Light, 53 Cal. App. 732, 200 P. 768.

[3] Appellant's next contention is that the "findings are outside the issues." The principal finding complained of recites that the original copartnership consisted of plaintiff, defendant, and one L. E. Beckley, but that Beckley sold out his interest in the copartnership to plaintiff and defendant for the sum of $800, and that, in the transaction, plaintiff and defendant equally assumed the payment of that portion of the firm's indebtedness that was owing at the time by the retiring Beckley. While it is true that the complaint makes no reference to Beckley, and the finding of fact differs from the allegation as to that point in the answer, the finding was well within the issues raised by the pleadings, as were other findings complained of. One of the material issues in the case was, Who constituted the copartnership and in what proportions did those liabilities exist? The findings go directly to the heart of the matter. The case of Simmons v. Simmons, 166 Cal. 438, 137 P. 20, is not in point. There, there was but one issue raised by both answer and complaint; namely, whether the property involved was or was not community property. The court, after finding that the property was not community property, went further, and made a finding that the plaintiff had loaned the defendant some money, and proceeded to render judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the amount of the loan. The court clearly went outside of any issue raised by the pleadings in determining that defendant owed the plaintiff $1,000.

We have carefully examined the findings, and we can find no merit in the contention that the findings are outside of the issues.

Two other points are urged by appellant; namely, "that the findings do not state an account," and, second, "that the accounting was not complete." Both of these propositions are discussed by appellant in his brief on the assumption that the action was one for an accounting. Inasmuch as we have already disposed of that contention in holding that the action is one for contribution, there would seem to be no occasion for a discussion of these last two points.

The judgment and orders are affirmed.

SHINDELAR et al. v. HADACHECK.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 13, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨931(3)—Where judgment was as prayed by complaint, case must be viewed as though court found facts alleged to be true and evidence supported findings.

Where judgment was as prayed by complaint and findings of fact and conclusions of law were waived, case must be viewed as though court had found all facts alleged in complaint to be true, and as though evidence fully supported such findings, since all intendments are in favor of upholding judgment.

2. Reformation of Instruments ⇨48—Decree reforming contract to state parties' intention as prayed by complaint was not reversible because it did not state exact form of contract.

Where decree in suit to reform contract directed that contract "be reformed to state true intention of parties to this action," as prayed by complaint, judgment would not be reversed because it did not expressly state exact form of contract when reformed.

3. Reformation of Instruments ⇨48—Decree reforming contract as prayed by complaint must be considered as reforming contract to recite definite consideration and describe land alleged in complaint.

Where decree in suit to reform contract and for specific performance directed that contract be reformed to state true intention of parties to action as prayed by complaint, decree must be considered as following pleadings and findings and as ordering reformation of contract so that it recited definite consideration alleged in complaint and described land alleged in complaint, so that objection that contract could not be specifically performed because consideration was not definite and because judgment awarded more land than was called for by agreement were without merit.

4. Reformation of Instruments ⇨36(3)—Complaint in suit to reform contract, reciting contract as written and stating alleged "real agreement" and intention of parties, sufficiently pleaded mutual mistake.

Complaint in suit to reform written contract, after reciting contract as written, stating an alleged "real agreement" and using language, "and intention of parties was," followed by statement of terms claimed to have been agreed upon by parties, sufficiently pleaded mutual mistake.

5. Specific performance ⇨32(1)—Defendant could be compelled to specifically perform land contract he did not sign (Civ. Code, § 3388).

As respects question of mutuality of obligation, under Civ. Code, § 3388, providing that party who has signed written contract may be compelled specifically to perform it though the other party has not signed it, defendant who did not sign land contract could be compelled to specifically perform it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action to reform contract and for specific performance by Matthew W. Shindelar and others against Amos F. Hadacheck. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
J. J. Hughes and Fred W. Morrison, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This is an action to reform a written contract and for its specific performance. Findings of fact and conclusions of law were waived. The decree rendered directs that the contract "be reformed to state the true intention of the parties to this action." Provision is then made for specific performance of the contract through the conveyance of the lots in question to the plaintiffs, and the cancellation of the defendant's notes theretofore filed in court, the principal of which aggregates $16,000, the remedy being that prayed in the complaint.

The contention of appellant, which has been most stressed, is that the remedy by specific performance will not be applied for the violation of an agreement unless, among other elements, the consideration is definite and certain. In the contract as originally written the consideration named was $10, "and other valuable consideration." However, this is one of the particulars in which the plaintiff asks that the contract be reformed. It is alleged that the true consideration as actually agreed between the parties was $16,000, to be paid by delivery to the defendant "of his promissory notes aggregating said amount that were then being held by said plaintiffs."

[1-3] The judgment is as prayed by the complaint. All intendments are in favor of upholding the judgment. The case is to be viewed as though the court had found all of the facts alleged in the complaint to be true and the evidence had fully supported such findings. Under such circumstances the judgment would not be reversed because it did not expressly state the exact form of the contract when reformed as prayed "to state the true intention of the parties." The judgment will be considered in that respect as following the pleadings and findings, and as ordering the reformation of the contract, so that it now recites the consideration alleged in the complaint and directed by the judgment itself to be rendered to the defendant. As thus reformed the contract is definite and certain, and the entire argument upon that subject has no application.

For the same reasons there is no merit to the assertion that the judgment awards more land than is called for by the agreement. The land described in the contract as reformed is identically the same as that decreed to be conveyed.

[4] Defendant claims that the complaint is insufficient in that there is no allegation of a mutual mistake of the parties. The complaint, after reciting the contract as written, states an alleged "real agreement," and uses the language, "and the intention of the parties was," followed by a statement of the terms claimed to have been agreed upon by the parties. We think these allegations sufficient to plead mutual mistake.

[5] There is no merit in the contention that because the appellant did not sign the contract there resulted a lack of mutuality of obligation, and that specific performance is not a proper remedy. In so far as this objection is concerned, the plaintiffs have stated a cause of action within the provisions of section 3388 of the Civil Code.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; HAZLETT, Justice pro tem.

PEOPLE v. GRACE. (Cr. 1527.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 4, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 1, 1928.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 576(3)—Refusing to dismiss information for failure to bring defendant to trial after reversal, as required by statute, held error (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1387).

Denial of defendant's motions to dismiss information charging robbery, repeatedly made during the 9 months following reversal of conviction, for failure to bring him to trial, as provided in Pen. Code, $\S$ 1387, held error.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1166(1)—Denial of defendant's motion to dismiss information for failure to bring him to trial held no ground for reversal, after trial under subsequent indictment (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1387).

Error in denying defendant's motion to dismiss information for failure to bring him to trial, as required by Pen. Code, $\S$ 1387, held of no avail, where information was finally dismissed, and defendant was tried under an indictment, since defendant had remedy to procure release by habeas corpus.

3. Indictment and information $\S$ 15(4)—Error in proceedings under information which was dismissed held not to require dismissal of subsequent indictment for same offense (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1385, 1387).

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1385, 1387, dismissal of information charging robbery held not of itself to require dismissal of subsequent indictment charging same offense, indictment and information being separate proceedings, so that error committed in connection with one proceeding could not affect the other, and it was immaterial that indictment was returned before information was dismissed, and without any order of the court.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 192—On retrial, after reversal, defendant cannot claim he was "once in jeopardy" because of first trial.

A person on trial for an offense, when the judgment of a former conviction of the same offense has been reversed, cannot effectively claim that he was "once in jeopardy" by reason of his first trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Jeopardy (in Criminal Law).]

5. Criminal law $\S$ 192—Nine months' delay in bringing defendant to trial, after reversal, did not operate as placing him once in jeopardy.

Delay of nine months in bringing defendant to second trial under charge in information, after reversal of first conviction, did not operate in law as having placed him once in jeopardy.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 576(4)—Delay of over 60 days, after filing indictment in starting trial, due to defendant's motion to dismiss, held not to require dismissal on appeal (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382, subd. 2).

Where court was ready to start trial of defendant in robbery case within 60 days after filing of indictment, as required by Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382, subd. 2, and commencement of trial was delayed beyond that period because defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which was continued, defendant could not on appeal be heard to complain because of the delay in commencing trial.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Any error in delaying commencement of trial beyond statutory period held not reversible, where there was no miscarriage of justice (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382, subd. 2; Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

Even if court erred in continuing trial of criminal case beyond 60 days after filing of indictment prescribed by Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382, subd. 2, because defendant filed motion to dismiss, the error was one of procedure, and therefore not reversible, under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, where there was no miscarriage of justice resulting from the delay.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 296—Failure to render verdict on former jeopardy plea held not prejudicial, in absence of supporting evidence; plea being waived by failure to produce evidence.

Defendant waives his plea of "once in jeopardy" by failing to produce any evidence in support thereof, and failure of the jury to render verdict on such plea is not prejudicial to defendant, in absence of any evidence supporting it, and offering of incompetent evidence on such plea is in effect no evidence thereon.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 424(3)—Codefendant's statements, made after arrest for robbery in accused's absence, held inadmissible against accused as statements by coconspirator.

In prosecution for robbery, testimony of police officers relating to incidents connected with arrest of accused's codefendant and to alleged statements made by codefendant to them at the time of, and immediately after, his arrest, when accused was not present, held hearsay, and not admissible against accused as statements by a coconspirator, since the matters occurred after completion of the robbery, and only statements by a coconspirator during the existence of the conspiracy are admissible.

10. Witnesses $\S$ 379(2)—Statements by codefendant in accused's absence, when arrested after robbery, held admissible to impeach his testimony exonerating accused.

In prosecution for robbery, testimony of police officers relating to incident connected with the arrest of accused's codefendant, and certain alleged statements made by codefendant to them at the time of, and immediately after, his arrest, when accused was not present, held properly admitted for purposes of impeachment of codefendant's testimony that accused did not participate in the robbery.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 824(8)—In absence of request for instruction that impeaching evidence be limited to that purpose, defendant could not complain on appeal that jury might not have so limited it.

In absence of request by defendant that jury be instructed that testimony, which was competent for purposes of impeachment of state's witness, should be limited to such purposes, defendant could not, on appeal, complain that perhaps jury failed to consider evidence for the limited purpose for which it was offered.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1169(1)—Testimony respecting arrest of codefendant, in which accused's name was not mentioned, held not prejudicial to accused.

In prosecution for robbery, testimony of police officer relating to matters attending on the arrest of accused's codefendant, not made in accused's presence, held not prejudicial to defendant, where defendant was nowhere mentioned in such testimony, or connected with robbery in any way.

13. Criminal law $\S$ 1144(15)—Appellate court will assume that jury obeyed instructions to disregard stricken testimony.

Appellate court will assume that jury followed instructions of the trial court to disregard testimony stricken out.

14. Criminal law $\S$ 741(2), 1159(2)—Weight to be given to identification of accused is for jury, and appellate court will not interfere therewith.

The weight to be given testimony of complaining witness in the matter of identification of accused is for the jury, and it would be an improper invasion of the jury's sphere for the appellate court to interfere with the finding.

15. Robbery $\S$ 24(3)—Evidence held to support finding that defendant was one of robbers.

In prosecution for robbery, evidence held to support jury's finding that defendant was one of the two who held up complaining witness.

16. Criminal law $\S$ 331—Burden is on accused to prove defense of insanity by preponderance of evidence.

In a criminal case, the burden of proof as to the defense of insanity rests on defendant, and it must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence.

17. Criminal law $\S$ 331—Proof that defendant was committed to insane asylum does not shift burden to prosecution to prove defendant's sanity beyond reasonable doubt.

As respects defense of insanity in criminal case, proof that defendant was committed to the insane asylum does not shift burden back to prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that defendant is sane.

18. Criminal law $\S$ 48—Insanity is no defense, unless accused was so deranged that he could not distinguish between right and wrong.

That insanity may be available as a defense in criminal case, it must appear that defendant, when act was committed, was so deranged that he was not conscious of the nature of the wrongful act committed, and could not distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act done, and he may be punished, though he be laboring under partial insanity, such as suffering from insane delusion or hallucination, if he understands nature and character of his action and its consequences.

19. Criminal law $\S$ 713—District attorney was not guilty of misconduct in commenting on evidence properly admitted.

District attorney was not guilty of misconduct in commenting on testimony which was properly admitted in evidence.

20. Criminal law $\S$ 1171(6)—District attorney's statements to jury in robbery prosecution, characterizing defendant as "criminal," "desperado," and "denizen of underworld," held not prejudicial error.

Where defendant, in robbery prosecution, admitted that he had been convicted and imprisoned for burglary, that he had pleaded guilty to a charge of receiving stolen property, and had been confined as a narcotic addict, conduct of district attorney in referring to defendant as a "criminal," a "desperado," and a "denizen of the underworld," in his argument to the jury, held not prejudicial error, though such statements went beyond sphere of proper argument and of evidence in case.

21. Criminal law $\S$ 1170½(1)—Permitting prosecution's witness to refresh memory from transcript of evidence at preliminary hearing, and refusing similar right to defendant's witness, would not be reversible error.

Permitting witness for prosecution to refresh his memory from the transcript of evidence taken at the preliminary hearing, and refusing similar right to defendant's witness, would not constitute reversible error.

22. Robbery $\S$ 26—Advising verdict for defendant in robbery case would be improper, where evidence supported verdict of guilty.

Where there was abundant evidence to support verdict of guilty in robbery case, it would have been improper for court to advise a verdict in defendant's favor.

23. Criminal law $\S$ 753(1)—Law makes no provision for directed verdict in a criminal case.

There is no provision in law for court to direct a verdict in a criminal case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Earl V. Grace was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 247 P. 585.

John F. Groene, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The defendant, Earl V. Grace, was charged by an indictment filed by the grand jury of Los Angeles county with the crime of robbery. From a judgment of conviction and the denial of his motion for a new trial he makes this appeal.

Events happening in connection with the robbery and the arrest of the defendant material to this appeal may be briefly stated as follows: About 9 o'clock, on the evening of February 28, 1925, the complaining witness, A. J. Maes, who was engaged in the grocery business in the city of Los Angeles, was going to his home, which was located a short distance from his place of business. Just as he left his grocery store he was met by two men, one of whom accosted him, and made some remark about paying him a bill. Maes recognized this man as a neighbor by the name of Newell, but was evidently suspicious of the men, for, without stopping to reply, he continued on to his home. Just as Maes reached the front porch of his house, which was about 40 feet from the front sidewalk, his attention was attracted by the two men following him. As he stepped on his porch, one of these men, whom Maes states was the neighbor Newell, demanded his money, while the other man, a stranger to Maes, but subsequently identified by Maes as the defendant, Grace, pointed a revolver at him. Thereupon Newell relieved Maes of about $125 in currency, a number of checks, some keys, two membership cards in the Chamber of Commerce, and other personal effects. The holdup occupied but a few minutes, during which time an electric light was burning on the porch above where the men were standing. Within an hour after the robbery Newell was arrested by two policemen, Walter S. Schubert and J. F. Koehn. There was found on his person the money, checks, and other articles taken from the complaining witness. Newell confessed the robbery, and, as it appears from the rebuttal testimony, informed the officers that Grace was his partner in the robbery, and that he could be found at 300 North Lorena street. Thereupon, accompanied by Newell, Officers Koehn and Schubert went to the house at 300 North Lorena street, arriving there about 11:30 p. m. These officers testified that, just as they drew up in front of the house in question, the electric lights in the house suddenly went out. Koehn went to the front door and knocked. After a moment's waiting, the door was not opened, and Koehn then forced the door open. At the same time that Koehn went to the front door, Schubert went to the rear door, through which he gained admission to the house without difficulty. In the house, which was a five-room bungalow, were three sleeping rooms. In one of these rooms a man and woman were found in bed. In another several men were found, and in the third three men were found lying on the bed, and underneath the bed Grace was found hiding. The officers in searching through the bed found a .38 caliber revolver under the pillow, and in one of Newell's pockets four cartridges were found which fitted the revolver. The revolver was identified by the prosecuting witness as similar in appearance to the one that was used when he was robbed. After some discussion between the officers, Grace, and the other occupants of the house, the officers took Grace and Newell to the police station, and they were subsequently charged by information with the robbery. Newell pleaded guilty to the charge, while the defendant Grace stood trial.

Before discussing the legal questions involved on the appeal, it becomes necessary to give a brief résumé of certain dates and events in connection with the first trial, appeal, and reversal of the judgment of conviction.

The original information charging both Newell and Grace with the crime was filed on April 3, 1925, and on April 20, 1925, the defendant, Grace, was arraigned and pleaded not guilty. At the time of his arraignment, the trial judge ordered that the defendant, Grace, be first put on trial for his sanity. For some reason, which does not appear in the record, this order of the court was ignored, and the defendant was put on trial for the offense on July 15, 1925. He was found guilty as charged, and an appeal was taken from the judgment of conviction. On May 3, 1926, the District Court of Appeal (247 P. 585) reversed the judgment of conviction on the ground that the defendant had not been accorded a trial to test his sanity, as ordered by the court, and the case was remanded for a new trial, with the instructions that the defendant be put on trial before a jury for his sanity. On July 7, 1926, the remittitur went down from the Court of Appeal. Not until March 24, 1927, did the defendant have his trial to determine his sanity, at which time the jury returned a verdict that he was sane. On April 11, 1927, the defendant appeared in court for his second trial under the information, at which time the district attorney stated to the court that an indictment had been returned by the grand jury on April 3d, charging defendant with the crime of robbery, being the identical offense charged in the information, and for which he had once been tried under the information. The district attorney stated further that, by reason of the returning of the indictment, he desired to move the dismissal of the information, which motion was on that date by the court granted. The record shows that the defendant, through his counsel, protested vigorously against the granting of the motion for dismissal, but, as we view this case, his protest does not become material. On April 11, 1927, the defendant was arraigned upon the indictment, and upon the following day pleaded not guilty to the charge contained therein. At that time, through his counsel, he made a motion to dismiss the indictment. The hearing on this motion upon which briefs were filed by both sides was continued from time to time until May 3, 1927, when the motion to dismiss was denied. It appears also that the defendant had filed a demurrer to the indictment, which was on May 3d overruled. The trial was set for June 3d, but on that date a motion to dismiss the indictment was again made by appellant, and this motion was continued to June 6th, as also the trial. On June 6, 1927, after motion to dismiss was denied, the defendant went to trial on the charge of robbery contained in the indictment. He was found guilty of the charge, and now prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] Appellant urges as his first ground for reversal that the trial court erred in not dismissing the information in which the defendant, Grace, was jointly charged with Newell of the offense of robbery; and, second, that the court erred in sustaining the district attorney's objection to certain records which appellant offered in evidence in support of his plea of once in jeopardy. Both of these points are more or less related in the discussions by appellant in his brief, and we will deal with them together.

We are of the opinion that the trial court erred in not granting the motion of defendant to dismiss the information. In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 350, 65 P. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178. From the time of reversal of the judgment of conviction, and during the following 9 months the defendant made repeated motions to dismiss the information because of the failure to bring him to trial, as provided in section 1387 of the Penal Code. However, inasmuch as the information was finally dismissed, it is of no avail at this time to consider the matter further, unless, as urged by the appellant, he was also entitled to have the indictment dismissed because of the unwarranted delay in bringing him to trial under the information. The defendant unquestionably had his remedy through filing a petition for habeas corpus after the refusal of the trial court to grant his motion for a dismissal, and, had he pursued this remedy, he undoubtedly would have gained his release from custody. In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 350, 65 P. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178.

[3] But we cannot agree with him that the wrong he suffered through the erroneous ruling of the court in connection with the information attached in any way to the indictment and the proceedings had thereunder. Section 1385 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

"The court may, either of its own motion or upon the application of the district attorney, and in furtherance of justice, order an action or indictment to be dismissed. The reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered upon the minutes."

Section 1387 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

"An order for the dismissal of the action, as provided in this chapter, is a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense, if it is a misdemeanor, unless such order is explicitly made for the purpose of amending the complaint in such action, in which instance such order for dismissal of the action shall not act as a bar to a prosecution upon such amended complaint; but an order for the dismissal of the action is no bar if the offense is a felony."

There can be no question but what the court had the legal authority to dismiss the information on motion of the district attorney, and, further, that the district attorney was acting well within the provisions of the statute in causing the defendant to be indicted for the same offense, as it appears that the indictment was filed within three years of the date of the robbery. People v. Follette, 74 Cal. App. 178, 240 P. 502. The mere fact that the same offense was charged in the indictment that had previously been charged in the information does not establish any legal relation or connection between the information and the indictment. Each was a separate proceeding authorized by the statute, and complete in itself. Nothing done while the information was pending could supply a needed step required in the proceedings under the indictment, and manifestly no error committed in connection with the one proceeding could affect the other. The dismissal of the information terminated that proceeding, and, so far as the indictment was concerned, effectively disposed of the information as though it had never been filed. When the defendant stood before the court, and was arraigned under the indictment, his status was the same as though there never had been an information filed against him, or that he had never been tried under the information, found guilty, and the case reversed.

In the case of In re Begerow, 136 Cal. 297, 68 P. 773, 56 L. R. A. 528, we find circumstances comparable to those in the instant case. Begerow had been charged by information with the crime of murder in July of 1900. He had five trials under that information; each trial resulting in a disagreement of the jury. In May of 1901, almost a year after the filing of the original information, when more than 60 days had elapsed subsequent to the last mistrial, Begerow made a motion to dismiss the information on the ground that he had not been brought to trial within 60 days, as provided in subdivision 2 of section 1382 of the Penal Code. The court refusing to grant his motion, Begerow filed a petition for habeas corpus in the Supreme Court, and upon hearing he was released, the Supreme Court holding that he was entitled to a dismissal of the information under section 1382 of the Penal Code. Immediately thereafter the district attorney filed another complaint charging Begerow with the same crime of murder, and he was taken into custody again. His contention that the circumstances preceding his release and the release itself served to stay the hand of the law from any further proceedings charging him with the same offense was not upheld by the court. In a somewhat extended discussion of this very question the Supreme Court epitomized its conclusion in the following excerpt from the opinion in the case of Ex parte Clarke, 54 Cal. 412:

"But the order dismissing the prosecution ends the action commenced by the complaint upon which the magistrate issued his warrant of arrest. It ends the action, however, not by any judgment upon the merits of the case, but by an order in the nature of judgment of nonsuit, a simple expression of the opinion of the court that that particular proceeding ought not to be further prosecuted."

Nor does the fact that the indictment was returned before the information was dismissed, and without any order of the court, affect the situation. People v. Follette, 74 Cal. App. 178, 240 P. 502.

[4] Appellant further contends that the court erred in not permitting him to put in evidence the record of his first trial for the purpose of supporting his special plea of "once in jeopardy." The language used by counsel for the defendant in offering the record in question, as also the remittitur from the Court of Appeal reversing the judgment in the first case, indicates that he contended: First, that the proceeding which resulted in a verdict of conviction by the jury, even though reversed by the Court of Appeal, operated in law as having put him once in jeopardy; and, second, that the delay of some nine months in bringing the defendant to trial under the charge in the information operated also in law as having placed him "once in jeopardy." It has been determined through a somewhat extended line of decisions in this state that a person on trial for an offense, when the judgment of a former conviction of the same offense has been reversed, cannot effectively claim that he was "once in jeopardy" by reason of his first trial. This subject has been so fully discussed by this court, as well as the Supreme Court, that we feel that a mere reference to several of these cases meets all of the requirements of this opinion. People v. Frank, 75 Cal. App. 74, 241 P. 924; People v. Rittenhouse, 56 Cal. App. 541, 206 P. 86; In re Begerow, 136 Cal. 297, 68 P. 773, 56 L. R. A. 528.

[5] As to his second point under this head, that the unwarranted delay in according him a second trial under the information furnishes him in law the ground to contend that he was "once in jeopardy," we feel does not warrant any extended consideration, as we can see no merit in such a contention.

[6] Appellant urges that the indictment should have been dismissed because he was not accorded his trial within 60 days from the date of the filing of the indictment. It appears from the record that the indictment was filed on April 4, 1927; that in due course the defendant was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty. At the time of his plea he filed a motion to dismiss the indictment. It appears that this motion was submitted on briefs, and on May 3d the motion to dismiss was denied and a demurrer to the indictment overruled. Subsequently the case was set down for trial on June 3d, which was within the 60-day period. The minutes of the court in connection with this case on June 3d read as follows:

"Motion to dismiss indictment is interposed. and motion is continued to June 6th, 1927. Witnesses are instructed to return."

On June 6th appears the following entry in the minutes:

"Motion to dismiss indictment comes on for hearing and is denied."

Following the denial of defendant's motion to dismiss, he went to trial before a jury on June 6th.

We submit that from this record the appellant is not in a position to seriously contend that he was deprived of a trial within the 60-day period. The minutes of the court indicate that the court was ready to start his trial on June 3d, when he interposed his motion to dismiss, and, apparently for some reason, and we must assume that it was a sufficient reason, the hearing on the motion was continued until June 6th, which was apparently the first court day subsequent to June 3d. Manifestly the delay in starting the trial after the 60-day period had elapsed was due to appellant's own action in filing a motion to dismiss. He cannot now be heard to complain because of the delay occasioned in the hearing of his motion.

[7] Conceding, however, that the court erred in continuing the trial beyond the 60-day period, we are satisfied that no miscarriage of justice resulted by reason of such delay. The error, if any, is one of procedure, and readily comes within the purview of section $\frac{1}{2}$ of article 6 of the Constitution. People v. Zuvela, 191 Cal. 223, 215 P. 907.

[8] Appellant further urges that in any event he was entitled to have the jury make a finding upon his special plea of "once in jeopardy," and in support of this contention cites the case of People v. Tucker, 115 Cal. 337, 47 P. 111, and other earlier decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. While it is unquestionably true that in several of the earlier cases the position contended for by appellant has been sustained, it is clearly as true that in recent decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court of the state of California, wherein similar questions were under consideration, the courts, while not directly overruling the earlier cases, unquestionably recognize and give support to a different rule. In the case of People v. Frank, 75 Cal. App. 74, 241 P. 924, after considering the earlier and later cases wherein this question was under consideration, this court said:

"From these later decisions, we question whether the strict rule invoked in the earlier cases above referred to can now be considered the law of this state. On the other hand, we think it can be reasonably inferred from these later decisions that the appellant may and does waive his pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy by his failure to produce any evidence in support thereof, and, furthermore, that the failure of the jury to render a verdict upon said pleas in the absence of any evidence to support them does not result in any prejudice to appellant."

While it is true in the instant case on appeal appellant did offer in support of his special plea the record of the proceedings of his former trial and conviction, this was not legal evidence that could furnish support for his plea of "once in jeopardy," as we have heretofore stated. Hence, the evidence offered being incompetent, there was in effect no evidence as a matter of law tendered to the jury in support of the plea of "once in jeopardy," and, under the authority of People v. Frank, supra, the failure of the jury to find on that issue has not prejudiced the appellant. People v. Strickler, 167 Cal. 627, 140 P. 270; People v. Newell, 192 Cal. 659, 221 P. 622; People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 689, 77 P. 818, and People v. Brannon, 70 Cal. App. 225, 233 P. 88.

[9, 10] Appellant complains of certain rulings of the trial court whereby J. F. Koehn, Walter Schubert and Rudolph Sieger, police officers, were permitted to relate incidents connected with the arrest of Newell and certain alleged statements made by Newell to them at the time of, and immediately after, his arrest; the defendant, Grace, not being present on these occasions. This testimony unquestionably was hearsay testimony, and the defendant's objections thereto should have been sustained, unless it comes within one of the exceptions wherein hearsay testimony may be given.

The Attorney General in his brief urges that the testimony was properly admitted: First, because Newell was a coconspirator, and, there being testimony before the court that Newell and Grace had committed the holdup, a foundation had been laid that would entitle the state to offer testimony of statements made by a coconspirator; and, second, that the testimony was properly admitted for the purposes urged by the district attorney that it tended to impeach the testimony given by Newell as a witness for the defense.

The rulings could not be justified on the ground that the testimony purported to give statements of a coconspirator, for the reason that it appears that the conversation between Newell and the officers, which the witnesses Koehn and Schubert undertook to relate, occurred after the robbery, and it is well settled that only statements made by a coconspirator during the existence of the conspiracy may be offered in evidence. These conversations, having occurred subsequent to the completion of the robbery, were hearsay, and not admissible. People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 649, 44 P. 312; People v. Collum, 122 Cal. 186, 54 P. 589.

[11] However, we are satisfied that the testimony was properly admitted for impeachment purposes. Newell was put on the stand by the defendant, and in his direct examination he testified that the defendant, Grace, was not with him on the night of the robbery, and did not participate with him in the holdup of Maes; that his partner in the robbery was one Edward Miller. The witness further undertook to describe the appearance of Miller, as also the clothing he wore on the night of the robbery. The sole and only purpose of Newell's testimony was to support contentions of appellant that he was not one of the two who committed the crime. On cross-examination Newell was asked by the district attorney if he had not stated to Officers Koehn and Schubert, at the police station, shortly after his arrest, in substance, that his partner in the holdup was the defendant, Grace, and that Grace at the time of the robbery wore a brown khaki shirt and cap, and whether he did not further say to these officers at the same time and place that Grace was staying at No. 300 North Lorena street, and that he (Newell) would take the officers to where Grace resided, but that he would not testify against him. Newell denied having made any such statement, or statements to that effect, to the officers. Upon rebuttal the district attorney put on the witness stand, Officers Koehn and Schubert, who, in response to the questions which had been asked of Newell for impeachment purposes, testified that Newell had made such statements to them. We are satisfied that the testimony was properly admitted for impeaching purposes. It is true that such testimony would not have been properly admitted for the purpose of proving that Grace did participate in the robbery, but the record clearly shows that the district attorney offered it solely for impeaching purposes. Unquestionably, had the defendant's counsel so requested of the court, it would have been the duty of the court to have instructed the jury that this testimony was admitted for a limited purpose, and that they did not have the right to consider it for any other purpose than that of affecting, if at all, the credibility of the witness Newell. We have examined the record, and find that no such instruction was requested of the court, and hence the appellant at this time is not in position to find fault, if perchance the jury failed to consider the evidence for the limited purpose offered.

[12] As to the testimony of Officer Sieger which is complained of, it appears that his testimony was limited to matters attending upon the arrest of Newell. Nowhere in his testimony does he mention Grace, or make reference to any matter that in any way tended to connect Grace with the robbery. While it is true that for these reasons it might well be held that his testimony concerning the arrest of Newell was immaterial in this case, we cannot see wherein this testimony could be regarded as prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

[13] Appellant also criticizes the fact that the court permitted Officer Koehn on his direct examination to testify that, when in company with Newell, they reached the house at No. 300 North Lorena street, Newell pointed to the house, and said: "There is where Lacey lives; there is where he stays." (It appears from the record that defendant Grace was sometimes known as Lacey.) Counsel for the defendant objected to this statement of the witness, and the court immediately ordered that it be stricken out, and the jury was instructed by the court to disregard this testimony. We are justified in assuming that the jury followed the instructions of the court.

[14,15] The next point urged by appellant is set forth in the following language: "The identification of the defendant by the prosecuting witness Maes was uncertain and weak." While the prosecuting witness Maes in the trial gave positive testimony that he recognized Grace as being one of the two men who held him up, there is some conflicting testimony as to what occurred when on the morning after the robbery Maes was taken to the city jail where Grace was confined, and asked to identify him, if possible, as one of the two men who robbed him. Manifestly the question as to the weight to be given the testimony of the complaining witness in the matter of identification is for the jury to decide, and it would be an improper invasion of the jury's sphere for this court to interfere with the finding. We are satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding that Grace was one of the two who held up the complaining witness.

[16,17] Appellant next contends that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury relating to the issue of insanity, and in refusing certain instructions upon the same subject requested by appellant. The court instructed the jury that: "The burden of proof as to the defense of insanity rests upon the defendant and it must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence." This instruction has been repeatedly held to correctly state the law as to the burden of proof, and the weight of evidence required when the defendant offers the plea of insanity as a defense in a criminal case. People v. Sloper, 198 Cal. 238, 244 P. 362; People v. Morisawa, 180 Cal. 148, 179 P. 888. Appellant's contention that, while the defendant must carry the burden of proving his plea of insanity, he has met the full requirement of the law by showing that the defendant was committed to the insane asylum, and that upon such a showing the burden shifts back to the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is sane—is not supported by any authorities to which our attention has been directed.

"In order that insanity may be available as a defense to a crime charged, it must appear that the defendant, when the act was committed, was so deranged and diseased mentally that he was not conscious of the nature of the wrongful act committed. If he has reasoning capacity sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act he is doing, knowledge and consciousness of what he is doing is wrong and criminal, and will subject him to punishment, he must be responsible for his conduct. Although he may be laboring under partial insanity—as, for instance, suffering from some insane delusion or hallucination—still, if he understands the nature and character of his action and its consequences, if he has knowledge that it is wrong and criminal, and that if he does the act he will do wrong, such partial insanity or the existence of such delusion or hallucination is not sufficient to relieve him from responsibility for his criminal acts. People suffering from delusions or hallucinations may know right from wrong, but not be responsible for their actions."

The foregoing instruction, in substance, has had the approval of this court, as well as the Supreme Court of this state. People v. Zari, 54 Cal. App. 133, 201 P. 345; People v. Morisawa, 180 Cal. 148, 179 P. 888.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss in detail the refused instructions. These instructions were drafted upon the theory that the burden shifted to the prosecution after the defense had put in evidence the record of the defendant having been committed to the insane asylum, and upon the further theory that, if there was any reasonable doubt in the mind of the jury as to the insanity of the defendant, this doubt should be resolved in favor of the defendant. It has been repeatedly held, in fact it is no longer a controverted matter in this state, that the burden of supporting a plea of insanity when presented in a criminal prosecution is upon the defendant, and that, in order to sustain this burden, he must show by a preponderance of the evidence, that, at the time of the commission of the act he was insane. People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 89 P. 124.

[19] But one further point is urged which we feel merits attention, and that is the alleged misconduct of the district attorney during the trial, and in his argument before the jury. It is first contended that, when the district attorney, in his argument to the jury, referred to and commented upon the testimony of Officers Koehn and Schubert, given on rebuttal concerning the alleged statements made by Newell at the time of his arrest, his conduct constituted such error as was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. As we have already held the testimony was properly admitted, it naturally follows it was the proper subject of comment.

[20] Appellant further contends that, when the district attorney, in his argument to the jury, referred to him as a "criminal," a "desperado," and a "denizen of the underworld," his conduct was such as to constitute prejudicial error. The district attorney in referring to the defendant in the language above quoted undoubtedly allowed himself to go beyond the sphere of proper argument of the evidence in the case. We cannot say that this language constituted prejudicial error. It appears from the record that the defendant admitted on the witness stand that he had been convicted of, and served a term for, burglary in the state prison at San Quentin; also that he had pleaded guilty to a charge of receiving stolen property, and had been confined as a narcotic addict. It would undoubtedly aid in maintaining the dignity of the court if counsel in their argument to the jury would confine themselves to a reasonable discussion of the evidence presented in the case, and omit the use of epithets and the calling of names.

[21-23] Appellant, in concluding his brief, complains that the court did him an injustice in permitting a witness for the prosecution to refresh his memory from the transcript of the evidence taken at the preliminary hearing and in refusing a similar right to a witness for the defendant. In our examination of the record we do not find any ruling of the court which justifies this criticism. Moreover, if perchance such a ruling was made, we do not see wherein it would possibly constitute reversible error. Also as to the criticism made that the court should have granted appellant's motion for a "directed verdict," the first answer would be that there is no provision in law for the court to direct a verdict in a criminal case, and, if appellant means by the term a "directed verdict" that the court should have advised the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, then the answer would be that there was abundant evidence to support the verdict of guilty, and hence it would have been improper for the court to advise a verdict.

We find no reversible error in the record and for that reason the judgment and order refusing a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

HANSEN v. ROGERS et al. (Civ. 3350.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 28, 1927.

1. Dedication ⇨39—One filing subdivision map, describing lots with reference to streets, is bound by error therein as to width of street.

One filing a subdivision map, describing lots with reference to streets, is bound by error therein, whereby particular street was laid down on map as being 60 feet in width, while on ground it was actually 82 feet wide, since making of map constituted abandonment to public of land actually within limits of designated street.

2. Dedication ⇨38—After acceptance by county of offer to dedicate streets, owner cannot claim property shown on map as part of street (St. 1907, p. 290, § 4).

Where, pursuant to St. 1907, p. 290, § 4, in force at time, county board of supervisors accepted, for public use, dedication of all avenues and highways offered by map of subdivision, one filing map is thereafter precluded from laying claim to property, shown on map to be part of street, as being unplatted private property.

3. Adverse possession ⇨8(2)—Title to public dedicated street cannot be acquired by adverse possession.

One cannot acquire title by adverse possession to public dedicated street by taking possession and fencing it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Action by Julius Hansen against Edward Rogers and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, of Fresno, for appellant.

Loren A. Butts and Carling & Cummings, all of Fresno, for respondents.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. On August 1, 1881, one Thomas E. Hughes filed with the county recorder of Fresno county a subdivision map of some 2,880 acres of land adjacent to, and immediately south of, the city of Fresno, Cal. This subdivision was by Hughes denominated "Fresno Colony," and it divided this large tract into 144 lots of approximately 20 acres each. The Southern Pacific Railroad ran northwesterly through a part of this tract. Easterly and westerly through a portion of this tract there was platted a street, named "Church avenue." This street extended from the said railroad westerly to a street Hughes had by said map designated as "Cherry avenue," and which last-named street was distant approximately one-half a mile from a point where said railroad intersected "Church avenue." Lots 21, 22, 23, and 24 of said "Fresno Colony" were by the said Hughes map shown to border on the north side of "Church avenue," and lot 21 bordered on the east line of said "Cherry avenue." These streets are by said map designated as 60-foot streets.

On February 7, 1888, one J. E. Hughes filed with the same officer a map or plat whereby "all that portion of lots 21, 22, 23, and 24, 'Fresno colony,' lying westerly of Central Pacific Railroad" were entirely replatted as town lots; said map being called "Belgravia addition to the city of Fresno." Along the south side of the said "Belgravia addition" there is delineated a street called "Church avenue," and along the west side thereof there is a street named "Cherry avenue."

On May 3, 1909, there was filed a third map whereby "Belgravia addition" was replatted in part only, adopting substantially all the streets on the "Belgravia addition," including "Church avenue" and "Cherry avenue." This map was filed by Edward Rogers, as attorney in fact of Ellie Hill Rogers. On its face it is called a "resubdivision of Belgravia addition to the city of Fresno, which comprises all that portion of lots 21, 22, 23, and 24 of 'Fresno colony' lying west of the Southern Pacific Railroad," but it is renamed "map of South Fresno addition." This last map was duly acknowledged by Edward Rogers, as attorney in fact of Ellie Hill Rogers, and has appended the certificate of the surveyor who made the survey, the county auditor of Fresno county, and the acceptance by the board of supervisors of Fresno county. This map shows a series of town lots, designated by number of lot and block, along its entire south line for this distance of approximately one-half a mile, and as bordering on "Church avenue."

There is no contention herein as to the right of the several parties above named to file the several maps or plats.

From surveys recently made it now develops that an error was made in the original surveys, and that "Church avenue" is actually some 22 feet wider than the so-called 60-foot "Church avenue" of the "Fresno colony" map filed in 1881 by Thomas E. Hughes. All of the property in question is now within the corporate limits of the city of Fresno.

Over 30 years ago a drainage canal or ditch was constructed along and over the northerly side of "Church avenue," which construction was prior to the filing of the "South Fresno addition" map. This ditch was abandoned, and large sections thereof were filled in at various times.

Prior to the filing of this suit, one B. Williams became the owner of lot 29 of block 5, which lot bordered on "Church avenue," and which lot also faced easterly on the state highway, which road had been by the "Belgravia addition" and the "South Fresno addition" maps laid out along the easterly side of the tracts replatted. This lot was conveyed to Williams "according to" the South Fresno addition map. Subsequent to the acquisition by Williams his rights were by a foreclosure sale vested in one Stilios Tripolitis. The commissioner's deed conveyed the property to Tripolitis according to the same "South Fresno addition" map. This deed is based on a judgment dated June 9, 1923.

The appellant herein, as plaintiff, on September 19, 1925, began an action to quiet title to a strip of land which in said plaintiff's complaint is described as follows:

"That portion of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 15, township 14 south, range 20 east, described as follows, to wit:

"Beginning at the most easterly corner of lot 29 in block 5 of South Fresno addition, as shown on map thereof recorded May 3, 1909 (this is the South Fresno addition map) in book 4, p. 58, of Record of Surveys, in the office of the county recorder of said county (county of Fresno, etc.); thence southeasterly along the westerly line of Railroad avenue, as shown on said map, 22 feet; thence westerly along the northerly line of Church avenue, as shown on map of Fresno colony, recorded August 1, 1881, in Book 2, page 8, of Plats, to the southerly extension of the northeasterly line of the alley traversing block 5 of said South Fresno addition; thence northwesterly along the extension of said northeasterly line of said alley, 22 feet more or less to the junction of said northeasterly line with the south line of lots 28 and 29 in said block 5; thence east along said south line 171 feet more or less to the point of beginning."

This action is brought against the said Edward Rogers, and all unknown owners, under the 20-year statute.

The city of Fresno by its proper officers appeared as a defendant, and claims that the land in suit was at all times since the original platting by Hughes, and now is, a part of what was named "Church avenue." Stilios Tripolitis also appeared and contended that he was the owner of the parcel of land described in plaintiff's complaint.

Upon the trial judgment was rendered for the city of Fresno. The plaintiff moved for a new trial upon alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and that the decision is against law, and also for alleged errors occurring at the trial. This motion was denied. This appeal is from the judgment of the trial court.

Plaintiff introduced in evidence the three maps or plats hereinabove referred to. To show his chain of title plaintiff introduced in evidence several deeds from one by Thos. E. Hughes in the year 1883 down to the present time. These deeds, with two exceptions hereafter noted, conveyed this property by reference to one or the other of the three maps introduced in evidence. In other words, no deed, with the exception of the two above alluded to, conveyed except by reference to maps which showed a "Church avenue" bordering on the south side of the lands described in said deeds. The two exceptions above mentioned are as follows: On October 4, 1924, less than a year before this action was instituted, B. Williams and Amy Williams, his wife, conveyed to plaintiff a tract of land identical with the description in his complaint. On October 14, 1925, after this action was instituted, Edward Rogers and Ellie Hill Rogers, his wife, conveyed to plaintiff the same tract of land.

Plaintiff, during the trial, admitted as a fact that Tripolitis was the owner of the lot he claimed by his answer, to wit, lot 29 of block 5 of the "South Fresno addition," and plaintiff also specifically admitted that his title, if any he had, came through the defendant Edward Rogers.

The defendant Edward Rogers testified by deposition that, when he laid out "South Fresno addition," he made no claim to the property covered by the ditch.

[1, 2] Williams testified that he first had an option from defendant Rogers for the purchase of "an acre on the corner," adjoining "Church avenue," and the highway that had been laid out parallel to the railroad; that, when he closed his option with Rogers, he was given "lots" on the corner to make up an acre in area. These lots he accepted by a deed naming lots 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29 of block 5 of "South Fresno addition." He testified that he supposed his deed included the land described in plaintiff's complaint. Williams further testified that he took possession of the land plaintiff now claims, and fenced the same and used it. He also stated that he filled in the part of the unused ditch in the tract described in plaintiff's complaint. We are at a loss to understand by what method of reasoning plaintiff arrives at the conclusion that he becomes the owner of the land in question. When Thos. E. Hughes filed the map of "Fresno colony" in the year 1881, he was the owner of the land for at least half a mile on both sides of "Church avenue." If by some error that particular street was in fact laid down on the map as being 60 feet in width, while on the ground it was actually 22 feet wider, or a width of 82 feet, Hughes became bound by his erroneous map. By this map he placed lots 21, 22, 23, and 24 of his "Fresno colony" as bordering on "Church avenue." When he parted with title in 1883, he did so by a deed that made reference to a map that showed that these lots then conveyed were bordering on the north side of his said "Church avenue." The defendant Rogers is bound by his acts, and the acts of his wife, when they replatted a part of "Fresno colony" as "South Fresno addition," in that they replatted lots 21, 22, 23, and 24 of the "Fresno colony" into town lots, a series of which bordered on "Church avenue." By this "South Fresno addition" map there is for at least a distance of 30 feet to the south of the series of lots a street named "Church avenue." At the time this last-named map was filed the act of the Legislature of the state of California, passed in 1907 (see Statutes of 1907, p. 290), was in force. Section 4 of said statute reads as follows:

"The map or plat so made, indorsed and acknowledged shall, if the same offers for dedication any highway, or portion thereof, be presented to the board of supervisors, board of trustees, city council or other governing body having control of public highways in the territory shown on such map or plat, and said governing body shall indorse thereon which of the public highways offered by said map or plat they accept on behalf of the public, and thereupon such highways as have been so accepted, and no others, shall be and become dedicated to the public use."

The board of supervisors of Fresno county accepted, "on behalf of the public and for public use, all the avenues, roads and highways offered by the accompanying map of 'South Fresno addition.'" When Rogers sold to Williams, he did so according to his map, which showed lot 29 of block 5 as bordering on said last-named street.

The board of supervisors of Fresno county having accepted his offer to dedicate any lands to the immediate south of his platted lots as "Church street," now precludes him from laying claim to property to the south of his platted lots, as being unplatted private property.

[3] We then have the question as to whether or not Williams could go upon a public dedicated street, and, by taking possession of the same and fencing the same, thus acquire title thereto. The making of the Hughes map in 1881 constituted an abandonment by Hughes to the public of whatever land was actually within the limits of what he chose to call "Church avenue." Hughes was not permitted to say in effect that he made a mistake and actually left a street 82 feet in width, and therefore he could reclaim a 22-foot strip along the south side of lots he had sold as bordering on said "Church avenue." Much less can defendant Rogers, or those acting under him, do so. Rogers did not own the land south of "Church avenue," as did Hughes. Rogers accepted a deed of a tract that bordered on "Church avenue," all of which he subdivided into lots. We think the case of Humboldt County v. Van Duzer, 48 Cal. App. 640, 192 P. 192, fully answers this contention here. The judgment of the lower court was correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

COUTURE et al. v. OCEAN PARK BANK.★ (Civ. 4685.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 10, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court March 8, 1928.

1. Banks and banking ⇨148(2)—Checks to order of M. for T. were not paid to beneficiary when paid by bank to T. on his wrongful indorsement.

Checks drawn on bank, payable to order of M. Hardware Company for J. B. T. and to M. Plumbing Company for J. B. T. were not paid to beneficiary, where T. wrongfully indorsed them and identified himself to bank which paid checks to him and he had no interest in the checks nor the money they directed to be paid.

2. Banks and banking ⇨148(2)—Identification of party wrongfully indorsing checks was at bank's peril where it did not arise from negligence or fraud of maker.

Where checks were drawn to order of M. Hardware Company and M. Plumbing Company for J. B. T. to pay for materials charged to maker on maker's credit and wrongfully indorsed by T. and paid by bank to him, identification of T. by bank was at its peril, where it was not induced by maker's negligence or fraudulent act.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1048(5)—Overruling objection to question as to purpose of designation in checks held harmless, in view of answer that it showed job check was chargeable to.

In action against bank for wrongful payment to T. of checks made to order of M. Hardware Company and M. Plumbing Company for T., overruling objection to question to one of maker's firm as to purpose of designating T. in checks was not prejudicial, in view of answer that purpose was to show job on which amount of check was to be charged.

4. Banks and banking ⇨154(8)—Forgery was proved in action against bank paying on wrongful indorsement of check, though check was inadvertently made to nonexistent payee.

In action against bank for wrongful payment of checks made to order of M. Hardware Company and M. Plumbing Company for T., and which bank paid on wrongful indorsement of T., who identified himself, notwithstanding there was no M. Hardware Company in existence, trial court was within discretion in holding that indorsement of such name was a forgery, where word "Hardware" was used in check inadvertently instead of "Plumbing."

5. Banks and banking ⇨154(8)—Evidence held to authorize finding that check paid by bank on wrongful indorsement was not indorsed by payee.

Where checks were made payable to order of M. Hardware Company and M. Plumbing Company for T., and wrongfully indorsed and cashed by T., testimony of secretary-treasurer of plumbing company that checks were never indorsed by payee held sufficient to authorize finding that checks inadvertently made to hardware company instead of plumbing company was not indorsed by payee.

6. Banks and banking ⇨148(2)—Bank paying checks on wrongful indorsement held liable to maker therefor.

Where checks payable to order of M. Hardware Company and M. Plumbing Company for J. B. T. were paid by bank on wrongful indorsement of T., since payment was to an individual not named as payee and without payee's indorsement, bank was liable to maker therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Emile J. Couture and another, co-partners doing business under the firm name and style of the Slingluff-Couture Company, against the Ocean Park Bank. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Weber & Crawford, of Santa Monica, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This action concerns the payment of two bank checks which, with indorsements and marginal data, are herein set out in hæc verba:

"Ocean Park Bank. 90—193

"Commercial.

Savings.

"Santa Monica Branch

"Santa Monica, Cal., Sept. 2, 1922. No. 103. Pay to the order of Manual Arts Hdw. Co. for J. B. Tailer $283.02 two hundred eighty-three and 02/100 dollars.

"The Slingluff-Couture Co.

"Emile J. Couture.

"Plumbing material."

Indorsement on back of above check as follows:

"James B. Tailer, Manual Art. Hard. Co."

"Ocean Park Bank. 90—193

"Commercial.

Savings.

"Santa Monica Branch.

"Santa Monica, Cal., Sept. 25, 1922. No. 177. Pay to the order of Manual Arts Plumbing Co., for J. B. Tailer $318.00 three hundred eighteen and xx/100 dollars.

"The Slingluff-Couture Co.
"Emile J. Couture."

Check indorsed:

"Manual Arts Plumbing Co. J. B. Tailer."

Tailer indorsed the checks without authority from any one, presented them to the bank for payment, received the money, and has not accounted therefor. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover the principal named in the checks and recovered judgment. Defendant appeals. The testimony in the main is without conflict, and will be stated in our consideration of the points urged by appellant as grounds for reversal of the judgment. In the interests of brevity and continuity, we shall treat points 1 to 4, inclusive, without separating them.

Point No. 1: "The beneficiary mentioned in the checks received the money."

Point No. 2: "One of two beneficiaries mentioned in the checks received the money."

Point No. 3: "Plaintiffs were guilty of negligence and the defendant was not."

Point No. 4: "The agent of the plaintiff perpetrated a fraud on defendant and plaintiff is bound thereby and cannot recover."

[1] The testimony is clear and without conflict that Tailer, at the time the checks were drawn and paid, was a foreman plumber in the employ of plaintiffs, the respondents herein, and had been in such employ for six or seven weeks prior thereto. He had purchased certain plumbing and hardware supplies from Manual Arts Plumbing Company, a corporation, for the use and upon the credit of the plaintiff company, which had drawn the two checks in payment therefor and delivered them to Tailer for delivery to the plumbing company. Instead of delivering the checks as directed, however, he indorsed them himself and identified himself to the bank's satisfaction by material slips and lodge cards. He was paid the money and absconded. He had no interest in the checks nor the money they directed to be paid. He was, then, not a beneficiary in fact.

The case of Ridgley National Bank v. Patton & Hamilton, 109 Ill. 483, relied upon by appellant, is not in point. In that case a check was drawn payable to "Patton & Hamilton for account of Lewis Coleman & Co. or order." Had the bank paid Coleman proof might have been in order as to whether the proper person received the money, although the insertion of the words "or order" after "Coleman & Co." would seem to indicate that the latter were the real payees named in the check; and Patton & Hamilton, having received the check as attorneys for Coleman, in the absence of other facts, no action could have been successful against the bank by Patton & Hamilton, the payees, or by the payor. In the instant case, however, the checks were payable "to the order of" the Manual Arts companies, and the proof showed that the party who received the money, not being the payee, had no title in the money. However, the Ridgley Case does not parallel the instant case at all. The bank in the Ridgley Case applied the money on deposit to another use, and, the court determined, wrongly so; and the equitable interest which it stated Coleman had in the check or money was because of the proof in that case, which proof in the instant case is not only entirely lacking, but affirmatively determines the fact that Tailer had no equitable or other interest in the checks.

[2] Tailer had cashed one or possibly two of plaintiffs' checks at this bank before, but neither of the tellers who paid the checks No. 103 and No. 177 has testified that he recognized him because of that fact, and both required identification. This identification was of course at the bank's peril, and the trial court had ample evidence to determine that the identification given by Tailer to the bank tellers was not from any negligence or fraudulent act of plaintiffs.

[3] The court asked one of plaintiffs' firm, "What was your purpose in designating a certain J. B. Tailer in these checks?" and defendant holds this to be error. We agree with counsel for defendant that any undisclosed purpose would not be effective in any manner against defendant. The answer that was elicited could not have been prejudicial to defendant—"The purpose of designating J. B. Tailer on these checks was to show the job on which the amount was to be charged." No doubt the court desired to know whether or not as a fact Tailer had any interest in the check. The answer explained this point, and it was further cleared by cross-examination.

[4] Point No. 5—"the forgery of the indorsement of check No. 103 for $283.02 was not proven." This point is based upon the fact that check No. 103 was drawn to Manual Arts Hardware Company instead of Manual Arts Plumbing Company, as was check No. 177. Without quoting the evidence, suffice it to say that it is apparent that the word "Hardware" was used inadvertently instead of "Plumbing" in this connection. The trial court was well within its rightful discretion in making such a deduction.

[5] The contention of appellant that there is no testimony from which the trial court or this court could find that check No. 103 was not indorsed by the payee is untenable. The following testimony was given by the secretary-treasurer of the Manual Arts Plumbing Company:

"Mr. Crawford [for respondents]: I will show you checks 103 and 177—the first one is for $283.02, the second one $318.00—and ask you if the indorsement 'Manual Arts Plumbing Company,' is on that check. * * * A. The indorsement is there, but it was not indorsed by Manual Arts Plumbing Company. Q. Was that indorsement made under your direction? A. No, sir. Q. Was it made with your consent? A. No. Q. Made with your knowledge? A. No."

[6] This inquiry was apparently related to both checks No. 103 and No. 177, and the witness, in saying that the indorsement was not made by the Manual Arts Plumbing Company, could well have meant, and no doubt was understood by the trial court to mean, that either of the indorsements was placed there by the authority of the Manual Arts Plumbing Company. The whole trend of the testimony indicates that there was no identity such as Manual Arts Hardware Company as distinct from the Manual Arts Plumbing Company. It follows that it was not without competent evidence upon which the trial court found that the check never was indorsed by the payee. The money called for by the two checks was paid to an individual not named as the payee therein, and without the payee's indorsement, and there is nothing in the case which acts as a legal release of the bank from responsibility for the error.

Judgment affirmed.

SPRING VALLEY WATER CO. v. ALAMEDA COUNTY. (Civ. 5911.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 31, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 27, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨907(3)—Statement of facts must be taken as appearing in trial court findings, where appeal is on judgment roll.

Where record on appeal consists only of judgment roll, appellate court must take statement of facts as appearing in findings of trial court.

2. Taxation ⇨446—Assessment and collection of tax on riparian lands at full cash value included riparian rights and exhausted taxing power (Pol. Code, § 3627).

Where riparian lands were assessed under Pol. Code, § 3627, at full cash value without exclusion or deduction on account of riparian water rights, such rights were included in assessment, and on levy of tax pursuant thereto the taxing power was exhausted.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨156(2)—Abridgment, enlargement, or modification of common-law right to use of water course is measured by express stipulation in grant.

Right to use of water course, ex jure natura, or as incident to land, under the common law, is subject to be abridged, enlarged, or modified by grant, but extent of such abridgment, enlargement, or modification is to be measured by express stipulation contained in grant or instrument of conveyance itself.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨156(5)—Riparian rights acquired by grantee under conveyances from different owners is limited by restrictions of particular grant.

One riparian owner or any number of riparian owners less than all could not, by grant or otherwise, extinguish or diminish the riparian rights attaching to the lands of other nonconsenting riparian owners, and sum total of all rights acquired by grantee of riparian rights is limited by restrictions of particular grant.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨156(5)—Grantor of riparian rights may enforce as against grantee full enjoyment of riparian right, restricted only by terms of grant.

Grantor of riparian rights may insist on and enforce as against his grantee a full enjoyment of his riparian right, restricted only by the terms of his grant, and in case diversion is made at any point other than specified riparian owner can enjoin the same.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨156(2)—Grant of riparian rights, limited to right to divert at certain point, conveyed only restricted right in accordance with limitation.

Where grantors of riparian rights limited diversion of water above a certain specified point, grantee thereunder did not become owner of all riparian rights on stream, but received only a restricted right to divert water at specified point.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨40—"Riparian right" as such is right to usufruct inherent in lands.

"Riparian right" as such is a right to usufruct inherent in the lands with absolute right in riparian owners to reasonable use of waters at all seasons of year in usual and ordinary course of its flow.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Riparian Right.]

8. Waters and water courses ⇨153—Severed riparian right apart from and distinct from claim of ownership in land cannot be classed as riparian right.

While a riparian owner may by grant, laches sufficient to create an estoppel, or by prescription lose his riparian rights as such, and thus cause a severance of right from land, nevertheless the severed right apart from and distinct from any claim of ownership in or to land cannot be classed as riparian right, a part and parcel of the soil.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨156(2)—Effect of grant of riparian rights is to convey grantor's right to use of water and estop his complaining against use by grantee.

The effect of a grant of riparian rights separate from land is simply to convey grantor's right to use of water on his own riparian land and to estop grantor to complain against any use of water which grantee may make to injury of such riparian right.

10. Waters and water courses $\Rightarrow$ 156(5)—Interest acquired by grantee of riparian rights, limited by specifying diversion point, consisted of grantors' waiver to insist on riparian rights.

Where grant of riparian rights was limited to right of diversion at specified point, exact estate or interest acquired consisted of a waiver on part of riparian landowners conveying rights to insist upon their riparian rights in that each owner granted right existing in grantor to demand entire flow of stream in natural course down to riparian lands.

11. Taxation $\Rightarrow$ 257—Situs for purpose of taxation of riparian rights under grants limiting diversion to particular point held at point of diversion.

Where conveyances granting riparian rights limited grantee's right to diversion of waters at specified point without territorial limits of taxing districts, the situs of riparian right for purpose of taxation was at the point of actual diversion, notwithstanding that stream extended through such taxing districts.

12. Taxation $\Rightarrow$ 257—Right of diversion in stream does not, for purposes of taxation, extend throughout entire length of stream.

Right of diversion of waters in a stream at specified point under grant by several riparian owners does not, for purposes of taxation, extend throughout entire length of the stream.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by the Spring Valley Water Company against the County of Alameda. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Earle Warren, Dist. Atty., and R. H. Chamberlain, Jr., Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant.

McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the superior court in favor of plaintiff corporation. The purpose of the action was to have it judicially determined that certain assessments on water rights theretofore made by the assessor of Alameda county were and are void. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone. The main question concerns the validity of certain taxes assessed against property of the plaintiff corporation.

[1] As the record here consists only of the judgment roll, we must take the statement of facts as the same appears in the findings of the trial court.

Plaintiff is a corporation legally organized and existing for the purpose of supplying water to the city and county of San Francisco and its inhabitants. The defendant, county of Alameda, is a political subdivision and public corporation of the state of California, to wit, a county. The Alameda county water district, Niles sanitary district, and Decoto fire district are districts organized and existing under the laws of the state of California providing for the organization of county water districts, sanitary districts, and fire districts, respectively. All of the districts named are situated in Alameda county, and the Alameda water district lies entirely within the townships of Eden and Washington, in said county. The other districts named lie wholly within Washington township, in Alameda county. For the fiscal years embraced in the action plaintiff paid to, and there were collected by, the tax collector of Alameda county certain taxes levied in behalf of said county, certain taxes levied in behalf of said Alameda county water district, Niles sanitary district, and Decoto fire district, respectively, and all of said taxes were paid by the tax collector into the treasury of Alameda county. The treasurer credited the proper account of each district with the amount of taxes collected for it, all pursuant to law, and since the collection and distribution aforesaid, all of said taxes have been withdrawn and spent by the respective districts.

Without following the exact language of the findings, the essential facts relative to the property or rights subjected to the taxes thus collected may be summarized.

The plaintiff, Spring Valley Water Company, is the owner of the right to divert from Alameda creek and its tributaries water to the amount of 21,500,000 gallons daily and use the same for business, commercial, and other nonriparian and beneficial purposes, and under and pursuant to such right is and since long prior to March, 1922, has been diverting said amount of water from said creek, or the full flow of the creek when such flow was less than said amount, and using the same for said purposes. The points of diversion are and always have been without the territorial limits of the districts named hereinbefore and for the benefit of which said districts the tax is levied and collected. The amount of 21,500,000 gallons of water daily is equal to or exceeds the usual or normal flow of said creek, and plaintiff has never diverted water from said creek in excess of said amount. Plaintiff also has certain storage rights entitling it to impound and divert all of the waters of said creek excepting certain varying amounts, which it is required to release from storage and allow to pass down the creek for the purpose of replenishing underground waters below its dam. Plaintiff has constructed a large reservoir known as "Calaveras reservoir," and by means of said reservoir and its diverting works plaintiff is about to divert water from Alameda creek in addition to the amount of 21,500,000 gallons daily. Neither the reservoir nor the point of diversion of the additional amount of water is within the territorial boundaries of any of said districts, and plaintiff has not at any time diverted water from Alameda creek or any of its tributaries at any point within any of the districts named.

Plaintiff does own certain lands within the limits of the district, and as a part and portion thereof owns certain riparian rights. It is conceded, however, that this ownership is not in the slightest involved in the issues here for determination. The fact is mentioned solely to indicate that all the facts found have been considered; therefore no further mention will be made of this fact, and what follows will proceed as though this fact had not been found.

Plaintiff at no time has been the owner or claimed to be the owner of any right to divert water from Alameda creek or any of its tributaries within any of the said districts named.

This finding, that plaintiff at no time has been the owner of any water right within the district, or claimed to be such, is attacked by appellant here; and it is argued that the facts following indicate and determine the fact to be an erroneous conclusion from the admitted facts.

In 1910 and prior thereto through various and sundry conveyances, agreements and condemnation proceedings, for each of which plaintiff paid valuable consideration, plaintiff acquired from the respective owners thereof and as against all lands riparian to Alameda creek lying within said districts the right to divert water from Alameda creek for business, commercial, and nonriparian purposes. The material portions of a very large number of said conveyances and agreements were as follows:

The grantor does grant unto Spring Valley Water Company all riparian rights in the water of said stream which are vested in the said grantor, and as against the said grantor, his heirs, etc., and as against the lands; the right at the pleasure of said grantee, its successors, etc., to impound, appropriate, divert, and take the waters of said Alameda creek and of any and all the tributaries and feeders thereof, to the uses and purposes of the waterworks of said grantee, its successors, etc., and by means of a dam or dams erected across the said creek or any of its tributaries at any point or points at or above the inlet of the Vallejo Mill stone chute (but not at any point below said inlet), and of such conduits as it shall erect to divert the waters out of said stream for the uses and purposes aforesaid.

The material portions of the remaining conveyances, with a few excepted, read exactly the same, with this added, namely:

"But this grant shall be and is hereby limited to the waters which shall be above the inlet of the Vallejo Mill stone chute specified above as the point of diversion, and shall not apply to any of the waters of said creek or of its tributaries which shall be below the said inlet of said Vallejo Mill stone chute."

In a few instances the conveyances and agreements contained no express provision limiting the place at which the plaintiff might make its diversions from Alameda creek. The point mentioned in the conveyances and agreements as the inlet of the Vallejo Mill stone chute is and at all times was outside any of the districts named.

All lands riparian to Alameda creek or any of its tributaries and lying within any of the districts named have been regularly assessed without any exclusion of or on account of the riparian rights incident thereto.

The trial court found further, predicated its finding upon the facts as stated, that the water rights taxed are not now and at no time have been, either in whole or in part, within the boundaries of either of said districts.

It was the judgment of the court below that plaintiff recover the sums it had paid into the treasury of defendant county. From this judgment defendant appeals.

It is the contention of appellant that plaintiff is the owner of the water rights within the districts named. Appellant's position is stated as follows:

"It is obvious that since all the riparian owners have conveyed away to respondent all of their riparian rights and their rights to object to the taking of water, it is immaterial as to what point respondent makes the diversion thereof. Although the actual point of diversion be outside the boundaries of the districts, if the company has the right to divert the water within the districts, it is a taxable property right therein."

Appellant further contends that respondent company's right to divert water from Alameda creek is based upon the rights acquired by the various conveyances above mentioned from every riparian owner on the creek within the districts; and that by means of these conveyances respondent acquired a definite property right separate and distinct from the individual riparian rights of the owners, but which right is nevertheless situated for the purposes of taxation along the entire length of the creek, since it arises out of and is based upon the acquisition of the rights appurtenant to the riparian lands.

We have in this case a finding that all riparian lands in the districts have been assessed without exclusion or deduction of or on account of the riparian rights incident thereto, and taxes for the full amounts according to such assessments were levied and collected upon said lands on behalf of the districts named.

[2] The rights assessed, toward which the entire inquiry is directed, are described as

"the right to divert for business and commercial purposes." It has been held in California that an assessment of riparian lands includes the riparian water rights if there is nothing appearing in the assessment rolls denoting a contrary intention. Spring Valley Water Co. v. County of Alameda, 24 Cal. App. 278, 141 P. 38. Therefore, under the finding of fact heretofore referred to, we must conclude that when all of the lands riparian to Alameda creek were assessed at their full cash value (Pol. Code, § 3627), without exclusion or deduction of or on account of the riparian rights, the said rights were included in the assessment, and from the further finding that the taxes levied pursuant to said assessment have been paid, we conclude the taxing power exhausted.

[3] The question as to whether or not riparian rights may be taxed as separate from the riparian lands is not before us for determination. Nor does the question demand or require any exhaustive or analytical review of the authorities on the law of riparian rights. The view of the highest court of our state has been announced in the Herminghaus Case, 252 P. 607. In general, we may say that the right to the use of the water course, ex jure natura, or as incident to the land, under the common law, is subject to be abridged, enlarged, or modified by grant. But the extent of such abridgment, enlargement, or modification is to be measured by the express stipulation contained in the grant or instrument of conveyance itself. A riparian owner may grant the right to the use of water as permitted him under the common-law rules to another, and as between himself and his grantee such a deed is binding. Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights, §§ 530, 533.

[4, 5] Taking the grants in the present case we find that, while a comparatively small number did not restrict or limit the right granted, by far the greater number of grants did contain such a restriction. While it may be conceded that certain owners of lands riparian to Alameda creek did convey to plaintiff their riparian rights in, of, and to said creek, yet the effect of this grant would be to convey only the rights of the particular grantors. One riparian owner or any number of riparian owners less than all could not, by grant or otherwise, extinguish or diminish the riparian rights attaching to the lands of other nonconsenting riparian owners. Therefore, as far as plaintiff in the instant case acquired any rights by a purchase from all of the riparian owners, the sum total of the rights acquired by plaintiff would be limited by the restrictions of a particular grant. This would be apparent from the very nature of the riparian right, for the reason that, assuming there were twenty riparian owners on a stream, the grant or deed of nineteen of these owners could not destroy the right of the remaining one, and whatever property the grantee of these nineteen might obtain through the grant would still be subject to the riparian claim of the remaining nonconsenting owner. Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 526, 89 P. 338. When plaintiff here had purchased the riparian rights of all of the lands riparian to Alameda creek, we find it had the right restricted by this provision:

"But this grant shall be and is hereby limited to the waters which shall be above the inlet of the Vallejo Mill stone chute specified as the point of diversion, and shall not apply to any of the waters of said creek, or of its tributaries, which shall be below said inlet of said Vallejo Mill stone chute."

It is a found fact that the point of diversion thus specified is beyond and without the territorial limits of any of the districts named. It is evident from such a deed that the grantor did not grant his entire riparian right, but merely impaired and abridged his right to the extent specified; namely, that he by grant permitted his grantee to divert the waters of the stream at a given point thereon. It needs no citation of authority to support the proposition that the grantor, riparian owner, could insist upon and enforce as against his grantee a full enjoyment of his riparian right restricted only by the terms of his grant, and that if diversion were made at any point other than specified the riparian owner could enjoin the same.

Appellant cites authority to the effect that the point of diversion or place of user may be changed by the owner of a water right when no one could be injured thereby. This doctrine is not questioned here, but its application is not discernible. Here the point of diversion is restricted by the grant, and to a great extent constitutes the grant. The control of the grantee is not absolute, and the enjoyment of his right is based, not upon his own appropriation or his own independent claim of user, but solely upon his limited grant.

[6] Appellant throughout bases his contention upon the theory that the rights of plaintiff, Spring Valley Water Company, include the right to divert water at any point on the stream, and appellant derives this theory from its assumption that plaintiff is the owner of all of the riparian rights on the stream. We think appellant has based his contention upon an unsound premise. As indicated, plaintiff has under the grants a restricted right not embracing all of the riparian rights in Alameda creek. What the plaintiff did acquire by these grants was exactly what the court found, to wit, the right to divert water from Alameda creek for business, commercial, and nonriparian purposes at a specified point on said creek without the territorial limits of the districts here involved.

Much has been written of and concerning the riparian right as such. It is difficult, if not impossible, to state clearly the extent of this right in all of its possible variety. The case noted hereinbefore, Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co. (Cal. Sup.) 252 P. 607, after an exhaustive review of the subject, at page 616, thus defines the riparian right:

"As such riparian owners said plaintiffs are abstractly entitled to the reasonable use of the said waters of said river at all seasons of the year. Their right thereto is to the usufruct of said flowing stream in the usual and ordinary course of its flow, and this right is a vested right inherent in the soil of their said lands and not a mere incident or appurtenant thereto. It is a right which is neither gained nor lost by use or disuse abstractly, and in the absence of adverse rights gained by others by prescription or of their loss by laches creating an estoppel. * * * It is a right which they partake of in common with other riparian proprietors along said stream entitled to a similar usufruct in its waters. It is a right which appropriators of water from said stream do not * * * share with riparian owners thereon, in the absence of rights to the use of said waters gain by such appropriators by grant or by prescription."

Also Fall River Valley Irr. Dist. v. Mount Shasta Power Co. (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 444.

[7] Conceding, as we must, that this accurately and fully defines the right, it follows that the riparian right as such is a right to the usufruct inherent in the lands.

It has been stated:

"Riparian rights incident or appurtenant to no land cannot exist. * * * The right is incident to the land—belongs to it by nature. We have not found any case holding that it may be severed from the right to the abutting land, so as to become a right in gross." Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406, 38 N. W. 200, 8 Am. St. Rep. 679.

While this was stated in 1888, many years ago, it was written of and concerning a doctrine of very ancient origin, and it is applicable in the main now as it was then. However, and not altogether in conflict with this idea, the California courts have held that the riparian right may be separated from the ownership of the soil, though the said courts have not held that there may be two separate and distinct rights in the soil and in the water, and each of these rights classed as riparian. In Gould v. Stafford, 91 Cal. 155, 27 P. 545, it is said:

"The right of a riparian proprietor to the flow of a stream of water over his land is an incident of his property in the land, is annexed to the land, and considered part and parcel of it, * * * but may be severed or segregated from the land by grant, by condemnation, or by prescription."

If, therefore, a riparian owner grants away all or any portion of his riparian right, he thereby to the extent of such grant severs from the land his riparian rights.

In Yocco v. Conroy, 104 Cal. 471, 38 P. 108, this language is used:

"To whatever extent defendant [the riparian owner] granted * * * the use of the water of the stream, to the same extent he parted with his riparian right to divert or use that water to the detriment of his grantee."

[8] We conclude from the cases cited and from the very nature of the riparian right as defined and recognized that while a riparian owner may by grant, laches sufficient to create an estoppel, or by prescription lose his riparian rights as such, and thus cause a severance of the right from the land, nevertheless the severed right, apart from and distinct from any claim of ownership in or to the land, cannot be classed as a riparian right, a part and parcel of the soil. In other words, to class this severed right as riparian would be to hold that, being separate and apart from the land, it exists because it is a part and parcel of the land from which it is severed—being an illustration of exquisite folly resulting from wisdom too finely spun. If, as generally held, the right of a riparian owner includes and consists mainly of the right to have the water of a stream to which his land is riparian flow down the natural channel to his land unobstructed and unpolluted, it would seem manifest error to conclude that this right could be exercised and enjoyed by a diversion of the waters in a manner wholly preventing the waters from ever reaching the lands to which it was attached.

[9] It follows, therefore, that the effect of a grant of riparian rights as separate from the land is as stated in California, etc., Co. v. Madera Irr. Co., 167 Cal. 86, 138 P. 721, as follows:

"The effect of such a grant is simply to convey the grantor's right to the use of the water on his own riparian land, and to estop the grantor to complain against any use of the water which the grantee may make to the injury of such riparian right. * * * Such estoppel is effective as to the whole riparian right of the grantor simply because of the terms of his purported grant thereof. By reason of his voluntary act he has waived for himself and his successors all claims based on the doctrine of riparian rights, and is in no position to complain of any invasion thereof by the grantee or his successors."

See, also, 26 Cal. Jur. 216.

[10] Without further citation we conclude that when plaintiff herein acquired the riparian rights so called, limited as they were to the place of enjoyment specified, the exact estate or interest acquired consisted of a waiver on the part of the several riparian landowners to insist upon their riparian rights. In other words, to the extent in the grant restricted, each riparian owner granted to plaintiff the right existing in the grantor to demand the entire flow of the stream in its natural course down to the riparian lands. Therefore, when plaintiff made actual diversion of the waters of Alameda creek at a point above the lands of the consenting landowners and, as found here, devoted the waters to a useful nonriparian use, the right of plaintiff was and is in no sense riparian, but it is a separate and individual right, the enjoyment of which is permitted by the grant waiving the right of the lower riparian owner to enjoin the use.

In passing, however, it may be said that this self-created estoppel runs not merely against the consenting riparian owner but likewise against the riparian lands. Arguendo, it could perhaps be urged, therefore, that such a result could only demonstrate a transferred interest in the lands. However, this opportunity for debate represents one of the difficulties encountered in the attempt to preserve individual property rights and promote agriculture development in the face of an established policy which only too frequently militated against the latter. See Gould v. Stafford, 91 Cal. 146, 27 P. 543.

[11] With reference, then, to the right of plaintiff herein to divert the waters of Alameda creek at a point without the territorial limits of the districts involved, and to put the waters diverted to nonriparian uses without the said districts, we hold that the situs of that right on the stream is at the point of actual diversion and not within the territorial limits of any of the districts named.

[12] The appellant contends further that the right necessarily and inherently is a right in the stream, and therefore extends to the entire stream throughout its length and flow. In answer to this we have the court's finding that the diversion of plaintiff exhausts the stream at the point of diversion, from which it would appear that there is no stream to which the right could thereafter attach itself. Passing this, however, we are not prepared to hold that a right of diversion in a stream extends throughout the entire length of the stream for purposes of taxation. If we did adopt this view, it might follow that a water user in a stream rising in one county and flowing down through several other counties would be subject to taxation in every such county. While, as stated, in theory a water user may be said to have some sort of inchoate right in the entire stream, the question arises as to the extent of that right in any portion of the stream below his point of diversion. Repeating, we hold that the situs of the right here involved is at the place of its enjoyment; namely, at the point of diversion. Conceding, as claimed by appellant, that a right may be taxed even if not enjoyed, nevertheless when the right and the actual user thereof combine the necessity of speculating upon the situs of an unenjoyed right does not arise. The use locates the right.

Judgment affirmed.

SPRING VALLEY WATER CO. v. PLANER,
County Tax Collector. (Civ. 5908.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 31, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 27, 1928.

1. Mandamus ⇨12—Performance of plain duty may be compelled by mandamus.

Writ of mandate will issue to compel the performance of a plain duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mandamus.]

2. Mandamus ⇨118—Mandamus lies to compel tax collector to issue receipt on tender of tax legally due on showing that legal and illegal taxes were capable of segregation.

Where taxpayer tendered and offered to pay all amounts legally due and collectable, omitting therefrom only such taxes as were illegal and void, tax collector may be compelled by mandate to issue receipt in full, where it appeared that illegal and legal taxes were separately computed and collected and thus capable of segregation.

3. Taxation ⇨604—Equity takes cognizance of and gives necessary relief in tax affairs.

Equity takes cognizance of tax affairs and gives relief where necessary and prudent, particularly when tax sought to be enforced is void.

4. Taxation ⇨604—Remedies of equity practice will not be withheld where property sought to be burdened with tax is without territorial jurisdiction.

Where property of taxpayer is sought to be burdened with a tax and property is without the territorial jurisdiction of the taxing body, the remedies of the equity practice will not be withheld.

5. Mandamus ⇨118—Mandamus to compel tax collector to issue receipt on tendering legal amount of taxes will not be refused as vesting discretion in tax collector.

Mandamus to compel tax collector to issue receipt showing payment in full of taxes on tender of all taxes except those illegally assessed will not be refused as placing a discretion in taxing officer to determine what portion of tax is valid and what portion invalid, not contemplated or authorized in general scheme of taxation, since the issuance of the writ concludes the question of discretion and is negative of any idea that such discretion is vested in tax collector.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Proceeding in mandamus by the Spring Valley Water Company against Edward T.

Planer, as Tax Collector of the County of Alameda. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Earle Warren, Dist. Atty., and R. H. Chamberlain, Jr., Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant.

McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Appeal by defendant from judgment in favor of plaintiff.

[1] This is a proceeding in mandamus. The case involves the validity of certain taxes assessed and also presents the question of the propriety of the remedy sought. The purpose of the action was to compel the tax collector to issue to plaintiff his receipt showing payment in full of current taxes upon the tender of all taxes save and except the district taxes discussed in Spring Valley v. Alameda (Civ. 5911) 263 P. 318, this day decided by this court. The contention of appellant is that this is not a proper exercise of the writ of mandate, and his ground of contention is that to employ the writ in similar cases would tend to endless confusion in the system of tax collections, and that plaintiff has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy under the general law. However, it is the law that the writ of mandate will issue to compel the performance of a plain duty, and it is obvious that when a legal tender, within the time specified by statute, of an amount sufficient to discharge the tax claim is made to the tax collector, it is his duty to issue the usual receipt, and mandate lies to compel the performance of this duty. Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 318.

The plaintiff here in its complaint alleged such a tender on the stated allegations that the taxes which had been omitted from the tender were illegal and void; in other words, that he had tendered and did tender and offer to pay all amounts legally due and collectable. Upon proof of these allegations he would be entitled to the writ of mandate.

[2-4] In the case at bar it appears that the district taxes were separately collected, and the amounts thereof were not embraced in the general tax rate of the county. It appears from the tax rolls in evidence that the general rate was the basis of a separate computation throughout, and in cases where property was sought to be subjected to a district tax the rate and amount of such tax were interlined or stamped on the assessment. We can see no occasion for the confusion feared. The judgment of the court declaring of no effect the attempted imposition of district taxes upon the property of plaintiff operated as a cancellation of the tax erroneously imposed, and this judgment will easily satisfy the demands of the system. If plaintiff chose, it could have paid the tax under protest, or it could have paid and made demand on the supervisors to refund on the theory of an unlawful or erroneous assessment, or it could have permitted the entire taxes to become delinquent and the property eventually go to sale, and then test out the validity of the tax in question. In either of these cases the local government would have the funds of plaintiff, and handle them in the regular business of government, and if the tax were declared invalid a restitution would follow. It seems, as far as the anticipated confusion is concerned, it would be far more chaotic to be carrying along uncertain and questionable funds than it would be to have the matter determined at once. The court below found sufficient facts upon which to base its conclusion that the obligation of the entire first installment of all of said taxes had been paid in full. That equity takes cognizance of tax affairs and gives relief where necessary and prudent is amply sustained by authority. See High on Injunctions, chapter 8, § 484 et seq. And particularly will the courts by extraordinary process intervene when the tax sought to be enforced is void. Meeting the question as presented, we would hold that where property of a taxpayer is sought to be burdened with a tax, and the property is without the territorial jurisdiction of the taxing body, the remedies of the equity practice will not be withheld. As hereinbefore noted, the tax was void and of no effect as to this property. It was not a case of a mere error in the manner of collection, or of the time of levy or assessment. At no time could the tax become a lien upon the property in question. The tax was easily segregable from the general levy; and if it were not, then the question of segregation would be as difficult in any future stage of the tax proceedings.

In addition to what has been said, it appears that it would be an idle act, tending to unnecessarily prolong the instant litigation, if we were to hold the tax invalid and yet reverse the judgment. If we were now to hold the plaintiff to its remedies at law, the result would be to require further statutory proceedings, all based upon a concededly invalid and void tax. The tax in as far as it affects the property of plaintiff has been adjudged void, and the issuance of the receipt for taxes now admittedly in full payment is a proper subject of mandate.

[5] Appellant urges that to allow the tax collector in each instance to determine what portion of a tax is valid and what portion invalid must be to place in that officer a discretion not contemplated or authorized in the general scheme of taxation, and will tend to wreck and disorganize the system outlined. The obvious answer is that the issuance of the writ of mandate concludes the question of discretion and is negative of any idea that such a discretion is vested in the tax collector.

In Perry v. Washburn, supra, it is said:

"The taxpayer, upon the payment of his tax * * * is entitled to a receipt from the collector, and it is the duty of that officer to execute and deliver the same. It is a duty which the law specially enjoins on him, and its performance may in consequence * * * be enforced by mandamus. * * * The taxpayer is not obliged to trust to parol evidence of his payment, which is liable to loss; he is entitled to a record of the fact on the books of the collector, and to written evidence of the fact in his own possession."

The evident purpose of the present action was to have determined the validity of the tax involved. When the tax was determined and adjudged to be void, the conclusion followed that plaintiff had made a lawful tender of all taxes due, and it is not disputed here that such tender was lawful and continuing. It seems clear, then, that under the decision quoted plaintiff would be entitled to his receipt, as the only claim of the tax collector upon which a denial of the receipt rested was that plaintiff had not tendered the full amount due. To determine the tax invalid and void as against the property assessed, and then remit plaintiff to a pursuit of statutory remedies would seem useless and unreasonable, particularly when all subsequent proceedings would have as a support the foundation which had already been decreed as void and of no effect. Whatever other remedies might be allowed by statute, it would all come back to the proposition that plaintiff should be relieved from the payment of an illegal and void tax.

88 Cal. App. 192

BROWN v. SHROEDER et al. (Civ. 6043.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 31, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1170(10)—Failure to make further finding relative to fraud held not reversible error, where findings and judgment indicated that more complete findings would have been adverse to appellant (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583; Const. art. 6, §§ 4½, 4¾).

In action for dissolution of partnership and accounting, in which defendant alleged plaintiff obtained his interest by fraud, court's failure to make further findings as to such fraud is not ground for reversal, where from facts found and judgment ordered it was evident, in light of entire record, that, if more complete findings had been made, they would have been adverse to appellant under Code Civ. Proc. §

956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583, and Const. art. 6, § 4¾, read in connection with section 4½.

2. Trial ⇨397(1)—Specific finding as to each material issue is not always necessary, where findings as whole show court's conclusion.

It is not always necessary to make specific finding as to each of several material issues, where findings, taken as whole, or construed together, clearly show that they include court's conclusion on all material issues.

3. Appeal and error ⇨931(7)—Reviewing court will conclude that court rested judgment on clear, sustained, and sufficient finding, if there be one, and disregard others.

Where, in any case, there is a clear, sustained, and sufficient finding on which judgment may rest, every presumption being in favor of judgment, it will be concluded on appeal that court rested its judgment on such finding, and others may and will be disregarded.

4. Appeal and error ⇨996—Reviewing court may draw necessary inferences from findings to support judgment.

Reviewing court is entitled to draw necessary inferences from findings in order to support judgment.

5. Trial ⇨377(2)—Allowing plaintiff to reopen case for further testimony held not abuse of discretion, where record did not show that any further testimony was introduced.

Trial court's action, in permitting plaintiff to reopen case for further testimony, after cause had been submitted, and court had announced decision, and minute order directing judgment for plaintiff had been entered, held not abuse of discretion, where record did not show that plaintiff offered any testimony after case was reopened; no harmful result being shown.

6. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨299(10)—Testimony as to plaintiff's indebtedness held not to justify finding of fraud in failing to record instruments under which he acquired certain property, without showing of inability to pay indebtedness from other assets.

Testimony showing that indebtedness existed between plaintiff and certain creditors held not sufficient to require finding of fraud in plaintiff's failure to record instruments under which he acquired half interest in certain property, since fraud will not be presumed from mere showing of indebtedness, particularly where record is silent as to plaintiff's ability to pay from other assets.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)—In suit to dissolve partnership, erroneous finding that allegation that defendant held property in trust for plaintiff was true held not reversible error, in view of other findings.

In suit for dissolution of copartnership and for accounting, erroneous finding that allegations of certain paragraph were true, referring to allegation that defendant held interest in property in trust for plaintiff, held not to warrant reversal, where further specific findings did not impose trust, especially since allegation found to be true is purely one of law, and general finding, so far as it is concerned, is finding of immaterial matter.

8. Judgment $\S$ 565—Judgment of dismissal "without prejudice" held not to bar subsequent action between same parties on same subject-matter.

Suit for dissolution of partnership and for accounting held not barred by dismissal without prejudice on plaintiff's motion, with consent of defendants' counsel, of prior suit setting up identical cause of action, since purpose of words "without prejudice" was to prevent defendants from availing themselves of defense of res judicata in subsequent proceeding (citing Words and Phrases, "Without Prejudice").

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 1172(1)—Error in judgment in requiring appointment of receiver held not to require retrial.

In suit for dissolution of partnership and for accounting, error in judgment in requiring appointment of receiver will not require retrial of case, but judgment will be reversed in part, with directions to enter correct judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action for dissolution of a copartnership and for an accounting by Harry Brown against Dorothy Shroeder and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed in part, with directions.

Richard Liebman and Frank M. Carr, both of Oakland, for appellant Shroeder.

Stanley R. Sterne, of Oakland, for appellant Crist.

L. D. Manning and W. E. Harvent, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Defendants, in separate appearance, appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff, decreeing a dissolution of partnership and ordering an accounting and appointing a receiver to wind up the affairs of an alleged copartnership. A brief summary of the pleadings and the facts, as the case is before this court, will be necessary at the outset.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that at a time, fixed therein as December 20, 1923, he was the owner of a certain interest in the furniture and equipment of an apartment house known as and called Lotus Apartments in Oakland, together with a leasehold interest and estate in and to the said premises; that on said date plaintiff sold and conveyed to defendant Dorothy Shroeder all of his title and interest in and to said furniture and the lease for a valuable consideration, which plaintiff received in full; that at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, the said Dorothy Shroeder executed and delivered to plaintiff a bill of sale, transferring to said plaintiff a one-half interest in the said furniture, furnishings, and leasehold interest; that as a further part of said transaction, and on the same date, plaintiff, Harry Brown, and defendant Dorothy Shroeder entered into a partnership agreement for the purpose of operating the apartment house, agreeing to bear equally the expenses thereof, and dividing equally between them the profits. This agreement provided that, in the event a bona fide offer to purchase the lease, furniture, and good will of said copartnership business is made by any person, the partner not desiring to sell must buy from the party desiring the sale, his one-half interest for one-half the purchase price offered by the intending buyer. The partnership agreement further provides that, in case legal action is brought for the breach of the said agreement, then the party guilty of such breach shall pay to the other upon demand an attorney's fee of $250 for prosecuting said action, and that said sum is a reasonable sum for said fee, and that the same shall be a part of the expense in said action.

The complaint further alleges that on March 18, 1924, the said plaintiff, Harry Brown, and defendant Dorothy Shroeder entered into another agreement supplemental to the said agreement of partnership, by the terms of which agreement of March 18, 1924, all accounts of said partnership business were mutually settled and adjusted between plaintiff Brown and defendant Shroeder. In this last agreement, amongst other things, it was provided that, if defendant Dorothy Shroeder shall fail to account to plaintiff, Harry Brown, on the 15th day of every month, or shall fail to fully perform and observe each and every provision of this agreement, and also of the agreement of December 20, 1923, the plaintiff, Harry Brown, shall be entitled to an immediate dissolution of the partnership existing and to the immediate appointment of a receiver to take full charge of said business and full possession of the premises and all the assets of said business.

Plaintiff then alleges a failure of defendant Shroeder to account, and an exclusion of plaintiff from the premises. Plaintiff next alleges that on or about April 11, 1924, defendant Shroeder executed a document purporting to sell to defendant Herman Crist all of her right, title, and interest in and to the lease and other personal property, and delivered said document to defendant Crist, and that defendant Crist claims an interest in and to the said lease and personal property by virtue of the bill of sale, but that defendant Crist has never been in possession thereof; that said attempted sale was without knowledge of plaintiff; and that he (plaintiff) was never informed of the desire of Shroeder to sell nor of the offer of Crist to buy. Plaintiff alleges this purported transfer to defendant Crist was made without consideration, and with full knowledge of plaintiff's interest.

The defendants Dorothy Shroeder and Herman Crist appeared separately.

The answer of defendant Dorothy Shroeder denied that on December 20, 1923, or at any time prior thereto, or at any time, or at all, plaintiff had any interest in the apartment house in question. The said defendant Dorothy Shroeder in her answer sets up the history of her relationship with plaintiff, Harry Brown, commencing in April, 1922. She avers that at that time she had consented that Brown act for her in the purchase of the furniture, furnishings, and lease of the apartment house in question; that very shortly thereafter Brown reported to her that he had purchased the place for her, and she went into possession, after paying Brown the sum of $4,500, and that she entered the premises in her own right, and that plaintiff Brown at that time never claimed any interest therein; that, upon her persistent demands for a bill of sale or other document evidencing her title, the plaintiff, Brown, informed her that he had paid $9,000 for the lease and the furnishings, and that she (Shroeder) was the owner of only a one-half interest. The answer of this defendant then alleges that she learned that plaintiff Brown had paid $5,500 instead of $9,000, and that she thereupon paid to him, and he did accept, the sum of $1,000 additional to cover his payment in excess of the $4,500 already paid him by this defendant. Defendant Shroeder further alleges that thereafter, to wit, in October, 1923, Brown commenced an action in the superior court of Alameda county against her, wherein he sought a judgment declaring him a partner with her, and also the appointment of a receiver, and that said action was dismissed at request of said Brown on March 18, 1924.

Defendant Shroeder admits that on December 20, 1920, Brown executed and delivered to her the bill of sale pleaded in the complaint. She denies, however, the execution by her of the bill of sale to Brown for a one-half interest, or the execution by her of the agreement of partnership or the agreement pleaded as supplemental thereto. In this connection she avers her ignorance of English, written or spoken, and her total unfamiliarity with business proceedings. She alleges that these last-mentioned agreements were represented to her as being connected wholly with the suit pending wherein a receiver had been appointed, and were in effect mere formalities, having for their purpose the dismissal of the suit and withdrawal of receiver; that at no time were the contents of either agreement explained to her, and she had no opportunity for independent advice or counsel; that the procurement of her signature to the said instruments was fraudulent; that the alleged bill of sale or transfer, purporting to convey from her to Brown a one-half interest in the property and lease, was never executed by her in any manner or at all. She admits the sale of the premises to defendant Herman Crist, and alleges the same to have been in good faith and for a cash consideration of $4,500, and accompanied by delivery, and pleads the recordation of her bill of sale from Brown prior to sale to Crist. She further alleges that an action commenced against her by Brown was on the identical cause of action here pleaded, and that the judgment of dismissal therein entered at the request of plaintiff, Brown, and by consent of defendants, with stipulation that each party pay his own costs, was a judgment on the merits and a bar to the maintenance of the present action.

Defendant Herman Crist in his answer denies that plaintiff was ever the owner of the apartment furnishings and lease; denies on information and belief the allegations of plaintiff concerning plaintiff's dealings with defendant Shroeder; and alleges that the transfer from Dorothy Shroeder to Crist was bona fide and for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any claims of plaintiff. He alleges the recordation of the bill of sale from plaintiff to Dorothy Shroeder and the issuance of the municipal license to Shroeder, and the further fact that nothing appeared of record any place to give constructive notice of the claim of plaintiff, and alleges plaintiff's negligence in permitting the defendant Shroeder to be clothed with apparent ownership, and that plaintiff, Brown, has intentionally concealed his interest in the premises for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding his creditors and innocent purchasers.

For a further answer the defendant sets up the judgment referred to by defendant Shroeder, and pleads the same as a bar to the present action.

A trial was had by the court, and evidence offered and submitted. The court made and entered its findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants.

Each of the defendants named has appealed, and each presents the appeal upon a separate bill of exceptions. By a separate bill of exceptions it is meant, however, that defendant Crist presents his bill of exceptions fully engrossed, and the bill of exceptions of defendant Shroeder, while purporting to be a separate bill, adopts in great part the transcript of her codefendant. In passing it may be said that this is a rather unorderedly method of presentation, and one fraught with much uncertainty.

It may be here noted that respondent contends that the order appealed from is not an appealable order, in that it is not a final judgment. We deem it needless to give further notice to this contention, for the reason that this court has heretofore passed upon that specific point with reference to this identical order. See Schroeder v. Superior Court, 73 Cal. App. 687, 239 P. 65.

The appellant Dorothy Shroeder bases her appeal upon two main grounds, namely: (1) The court failed to find on the defenses of fraud specifically, and specially pleaded and raised; (2) the judgment rendered upon the findings is erroneous upon its face.

[1] As to the first ground, failure to find on fraud allegations, the court did find specifically that the allegations of the complaint were true, excepting that there was an express failure to find on the amount of profit derived from the venture, but found that an accounting will be necessary between the parties, and that the appointment of a receiver was not necessary.

The court specifically found that in May, 1922, the defendant Dorothy Shroeder entered into an agreement to purchase from plaintiff, Brown, a one-half interest in the furniture, furnishings, and lease, and that, on June 6, 1922, she paid the balance of the agreed purchase price, and entered into a partnership agreement, and further specifically finds that the lease on the property was, on April 26, 1922, assigned to plaintiff, Brown, and that he (Brown) on June 6, 1922, assigned one-half interest to Dorothy Shroeder.

The issue tendered by defendant Shroeder was that in April Brown was to act merely as her agent and purchase for her alone the premises here under discussion. This is the first allegation of fraud; namely, Brown represented to her that he was buying the property solely for her, and he was to have no interest therein. We think the finding of the court as noted sufficiently covers this issue.

The defendant Shroeder bases her claim of fraud particularly upon the fact that throughout the entire transaction there was never any agreement or understanding, save that she was to be the sole purchaser, and she makes unequivocal denial that she ever made any bill of sale to plaintiff, Brown, of a half interest in the furniture and lease. The court finds that she did execute and deliver to plaintiff the said bill of sale.

The defendant Shroeder, after denying the execution of the bill of sale, does admit her signing the partnership agreement and the subsequent agreement affirming the same and settling the partnership accounts up to March, 1924. But she alleges that she was induced to sign these instruments through the fraud of plaintiff, in that he represented to her that these instruments were of an entirely different nature, and that she, relying upon these representations, was misled to her injury.

The court finds that these instruments were executed by defendant at the time and in the manner as set forth in the complaint, and that, at the time of the execution of the last agreement, the defendant Dorothy Shroeder paid plaintiff $250 in settlement of their accounts to that date.

It can readily be seen that all of the allegations of fraud and deceit interposed by way of defense by defendant Dorothy Shroeder are predicated upon the first ground of her defense; namely, that the entire transaction with Brown was in his capacity as broker, and that she was to have the full title, and that she never executed any bill of sale to him. The essence of the subsequent fraud would be not that he, as a half owner, persuaded her to sign a partnership agreement, thinking it was something else, but that he, with no title or claim at all, thus imposed upon her. As to this the court did make express findings.

The court further found that plaintiff, Brown, sold and conveyed the property in question to defendant Shroeder for a valuable consideration, which plaintiff received in full from said defendant. The court further found that the plaintiff executed and delivered to defendant Shroeder during the pendency of the former suit a bill of sale for the entire property, and that as a part of that transaction Dorothy Shroeder executed her bill of sale for the one-half interest to plaintiff, and that both parties executed the partnership agreement.

We deem these findings sufficiently responsive to the issues of fraud that were tendered. It can readily be inferred therefrom that the court thereby found that the true transaction was as found, and that the defendant Shroeder was not executing other instruments. Also there is a general finding by the court that the allegations of the answer of Dorothy Shroeder, except as noted, are untrue.

In support of our conclusion on the sufficiency of the findings, we call attention to the following principles of law governing in respect thereto:

[2] It is not always necessary to make a specific finding as to each of several material issues where the findings taken as a whole, or construed together, clearly show that they include the court's conclusion upon all the material issues. Rossi v. Beaulieu Vineyard, 20 Cal. App. 770, 130 P. 201.

[3] If in any case there be one clear, sustained, and sufficient finding upon which the judgment may rest, every presumption being in favor of the judgment, it will be here concluded that the court did rest its judgment upon that finding, or those findings, and the others may, and will be, disregarded. American National Bank v. Donnellan, 170 Cal. 15, 148 P. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 744; Thayer v. Tyler, 169 Cal. 671, 147 P. 979.

In the case of Berry v. Crowell, 55 Cal. App. 537, 203 P. 836, it is said:

"Under the general finding of the court, all facts alleged in the answer not specifically referred to in those findings, are determined to be true. This general finding is sufficient to embrace that allegation contained in the answer setting forth, from the side of the defendants, just what representations were made, and all of them. * * * If sufficient can be gathered from the whole of the findings of the court that material issues are fairly determined, the finding will support the judgment. 'It was not necessary that the facts as found should be in any particular form or follow the pleadings. If the truth or falsity of each material allegation in issue can be demonstrated from the findings, the law is complied with.'"

From the facts found and from the judgment ordered it is evident, in the light of the entire record, that, if more complete findings had been made, they would have been adverse to the contentions of appellant. If that be so, the failure to find further is not ground for reversal of the judgment. Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 P. 309.

[4] We are entitled to draw necessary inferences from the findings in order to support a judgment. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 571, 217 P. 750.

In Millard v. Legion of Honor, 81 Cal. 342, 22 P. 864, Justice McFarland, in referring to the necessity of findings and the Code provision governing, uses this language:

"One main object of the provision seems to have been to prevent a court from summarily ordering judgment without giving any reasons for it—without stating any facts or legal conclusions upon which it is based. There was also, no doubt, some intent to facilitate the review of a judgment on appeal. But surely the main object was not to afford a cover under which a losing party might successfully set a trap to capture a just judgment. The findings come after the case has been tried, considered, and determined, and after the character of the judgment * * * right or wrong, has been fixed. They are merely incidental to the main thing—the judgment; and to test their sufficiency by a standard which exacts the extreme of accurate statement and minute detail is to put the incident in the place of the principal."

The words of the learned justice are most fitting at this time. By the recent constitutional amendment, section 4½, art. 6, Constitution of California, and the legislation following said amendment, section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1927, p. 583), this state has adopted these views as a matter of governmental policy. Whatever may be the practical effect of the amendment to the Constitution or the legislation following it, it is obvious that the general effect intended was as expressed in the Code section, namely, that, wherever possible, causes may be finally disposed of by a single appeal and without further proceedings in the trial court, except where the interests of justice require a new trial. This new section to the Constitution follows section 4½, art. 6, and no doubt should be read in connection therewith, the two constituting a striking example of the evolution of the organic law to keep pace with modern ideals.

2. The second ground upon which defendant Shroeder bases her appeal, namely, that the judgment rendered upon the findings is erroneous upon its face, embraces practically the same contentions urged by her co-defendant Crist on his appeal. Therefore we will pass this ground, and discuss it with the claims of Crist.

Appeal of Defendant Herman Crist.

This defendant bases his appeal upon the following grounds:

[5] (1) The trial court abused its discretion in granting plaintiff's motion to reopen said cause. It appears that, after the cause had been submitted, and after the court had announced its decision, and a minute order directing judgment for plaintiff had been entered, the plaintiff, on motion, was permitted to reopen the case to present further testimony. From the record before us it does not appear that the plaintiff offered any testimony after the case was reopened, but the appellant rests his contention that the order permitting the reopening was improper upon and cites the affidavits filed by plaintiff on his motion as being insufficient, and claims, therefore, that the order setting aside the submission was erroneous. In other words, appellant does not complain because the cause was reopened, but that the order of submission was set aside. As indicated, all the record discloses is that the cause was reopened. There is nothing to show what testimony was taken or proceedings had, if any, after the reopening. No harmful result is shown, nor do any facts appear from which an inference of injury may be drawn. Appellant cites a number of cases having to do with the question of newly discovered evidence as the basis of an order granting a new trial. Obviously these cases have little, if any, application here. We find no affirmative error or abuse of discretion in the trial court's action in permitting further testimony.

[6] (2) Appellant Crist complains that the lower court failed to find upon material issues, and upon other material issues made findings wholly inadequate as a matter of law. Defendant Crist had alleged in his answer that his purchase from Shroeder was in good faith, and for a valuable consideration; that he had made search of all public records, and found the title vested in Dorothy Shroeder, and the municipal license issued to her alone; that plaintiff Brown had allowed her to remain in full and exclusive possession of the premises, and had clothed her with all indicia of ownership, and that Crist relied on these records and the apparent ownership, and purchased. He further alleged that Brown fraudulently concealed his interest, if any he had, for the purpose of defrauding creditors and innocent purchasers. With these allegations Crist further pleaded an estoppel as against Brown, shutting off the right of Brown to assert any claim as against him (Crist) the innocent purchaser for value.

The court found specifically as follows: That Herman Crist, when he purchased from Dorothy Shroeder, had knowledge that plaintiff claimed an interest in the premises, and had further knowledge of the prior suit between the partners; that Herman Crist occupied an apartment as tenant for about 18 months prior to his purchase from Shroeder, and had conversed with witnesses as to the interest of plaintiff in the premises; that Herman Crist, before purchasing, had sought an assignment of the lease to himself from the owner of the building, and had failed to obtain the same, and, since his purchase, has taken receipts for the rent in the name of plaintiff. Further, the court specifically found that Crist had knowledge that plaintiff had been excluded from the premises before he purchased. The court, going further, found that there was no negligence or fraudulent intent upon the part of plaintiff in permitting Dorothy Shroeder to be in charge of the apartments on or prior to the date of the purchase by Crist, and that such charge was pursuant to the partnership agreement.

Tested by the authorities hereinbefore cited, we deem these findings amply responsive to the issues tendered. There was not a word of testimony offered or any evidence adduced as to any privity between plaintiff and defendant Crist, or as to any representations or statements made by plaintiff to Crist. Defendant Crist offered some testimony to show the indebtedness existing between Brown and other creditors, seeking thereby to create an inference that the failure to record and the continued possession of Shroeder were intended to defraud the other creditors. Fraud will not be presumed from a mere showing of indebtedness, particularly where, as here, the record is silent as to the ability to pay from other assets.

The court has specifically found Crist to have been a purchaser with full notice, and thus his status is determined. In whatever way the general conduct of Brown might have been intended to defraud or mislead creditors in general, it is obvious that it did not mislead Crist.

The judgment of the court in no wise affected the purchase of Crist in as far as the interests of Shroeder were concerned. The said judgment gave Crist what he had purchased; namely, the interest of Shroeder, subject to the claims of which Crist had knowledge when he bought.

[7] Defendant Herman Crist further specifies that the court erroneously found that he (Crist) takes the interest of defendant Shroeder, and holds the same in trust for plaintiff. The theory of appellant Crist arises from the fact that in plaintiff's complaint, paragraph 7, appears this allegation:

"That any claim or interest of defendant Herman Crist is subject to the interest of plaintiff herein, and any conveyance of any interest of defendant Dorothy Shroeder to Herman Crist devolved in trust for the benefit of plaintiff."

The said paragraph 7 contained seven different subparagraphs on different topics, being the concluding paragraph of the complaint. The court found generally thereon as follows:

"And it is found that the allegations of paragraphs 6 and 7 are true, except that the appointment of a receiver is not necessary."

Appellant Crist contends that the effect of this finding leaves him with nothing; that whatever otherwise might be his by reason of his purchase from Shroeder he holds in trust for plaintiff.

In the first place, the allegation is a mere conclusion of law; and, if it could be held that the court specifically found as a fact that this was the law, it would not have the effect feared by appellant. The trust alleged was in connection with the other allegations; and the conclusion of law which the court reached was to the effect that defendant Crist took the interest of defendant Shroeder, subjected only to the partnership accounting and the one-half interest of plaintiff. The conclusion of the court and its judgment held that the transfer to Crist was complete as far as defendant Shroeder was concerned, and that by virtue thereof Crist, with reference to the rights of plaintiff, stood in the same position as his vendor stood as far as the rights to the property involved were determined.

The findings as a whole negative the claim of appellant Crist. In any event, as noted, the allegation found to be true is purely one of law, and the general finding thereon is a finding, as far as the allegation is concerned, of an immaterial matter.

We deem it unnecessary to review in detail all of the findings. It is clear that the result works no harm to appellant Crist, for the reason that the court makes further and specific findings on his rights in the premises, and neither directs nor decrees any trust to be imposed upon his ownership, but specifically awards him everything to him transferred, subject only to the partnership rights of plaintiff, concerning which the court found he had full knowledge.

[8] Another contention urged by both appellants is that a former judgment in an action between the same parties was and is a judgment on the merits, and bars the instant action.

The present action was commenced on July 31, 1924. It appears from the record that on April 17, 1924, this plaintiff, Harry Brown, commenced an action against the de-defendants Dorothy Shroeder and Herman Crist in the superior court of Alameda county. The cause of action therein set up was identical with the present cause, and the issue tendered by the defendants was identical. After answer was filed, this former case came on for trial on July 30, 1924. On that date the record discloses the following entry in the minutes of the court:

"No. 77468. Brown v. Shroeder et al. On motion of counsel for plaintiff, in open court, by consent of defendants' counsel, it is ordered that the above-entitled action be, and the same is, hereby dismissed without prejudice; and it is further ordered that, pursuant to stipulation of said counsel, each side pay its own costs."

The record before us here contains the pleadings in the former case and this minute order. No judgment roll is offered and no record of any judgment ever having been entered. The main case relied upon by appellants is Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 547. While later authorities are cited, they are based directly upon the Merritt Case. In that case the court bases its conclusion mainly upon the principle that in practice it has generally, if not universally, been considered to be the intention of parties, in agreeing to dismiss an action, to thereby put an end to the controversy. However, the court specifically limits the effect of the decision by declaring it to hold "only that a judgment of dismissal, when based upon and entered in pursuance of the agreement of the parties, must be understood, in the absence of anything to the contrary expressed in the agreement and contained in the judgment itself, to amount to such an adjustment of the merits of the controversy by the parties themselves, through the judgment of the court, as will constitute a defense to another action afterward brought upon the same cause of action." In the instant case we have no judgment roll showing the entry of any judgment; nothing save the minute entry of the court's order of dismissal without prejudice. The dismissal "without prejudice" was surely not a judgment on the merits, nor was it an open and voluntary renunciation of a suit pending, which would be held to operate as a retraxit.

Courts are not inclined to extend the doctrine of retraxit. When there has been no adjudication of the case upon its merits, it will only be in exceptional cases that this court will hold that a judgment of dismissal is the equivalent of res adjudicata upon the facts. Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 P. 141. It would be destructive of substantial justice if counsel were permitted to stipulate to a dismissal of a cause, expressly without prejudice, and then be permitted to urge a judgment upon the merits, basing the contention only upon the dismissal pursuant to the stipulation. The term "without prejudice" is almost self-explanatory. In "Words and Phrases," both editions, will be found many references to cases wherein the effect of this term has been declared. In almost all of the illustrations given, the words have been used in connection with dismissals. The purpose and effect of the words "without prejudice" in a decree dismissing a bill is to prevent the defendants from availing themselves of the defense of res adjudicata in any subsequent proceeding by the same plaintiffs on the same subject-matter. This is the doctrine of Story, Eq. Pl. § 793; O'Keefe v. Real Estate Co., 87 Md. 196, 39 A. 428; Taylor v. Slater, 21 R. I. 104, 41 A. 1001. The California cases contain nothing on the subject as applicable to a case where both parties stipulate and consent to a dismissal "without prejudice." However, the leading case, Merritt v. Campbell, supra, restricts the operation of the decision to cases, where a judgment of dismissal is entered in pursuance of the agreement of the parties, in which there is an "absence of anything to the contrary expressed in the agreement and contained in the judgment itself."

We hold that the words "without prejudice" in the case at bar is a direct expression negating the intent or conclusion that the dismissal should prevail as a judgment on the merits, and saves the dismissal from the operation of the rule of the Merritt Case.

Incidental to this discussion we cite the case of McCallum v. Stull, 59 Cal. App. 572, 211 P. 466, wherein the court says:

"It is patent that the appellant was contending in the trial court that the first action was dismissed and that therefore there was no judgment to be foreclosed. If such was the contention of the appellant, then [he] should have produced a judgment roll showing that a judgment of dismissal was entered and that such judgment was within the jurisdiction of the court entering it."

[9] Finally, both appellants here meet upon another common ground. Adopting, for this contention, the findings of fact and conclusions of law as entered in the court below, they contend that the judgment rendered and entered therein is erroneous upon its face, and not determinative of the rights of the parties to the action.

Conceding that appellants are to some extent correct in their conclusions, nevertheless we see no necessity for a retrial of the cause.

The interlocutory judgment by its terms orders, adjudges, and decrees as follows:

"That the partnership theretofore existing between Harry Brown and Dorothy Shroeder ought to be, and is hereby, dissolved as of date April 11, 1924, and that an accounting of the business of the said partnership is necessary between plaintiff and Dorothy Shroeder of all of the lease, business, good will, and other equipment of Lotus Apartments, together with the leasehold interest and estate in and to said premises;

"And it is ordered that John Meillitte be, and he is hereby, appointed receiver to take and hold possession of the partnership property pending the accounting and until the partnership business is wound up on dissolution, with power to liquidate and dispose of said business under the order and direction of the court, with bond in the sum of $1,000.

"Plaintiff shall have judgment against Dorothy Shroeder for counsel fees fixed at $250.

"Further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that defendant Herman Crist is entitled to all of the right, title, and interest of Dorothy Shroeder on such accounting, to wit, to the proceeds of a one-half interest in said partnership business, good will, and property."

Appellants contend that the findings of fact and conclusions of law do not authorize or support such a judgment. It is pointed out that the findings of fact declare the appointment of a receiver is not necessary, and the conclusions of law determine that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the partnership property pending an accounting, and until the partnership business is wound up on dissolution. Further, appellants contend that the judgment is indefinite and meaningless with reference to the accounting in as far as the judgment merely provides that an accounting is necessary, and makes no provision for the taking of an account or the manner in which or by whom the account is to be taken. Lastly, they contend that, in an action between partners, no present judgment for money due should be rendered until after completion of account taken, and that therefore the judgment is erroneous, in that the court decrees that plaintiff shall have judgment against defendant Dorothy Shroeder for the sum of $250 for counsel fees.

Plaintiff in the court below conceded the judgment to be unsupported as to the appointment of a receiver, and moved the court below to amend the judgment in that particular. The court below accordingly attempted to correct the judgment in this regard. However, this court on a writ of prohibition forbade the trial court from further proceeding and from in any manner amending the provisions of the judgment in view of the fact that an appeal had been taken. The action of this court and the reasons therefor are fully set forth in Schroeder v. Superior Court, 73 Cal. App. 687, 239 P. 65.

Appellants urge the accounting might disclose a balance due defendant Shroeder far in excess of this amount. In the agreement between the parties it was stipulated that, in case legal action is brought for breach of contract, the party guilty of such breach shall pay to the other upon demand an attorney's fee of $250 for prosecuting such action, and stipulating the said amount to be a reasonable sum, and agreeing that it shall be a part of the expense of said action. The court found that defendant Shroeder was guilty of the breach, and made the award objected to in pursuance of the terms of the agreement.

In the present case we have a complete determination of the issues and proper conclusions of law drawn therefrom. As far as the facts of the controversy may be affected, we find no error up to this point. Therefore we feel it would be and is unnecessary to order a re-examination into the facts. Taking the facts as found and the conclusions of law drawn therefrom by the trial court, the respondent plaintiff is entitled to a decree dissolving the partnership as of April 11, 1924, and that an accounting should be had. The findings of act and conclusions of law do not authorize the appointment of any receiver, but provide that plaintiff shall remain in possession of the property for purposes of liquidation and until the partnership business is wound up on dissolution.

Therefore the judgment appealed from is reversed to the extent noted, and the court below, without further trial, is directed to enter judgment as indicated herein; namely, dissolving the partnership as of the date set forth, and directing and ordering an account to be taken between plaintiff, Harry Brown, and defendant Dorothy Shroeder, and providing that, during the pendency of said accounting and the winding up of the affairs of the partnership, the plaintiff have possession of the partnership property, without the intervention of a receiver. And also the judgment shall decree the defendant Herman Crist entitled to all the right, title, and interest of Dorothy Shroeder on such accounting, to wit, the proceeds of a one-half interest in the partnership business, good will, and property; each party to bear his own costs of appeal.

We concur: KNIGHT, Acting P. J.; CASHIN, J.

BRYANT v. WELLBANKS. (Civ. 5873.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 31, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 27, 1928.

1. Pleading $\S$ 236(2)—Permitting amendment 18 months after original complaint not abuse of discretion, in absence of showing of injustice or hardship.

Permitting amendments of complaint 18 months after filing original complaint will not be held an abuse of discretion, in absence of claim or showing that injustice or hardship resulted.

2. Pleading $\S$ 248(9) — Amended complaint held not to substitute new cause of action by suing in plaintiff's own right for injuries to goods.

In action for recovery of shipment of tomatoes, second amended complaint, only difference of which was that defendant, originally sued as doing business with another, is named as conducting individual business under company name, and that tomatoes were shipped by plaintiff himself, instead of by firm of which plaintiff was member, as originally alleged, and claim subsequently assigned to plaintiff, demand in each case being for same amount, did not substitute a new cause of action, and permitting filing of such amended complaint was not error.

3. Partnership ⚡64—Persons doing business under fictitious name may freely contract, but cannot enforce contract until compliance with statute (Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468, persons doing business under fictitious name may contract without restraint, and their contracts may be enforced against them; but they cannot enforce such contracts, but may enforce contract on complying with statute at any time before trial.

4. Partnership ⚡64—Contract with partnership doing business under fictitious name, but failing to file certificate, is valid and assignable (Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468).

Contract with partners doing business under fictitious name without filing certificate required by Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468, is valid and binding, and could properly be assigned to one of such partners.

5. Parties ⚡76(1)—Noncompliance with statute by persons doing business under fictitious name, affecting capacity to sue, must be raised in appropriate way (Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468).

In an action by individual or partnership doing business under fictitious name, compliance with Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468, need not be alleged by plaintiff, but such noncompliance is matter of defense, and objection to legal capacity of plaintiff to sue, based on that ground, must be raised in some appropriate way.

6. Parties ⚡76(6)—Objection to legal capacity of plaintiff to sue, on ground he is doing business under fictitious name without complying with statute, is waived, if not taken by demurrer or answer (Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468).

Objection to plaintiff's legal capacity to sue, on ground he is doing business under fictitious name and has not complied with Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468, must be taken by demurrer, if grounds for it appear on face of complaint, or by answer, if they do not; otherwise, it is waived.

7. Partnership ⚡64—Assignee of contract of partnership doing business under fictitious name without complying with statute may comply with statute, even after suit is brought (Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468).

Assignee of partnership doing business under fictitious name without complying with Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468, stands in place of his assignor, and compliance with statute, even after suit is brought on contract assigned may be effectual.

8. Partnership ⚡64—Defendant, in action by assignee of partnership contract, held to have waived capacity of partnership assignor in doing business under fictitious name without complying with statute (Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468).

In action by one of partners, to whom contract entered into by partnership while doing business under fictitious name without complying with Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468, was assigned, defendant by failing to raise objection as to noncompliance by partnership with statute, and urging only defense of assignee's capacity and compliance with statutes, held to have waived capacity of partnership assignor.

9. Partnership ⚡64—Partner, purchasing assets of retiring partner, can as to his portion thereafter comply with statute as to persons doing business under fictitious name (Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468).

Surviving partner, purchasing assets of retiring partner as to his one-half interest, will be considered as holding claim as one doing business under name of original partnership, and where partnership had been doing business under fictitious name without complying with Civ. Code, §§ 2466-2468, later compliance with statute by such partner would be sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by A. J. Bryant, doing business under the firm name and style of the Bryant Produce Company, against Webster Wellbanks. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco (Brann, Van Duyen, Boekel & Rowe, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

George L. Stewart, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, and there is brought for review the order of the trial court denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The facts will be given hereinafter as the grounds of appeal are considered.

The original complaint was filed on June 5, 1923, alleging that A. J. Bryant, doing business under the name of Bryant Produce Company, shipped certain tomatoes to Webster Wellbanks and W. P. Day, doing business under the firm name of Wellbanks & Co., for which no accounting was had, and alleging further the indebtedness of defendants therefor. On June 14, 1924, plaintiff filed an amended complaint, in which he alleged, in addition to the allegations in the original complaint, that the defendant Webster Wellbanks was doing business under the firm name of Wellbanks & Co., and that said name was and is a fictitious name. In this amended complaint plaintiff added a second cause of action, namely, for money had and received. In the amended complaint the caption was changed accordingly, and Webster Wellbanks was also joined as an individual defendant. On January 17, 1925, plaintiff filed a second amended complaint, with no change in caption or new parties brought in. In this second amended complaint plaintiff set up the same cause of action as in the preceding complaints, with the addition of a cause of action on an open book account. In each case the demand was for the same amount. Plaintiff in this second amended complaint alleged that the tomatoes in question were shipped to defendant by Bryant Produce Company, which was a copartnership composed of A. J. Bryant and Leon Kasonier; that said firm had been dissolved, and that plaintiff Bryant was the owner of all of the assets of said firm through assignment from the former partner, Leon Kasonier, including the claim sued on. The second amended complaint was filed by leave of court after due notice to defendant and a hearing. Defendant's demurrer to the second amended complaint having been overruled, answer was filed, issues joined, and trial had.

[1] Appellant here contends that the court's action in allowing the filing of this second amended complaint was error justifying a reversal of the judgment. It is appellant's contention that it was a clear abuse of discretion to allow such amendments after the lapse of time from the filing of the original complaint, namely, one year and half; and appellant further contends that the amendment as made was actually the substitution of a new cause of action. Nowhere throughout the lengthy and detailed brief of appellant on this point does he specify or urge any harm resulting to him by reason of the amendments allowed. In the absence of some claim that injustice or hardship resulted from the court's action, we do not feel that any abuse of discretion can be shown.

[2] As to the second amended complaint substituting a new cause of action, the record cited discloses that at all times the cause of action remained the same. The only difference apparent is that the defendant, originally sued as doing business with another, is in the later pleadings named as conducting his individual business under a company name, and the further difference that plaintiff in his original complaint set forth that the tomatoes were shipped to defendant by himself, while in the last amended complaint it is alleged that the shipment was made by a firm of which plaintiff was a member and the claim for payment subsequently assigned to plaintiff. Throughout the entire file of pleadings it appears that there was but one cause of action, wherein plaintiff alleged an indebtedness of defendant arising out of a shipment of tomatoes. Whether the cause of action was originally in plaintiff, or whether it had been assigned to him, would not materially alter the cause of action itself, nor change the defense thereto. As was stated in Union Lumber Co. v. Schouten & Co., 25 Cal. App. 83, 142 P. 911:

"As both complaints were for the recovery of the price of the same lot of goods, the action itself, irrespective of the theory on which the right to recover is based, must be regarded as having been commenced when the original complaint was filed."

A leading case on the subject of permitting amendments is Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 422, 64 P. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53. Many cases are therein reviewed, and the rule approved that, where the cause of action set up in the original complaint and that set up in the amended complaint was simply the obligation sought to be enforced—that is to say, the obligation to pay the money agreed to be paid—and the only change that took place was in the remedy by which it was sought to enforce the obligation, there was no change in the cause of action. In this case we find this language:

"An action is nothing else than the right or power of prosecuting in a judicial proceeding what is owed to one," which is but to say, an obligation. * * * The action, therefore, springs from the obligation, and hence the 'cause of action' is simply the obligation."

In Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 244 P. 1077, an amendment was permitted making additional heirs parties plaintiff in an action for wrongful death. The court says, at page 300 (244 P. 1081):

"There is no merit in the contention that the amendment would have substituted a new and distinct cause of action for the one pleaded. This contention has been put at rest by many decisions of this state"—citing Frost v. Witter, supra.

See, also, Oberkotter v. Woolman, 187 Cal. 505, 202 P. 669.

In the case of Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 174 P. 305, the court again goes into the question of amendments at great length, and approves the rule of Frost v. Witter, and goes even beyond the liberality therein allowed, saying:

"An amendment which changes the alleged date of a contract, or the sum to be paid, or any particular of the matter to be performed, or the time or manner of performance, changes in one sense the cause of action; but it is not in this sense that the rule is to be understood. Amendments of that character, so long as the identity of the matter upon which the action is founded is preserved, are admissible. * * * So long as the form of action is not changed, and the court can see that the identity of the cause of action is preserved, the particular allegations of the declaration may be changed, and others superadded, in order to cure imperfections and mistakes in the manner of stating the plaintiff's case."

See, also, 21 California Jurisprudence, p. 200.

In the instant case the change wrought by the amendments made no material difference. The one cause of action was to recover from defendant the price of two carloads of tomatoes. At the outset plaintiff alleged, as stated, shipment to have been made by himself to defendant and one Day as partners doing business under the name of Wellbanks & Co. By the amendments he alleged that the original shipment was by a firm comprised of plaintiff and another person, and that the cause of action was assigned to plaintiff, and further changing the allegation concerning defendant, so as finally to allege that defendant Wellbanks alone does business under the name of Wellbanks & Co. Under the amended pleading, defendant was allowed any set-off he might have had against the assignor, as well as against plaintiff, and at the trial it was admitted that defendant Wellbanks alone constituted Wellbanks & Co. A successful defense to the amended pleading would have been a bar to any claim urged by plaintiff or his assignors.

As hereinbefore noted, defendant filed his answer and joined issue on the second amended complaint, denying specifically the allegations thereof, and a full and complete inquiry was had into all of the issues presented. In the answer filed it was not denied that the claim was originally in plaintiff and his then partner, nor was it denied that the claim had been duly assigned and transferred to plaintiff. Therefore we hold that the action of the trial court in permitting the amended complaints to be filed was not erroneous, and affords no ground for reversal of the judgment.

[3, 4] The appellant argues that the plaintiff respondent has no legal capacity to sue herein. The facts pertinent to this inquiry are as follows: In February, 1922, at the time of the transaction involved here, A. J. Bryant and one Leon Kasonier were partners doing business in the state under the name of Bryant Produce Company, which name and designation was fictitious within the meaning of sections 2466-2468 of the Civil Code. These two partners thus doing business had never filed in any of the counties of this state any certificate as by these sections required. In July of 1922 the partnership of Bryant and Kasonier was dissolved and upon the said dissolution Kasonier assigned to Bryant all of Kasonier's interest, right and title in and to the assets of Bryant Produce Company, including the claim of the said partnership against defendant Wellbanks. A. J. Bryant thereafter continued to do business, and prior to the first trial of this action complied with the provisions of sections 2466-2468 of the Civil Code, and ever since has been doing business under the name Bryant Produce Company.

Appellant contends that inasmuch as the persons originally doing business under the fictitious name of Bryant Produce Company had filed no certificate as required by the sections cited, no action can be maintained on the claim. Section 2468 provides:

"No person doing business under a fictitious name, or his assignee or assignees, nor any persons doing business as partners contrary to the provisions of this article, or their assignee or assignees, shall maintain any action upon or on account of any contract or contracts made, or transactions had, under such fictitious name, or in their partnership name, in any court of this state until the certificate has been filed and the publication has been made as herein required."

It is contended that this present plaintiff, being in effect the assignee of the defaulting partnership, cannot maintain the present action upon or on account of any contracts made under the fictitious name. Sections 2466 et seq. of the Civil Code have been before the court in many cases, and the effect and scope of said sections is now rather definitely settled. In Rudneck v. Southern California M. & R. Co., 184 Cal. 274, 193 P. 775, it is said:

"The fact, if it be a fact, that publication has not been made, is but matter of abatement. This is now settled."

Without citation of authority other than this one case, it is indisputable that the Code sections referred to place no restriction on the capacity to contract; in other words, a person or persons doing business under a fictitious name may freely contract without restraint, and as against him or them such contracts may be enforced, the statute withholding, however, the right from him or them to enforce these contracts in cases of failure of compliance with the statutory terms, and even then only when the default or delinquency is urged. The only penalty for noncompliance with the statute is that an action cannot be maintained until compliance is had. It is sufficient if there be compliance with the statute at any time before trial. Rudneck v. S. Cal. Co., 184 Cal. 274, 193 P. 775; Goodman v. Anglo-Cal. Trust Co., 62 Cal. App. 702, 217 P. 1078. In Roullard v. Gray, 38 Cal. App. 79, 175 P. 479, it was held sufficient compliance with the statute if the acts required occurred before the motion for nonsuit was filed. In Vance v. Gilbert, 178 Cal. 578, 174 P. 43, it is said:

"The only penalty of a failure" to comply with the requirements of section 2466 et seq., Civil Code, "is that such a partnership cannot maintain an action until it has complied with those sections."

In Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 154, 13 P. 314, the court says:

"The only penalty attached by the Code to a failure to file the certificate is the legal incapacity to maintain an action upon any contracts made or transactions had in their partnership name.' * * * There is no disability imposed to make contracts or to have transactions."

In 45 A. L. R., commencing at page 198, is found an exhaustive annotation on the subject of "Fictitious Name," and the decisions of many states are digested and compared. The California rule follows the great weight of authority, which announced the doctrine that a failure to file the certificate required by statute does not invalidate the contract or other transaction, or destroy the right of action, but operates only upon the remedy, and then only until the requirements have been met. It will thus be noted that the contention of the appellant here, to the effect that the contract with Bryant and Kasonier was a void and illegal contract by reason of the failure of the partners to file the certificate required by law, cannot be sustained.

The contract itself, then, being a valid binding contract, a chose in action, was assignable and transferable without any peculiar restriction of any kind. The sections of the Civil Code as amended in 1911 require the filing of the certificate before any action may be maintained by an assignee. Prior to the amendment it was settled law in this state that, notwithstanding the failure of any partnership in respect of filing the required certificate, the penalty was so far personal as not to affect suit by an assignee of the claim or demand. So, therefore, in the instant case we have a legal binding claim in the hands of an assignee, whose assignor was in partnership doing business within the statutes and neglecting to comply with the terms thereof.

[5, 6] But before we apply the rule to the facts of the present case there is one other point which must be considered. The law appears to be that, in an action by an individual or partnership, within the statutes, compliance with statutory provisions relating to the doing of business under assumed or fictitious names, or designations not showing the names of the partners, need not be alleged by the plaintiff, but that noncompliance is a matter of defense, and that objection to the legal capacity of the plaintiff to sue based on this ground must be raised in some appropriate way, as by demurrer if the incapacity appears on the face of the complaint or petition, or by answer or plea in abatement, or the objection will be deemed to be waived. Annotation, 45 A. L. R. 270. The objection must be taken by demurrer if the grounds for it appear on the face of the complaint, or by answer if they do not; otherwise, it is waived. There seems to be no other tenable position to be taken on the question, and this court has substantially so held in Mora v. Le Roy, 58 Cal. 8, and Swamp & Overflowed Land District No. 110 v. Feck, 60 Cal. 403. See Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 155, 13 P. 313, 15 P. 451.

In Holden v. Mensinger, 175 Cal. 300, 165 P. 950, the complaint on its face showed that the copartners were doing business under a fictitious name, and the complaint itself did not aver a compliance with sections 2466 and 2468, Civil Code, and appellants contended that an averment of such compliance was necessary when upon the face of the pleading the fictitious name of the partnership appears. The court said:

But the cases cited do not decide, "nor does any other case decide, as appellant contends, that this omission is a 'fatal defect.' The omission merely subjects the complaint to the special defense of a plea in abatement."

In Cook v. Fowler, 101 Cal. 89, 35 P. 431, it is said:

"There is but a single point made by appellant. It is that the complaint shows that plaintiffs were copartners under a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners, and that they have failed to aver or prove a compliance with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. * * * The point is not well taken. The failure to make, file, and publish the certificate in question is matter of defense, to be set up by defendants, and, not having been so taken, is waived."

In Paff v. Ottinger, 32 Cal. App. 442, 163 P. 231, appears this language:

"The final contention of the appellants is that the trial court erred in its refusal to allow them to file an amended answer, wherein they allege for the first time, a lack of legal capacity in the plaintiffs to sue arising out of their alleged failure to comply with section 2466 et seq., Civil Code, relating to the filing of certificates of partnerships under fictitious names. These have always been held to be dilatory pleas, which are waived by the failure in the first instance to plead them."

In a South Dakota case, Drake v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 24 S. D. 19, 123 N. W. 84, following the general authority, this is the court's language anent a plea setting up the defense of a failure to comply with a similar statute:

"Conceding, therefore, that a court would have the right, upon proper application, to relieve a party from the effect of such waiver upon good cause shown, * * * it could hardly be contended that an amendment such as we find in the case at bar would be in furtherance of justice. While there are certain pleas in abatement which should be looked on with favor, because, though interposed at a late hour, they may tend to the reaching of exact justice, yet it must be conceded, we think, that in a case of this kind, where the question in abatement goes to the right of plaintiffs to bring suit because they have not complied with some statutory provision unknown to the common law, and the compliance with which in no manner affects the justice of the cause of action, the trial court * * * would clearly have abused its discretion in allowing such a plea."

[7, 8] In the present case the action is brought by an assignee of a partnership. We can conceive of no good reason why a different rule should apply than in an action brought by the original partnership. The defense is the same in either case and is met by the same proof. The assignee stands in the place of his assignor, and compliance with the statute even after suit brought may be effectual in the case of an assignee. Henning v. Clark, 46 Cal. App. 552, 189 P. 714.

Summing up, then, we have here a valid, legal, unpaid demand, due to a partnership which has failed to comply with the required provisions as to doing business under a designation not disclosing the names of all of the members of the partnership. The claim is assigned and the assignee brings suit to enforce the same. The assignee alleges the existence of the prior assigning copartnership and the obligation due thereto from the defendant, and then alleges the assignment to plaintiff. Defendant by answer does not deny the existence of the partnership nor does he deny the assignment. In the answer of defendant he raises no objection and tenders no issue as to compliance or noncompliance with the statute by Bryant and Kasonier doing business under the name of Bryant Produce Company.

Plaintiff, as heretofore detailed, after the dissolution of the prior partnership, did continue to do business individually under the name and designation "Bryant Produce Company," and alleged that fact in his complaint, together with the allegation of compliance with sections 2466-2468, Civil Code. The answer is as follows:

"Defendants deny that the above-named plaintiff at any of the times in said second amended complaint mentioned duly, or otherwise or at all, whether individually or in association with, or for, any other person, business association or company, complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code of the state of California, nor did any other person, individual, business association or company in association with or for said plaintiff so comply with the provisions mentioned."

Then by way of a further, separate, distinct and independent defense:

"Defendants allege, state, and show that said plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue herein or to maintain the present action, and in this behalf these defendants allege and show that at none of the times in said second amended complaint mentioned, and or more particularly prior to, during and/or after February, 1922, and or more particularly at the time of the commencement of the present action, and thereafter, said plaintiff, whether individually or in association with, or for, any other person, business association or company, wholly failed and neglected to comply with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, nor did any other person, individual, business association or company in association with or for said plaintiff so comply with said provisions."

Thus it appears that the only defense urged was as to the capacity of plaintiff and the compliance by plaintiff with the provisions cited. On this issue the court found that plaintiff, A. J. Bryant, prior to the first trial of the action, complied with the provisions of sections 2466-2468, Civil Code of California, and ever since has been doing business under the fictitious name of "Bryant Produce Company." This finding is amply supported by the evidence, and answers all the issues raised in the pleadings. We conclude that the capacity of plaintiff's assignors was not before the court by appropriate pleading, and the defense, not being pleaded, was waived.

[9] While we are content to thus dispose of appellant's point, it does not follow that we hold that the filing of the certificate by plaintiff herein was in itself insufficient. The exact question has never arisen in this state, or elsewhere, as far as our research discloses. Upon analysis of the present situation it may be doubted whether a surviving partner, taking over the assets of a firm through purchase of the retiring partner's interest, is an assignee of the firm. In this case Bryant, as a partner of Kasonier, took by purchase and transfer simply the interest of the latter, he (Bryant) already owning one-half. Therefore, if he held the claim of Bryant and Kasonier partly as original owner, it is clear he has sufficient personal and individual right to exclude him from the classification of an assignee, and to that extent at least he would be holding the claim still in the capacity of one doing business under the name chosen to designate the original partnership, and his compliance with the statute even at a later date would be sufficient. On this point there is a strong analogy presented in the case of Henning v. Clark, 46 Cal. App. 551, 189 P. 714, where a firm upon dissolution vested a claim in one of the former partners, and the court permitted compliance with the statute, even after dissolution, though the certificate filed did show the names of the original partners.

In Isom v. Shields, 69 Cal. App. 517, 231 P. 587, the partnership had been dissolved by the death of a partner, and prior to the dissolution there had been no compliance with the statute. The court there approved an assignment by the surviving partner, but it appeared that the partnership had been dissolved within 30 days of its formation, and therefore under the Code it was not in default in compliance. The Code provided, in section 2468, that the certificate must be filed within 30 days after commencement of the business.

Appellant next contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings or the judgment based thereon. On this point we find a real conflict in the evidence, and with this discovery our search ends. Very little evidence was offered by either side. Defendant offered nothing concerning the transaction involved, other than that he was called as a witness by plaintiff under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff claimed that he had sold certain goods to defendant, and defendant, admitting receipt of the goods, claimed that he had purchased them from a third party, and that plaintiff had no interest in the transaction, or in the goods delivered. There is ample evidence to support the court's finding in favor of plaintiff.

Lastly, defendant complains of certain of the trial court's rulings in the admission and rejection of testimony. We have examined carefully the rulings complained of, and find no prejudice resulting to appellant. The greater part of the objections go to the admission of freight bills and shipping instructions given by plaintiff to carriers and others, the effect being to prove the ownership of plaintiff in the goods involved. The point urged by appellant is that he was not a party to these transactions and not bound thereby. However, he admitted receiving the very goods in question, and the effect of the proof received was simply to prove ownership in plaintiff. The fact of ownership in itself was but one step in plaintiff's proof, and following this proof plaintiff did show knowledge on the part of defendant of the ownership, or at least such facts as would compel an inference of knowledge on the part of defendant.

Finding no reason why the judgment of the trial court should be disturbed, the judgment is affirmed.

McKENZIE v. LOS ANGELES LIFE INS. CO.
et al. (Civ. 3479.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Jan. 7, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 479(2)—Court's denial of supersedeas on appeal from order denying change of venue in action upon accident and health policy held discretionary (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 949, as amended by St. 1927, p. 874, $\S$ 3).

In suit on accident and health policy, the court's denial of supersedeas on appeal from an order denying change of venue held, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 949, as amended by St. 1927, p. 874, $\S$ 3, discretionary.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 478—In application for writ of supersedeas on appeal from order denying venue change, applicant should show special reason why entitled to stay.

In an application for a writ of supersedeas on appeal from an order denying a change of venue, the applicant should show some special reason why he is entitled to the stay in order that the court may have a basis for the exercise of discretion in his favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County.

Action by James H. McKenzie against the Los Angeles Life Insurance Company, formerly known as the Mutual Indemnity Accident, Health & Life Insurance Company of California and the People's Mutual Life Insurance Company. From an order denying change of venue, the People's Mutual Life Insurance Company appeals and applies for writ of supersedeas. Writ denied.

Alfred B. Weiler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. J. Henderson, and W. A. Green, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The above-entitled cause is on appeal in this court from an order of the trial court denying the motion of the appellant, People's Mutual Life Insurance Company, for an order changing the place of trial from Sacramento county to the city and county of San Francisco. The appellant has applied for "a writ of supersedeas * * * staying and restraining the trial of said cause" pending the final determination of the appeal. Section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by St. 1927, p. 874, $\S$ 3, provides that an appeal from a judgment or order "does not stay proceedings, without a writ of supersedeas, where it adjudges the defendant guilty of usurping, or intruding into, or unlawfully holding a public office, civil or military, within this state, or where the order grants, or refuses to grant, a change of the place of trial of an action."

[1, 2] A mere reading of the section shows that the provision for a stay of proceedings in case of an appeal from an order denying a change of venue is not mandatory. If it were mandatory in all cases it would lead to "a most vicious practice. Every case in which one party sought delay would have to be continued upon an application for change of venue, however frivolous or imperfect it may be presented." Hibbard v. Chipman, 1 Cal. Unrep. 16. The most that can be said in favor of such an application is that the granting of a stay is discretionary. The applicant should show some special reason why he is entitled to the stay in order that the court may have a basis for the exercise of its discretion in his favor. No such reason appears in this case. The action is an ordinary one for the recovery, on appellant's policy of accident and health insurance, of monthly payments due for the loss of time caused by an alleged accident in which the plaintiff was injured. The grounds upon which appellant's application is based would exist in every case of denial of a change of venue. As said by this court in People v. Pi- azza, 59 Cal. App. 43, 45, 209 P. 1017, 1018, "without passing on the merits of the appeal, it may be said that an examination of the record discloses nothing to influence the court's discretion in favor of the issuance of the writ."

The application is denied.

In re MAZURAN. (Civ. 6036.) *

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 10, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 8, 1928.

1. Attorney and client §52—Accusation held sufficient to state cause of action for disbarment of attorney and sufficiently certain in allegations of wrongdoing.

In disbarment proceedings, accusation alleging that accused, knowing of client's physical infirmity and mental incapacity, secured from him a $25,000 note secured by mortgage on certain realty, a contract of employment as his attorney for year at compensation in same amount with necessary expenses, and a general power of attorney to handle all his affairs, and procured him to convey certain realty to his niece, by use of undue influence to defraud him, by persuading him that such transfers and documents were necessary to protect him against certain creditors, procured dismissal of actions to set aside such transfers, assigned note and mortgage to third person to shut off defenses, and caused assignee to commence action to foreclose, and that client was cheated, wronged, and defrauded by such acts, held sufficient to state cause for disbarment and sufficiently certain in allegations of wrongdoing.

2. Attorney and client §52—Verification of accusation in disbarment proceedings held sufficient, though not stating that facts recited are true of affiant's own knowledge (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 291, 446).

Verification of accusation in disbarment proceedings, stating that affiant is duly appointed, qualified, and acting guardian of accused's former client, an incompetent, has read and knows contents of accusation, and that all facts, matters, and charges therein are true, held sufficient as in accord with Code Civ. Proc. § 291, though not stating that facts therein recited are "true of his own knowledge," etc., as provided by section 446.

3. Attorney and client §54—Accused in disbarment proceedings held not denied constitutional right because person verifying accusation was not called as witness.

Accused in disbarment proceedings held not denied constitutional right to be confronted with witnesses against him because person who verified accusation was not called as witness.

4. Witnesses §79(1)—Adjudged incompetency would be relevant, but not conclusive, on question of witness' mental unsoundness (Code Civ. Proc. § 1880).

In passing on question of mental unsoundness, disqualifying person to testify, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, the fact of an adjudged incompetency would be relevant, but not conclusive.

5. Witnesses §79(1)—Court held to have wisely exercised discretion in permitting testimony of client, of whose mental unsoundness only evidence was adjudication of incompetency and appointment of guardian of estate over year before trial of disbarment proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 1880).

Where client was adjudged incompetent and a guardian of his estate, but no personal guardian, appointed, over year before trial of disbarment proceedings against attorney, and such adjudication was only evidence of his mental incapacity, court wisely exercised its discretion in permitting him to testify as against objection that he was of unsound mind, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, at time of his production for examination, ability to properly handle and manage one's business and property being only remotely indicative of mental soundness.

6. Witnesses §255(2)—Witness held properly permitted to read his affidavit to refresh memory of certain incidents.

Witness, stating that he could not remember certain incidents occurring some two years back, held properly permitted to look over and read affidavit concerning them to refresh his memory, after testifying that he made, signed, and verified it at time when they were fresh in his memory.

7. Trial §41(5)—Attorney of record generally is not within rule prohibiting testimony by persons remaining in courtroom after exclusion of witnesses.

Attorney of record generally is not within rule that witness, present in courtroom during examination of other witnesses, in violation of order excluding witnesses therefrom until called, cannot testify.

8. Trial $\S$ 41(5)—Attorney of record for accuser in disbarment proceedings held properly permitted to testify, though present in courtroom after exclusion of witnesses.

One entered of record as one of counsel for accuser, though not actively conducting disbarment proceeding, held properly permitted to testify, though present in courtroom during examination of other witnesses after order excluding witnesses therefrom until called.

9. Attorney and client $\S$ 57—Appellate court will not retry disbarment proceeding, but will only determine existence of facts sufficient to uphold judgment, regardless of conflict.

Appellate court, on appeal from judgment disbarring attorney, will not retry case on evidence before it, determine witnesses' credibility and weight of testimony as matter of original jurisdiction, and disregard lower court's judgment, but will limit inquiry to determination of existence of facts sufficient to uphold judgment, regardless of conflict, which, however, must be real, not merely apparent.

10. Attorney and client $\S$ 53(2)—Evidence held to support judgment of disbarment for fraud on mentally and physically weak client.

Evidence held sufficient to support judgment of disbarment from practice of law for fraud on mentally and physically weak client.

11. Attorney and client $\S$ 53(1)—Client held not attorney's accomplice, so as to require corroboration of his testimony in disbarment proceeding, because of execution of note and mortgage on attorney's advice to defraud creditors (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

Illiterate and ignorant client held not accomplice of his attorney, within Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111, so as to require corroboration of his testimony in disbarment proceeding, because of his execution of note and mortgage on attorney's advice with intent to defraud his creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

In the matter of the disbarment of Marion J. Mazuran from the practice of law. From a judgment of disbarment, he appeals. Affirmed.

D. A. Knapp, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Collins & Collins, of Oakland (Everett H. Roan, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Upon an accusation charging Marion J. Mazuran, an attorney at law, with a violation of his professional duties and of acts involving moral turpitude, a trial was had in the superior court of Fresno county, which caused a judgment to be entered depriving the accused of the right to practice as an attorney and counselor in the courts of the state of California.

From this judgment the accused has appealed.

[1] Appellant insists at the outset that the accusation, admitting the facts therein stated to be true, does not contain facts to indicate or charge any conduct on the part of the accused sufficient to constitute a cause for disbarment. The accusation, in substance, alleges that one Steve Baker, a man of advanced years and infirm, was incapable of handling his business and personal affairs, and that, within ten months after the time of the dealings between him and the accused the said Baker was adjudged an incompetent by a court of competent jurisdiction; that in March of 1923 the accused, an attorney at law, knowing of Baker's infirmity and incapacity and playing upon Baker's sentiments by reason of the fact that accused and Baker had both been born in a foreign country and spoke the same mother tongue, procured Baker to execute and deliver to the accused a promissory note for the sum of $25,000, secured by mortgage on certain real property; that at the same time the accused secured from Baker a contract of employment, engaging accused as the attorney for Baker for a period of one year, and fixing the compensation of said attorney at $25,000, and providing also that Baker pay all the necessary expenses of said attorney, including hotel, traveling, and incidental expenses, and further authorizing said attorney to employ counsel or attorneys at law to assist him in the business or litigation of Baker; that at or about the same date accused secured from Baker a general power of attorney, giving to said accused full and complete power to handle any and all of the affairs of Baker; that on the same date or thereabouts accused procured and caused the said Steve Baker to set over and convey by deed of gift to one Todorovich, a niece of Baker, certain real estate belonging to said Baker; that the execution of all of the instruments as alleged was without consideration and not the voluntary act of Baker, and the same were induced by the use of undue influence on the part of accused as a plan to defraud the said Baker, by persuading and convincing him that such transfers and documents were necessary to protect Baker against certain named creditors, and that said instruments were executed by Baker without opportunity being given him to read the same, and no explanation of the contents thereof afforded; that, when said Baker became aware of the nature and effect of the instruments so signed by him, he consulted other counsel and commenced an appropriate action to have these transfers and agreement nullified and set aside; that thereupon the accused, and through his agents, procured the dismissal of said actions; that thereafter, to cheat and defraud said Baker, the accused made an assignment of said note and mortgage to a third person for the express purpose of shutting off any defenses that might exist against the original holder; that the accused caused the assignee of said note and mortgage to commence an action to foreclose the mortgage; that the said Steve Baker was cheated, wronged, and defrauded by the said acts of the accused.

Further, the accusation alleges generally the weakness, mental and physical, of Steve Baker, that he had full confidence in and relied upon the accused, and that accused took undue and fraudulent advantage thereof.

From this summary it is quite evident that the accusation withstands the attack of appellant in respect of its sufficiency.

Further attacking the accusation, appellant claims the same to be uncertain in its allegations to the extent that it cannot be gleaned therefrom wherein any wrongdoing occurs.

From a reading of the accusation, there is no merit in this contention. The accusation was full and specific, and gave to the accused exact knowledge of the charges made and which he would be called upon to defend against.

[2] Next the appellant urges that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the proceedings by reason of the fact that the accusation was not verified. In this respect appellant claims that, while there was an attempted verification, the same was insufficient.

The alleged attempted verification (omitting venue and jurat) is as follows:

"Louis Zivanovich, being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that he is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting guardian of Steve Baker, an incompetent; that he has read the foregoing accusation and knows the contents thereof; that the accusation and also all of the facts and matters alleged in said accusation are true; and also that all the charges therein contained are true."

It is appellant's point that the party verifying the accusation must say, the facts therein stated are "true of his own knowledge," etc., as provided by section 446, Code of Civil Procedure. The Code of Civil Procedure provides for the disbarment of an attorney, and outlines the procedure in section 289 et seq. Section 291 provides:

"The accusation must state the matters charged, and be verified by the oath of some person to the effect that the charges therein contained are true."

Th sufficiency of the verification is to be tested by section 291. We hold the verification to be in accord with the provisions of this section and the decisions construing the same. In re Collins, 147 Cal. 8, 81 P. 220; In re Morganstern, 61 Cal. App. 707, 215 P. 721.

[3] Appellant further urges that he has been denied his constitutional right by reason of the fact that the person who verified the accusation was not called as a witness. We deem the contention of little merit. No authority supports the claim. Appellant cites the time-honored provision of the Constitution to the effect that every person accused of crime shall have the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. Without further comment, we hold the argument unsound.

[4, 5] The trial of this matter in the court was commenced on March 30, 1925. Complaint is made that the trial court permitted Steve Baker to give testimony at the hearing. The complaint is based upon the fact that in November, 1923, the said Baker was adjudged an incompetent and a guardian of his estate appointed, the court expressly finding, however, that a guardian of the person of said Steve Baker was not required. No authority is cited in support of the argument made. Section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

"The following persons cannot be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination."

We think that the ability of a person to properly handle and manage his business and property is but remotely indicative of his mental soundness. True, in passing upon the question of mental soundness, the fact of an adjudged incompetency would be relevant to the inquiry, but, standing alone, would not conclude the matter. No other evidence on the question of mental capacity of Baker was offered. From the record before us, with particular reference to the examination of the witness Baker, we think that the court below exercised its discretion wisely in permitting Baker to testify. In People v. Harrison, 18 Cal. App. 295, 123 P. 200, it is said:

"The law fixes no standard whereby to measure the competency of a witness alleged to be of unsound mind," and therefore "the determination * * * is almost wholly in the discretion of the trial judge. * * * Indeed, we have been unable to find any decision where such ruling has been disturbed."

The subdivision quoted from section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, has received construction in People v. Tyree, 21 Cal. App. 707, 132 P. 784. Many cases are reviewed therein, and the conclusion reached agrees with the foregoing. We find no merit in appellant's claim of error on this issue.

[6] During the examination of a witness called by the accuser, the witness stated he could not remember certain incidents, as the events occurred some two years back. He was then asked if he had not made and signed and verified an affidavit concerning these incidents at a time when the same were fresh in his memory. On his affirmative reply he was permitted to look over and read the affidavit referred to for the purpose of refreshing his memory. The record before us does not show the contents of this affidavit.

In any event we feel the situation is well covered by the case of People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 213, 48 P. 75, as also People v. Selby, 198 Cal. 431, 245 P. 426.

[7, 8] The next point is that the court permitted one Oscar Collins, a witness on behalf of accuser, to testify, after the said Collins was shown to have been present in the courtroom during the examination of other witnesses, notwithstanding the court's order at the commencement of the trial that all witnesses be excluded from the courtroom until called. The record discloses the fact to be that said Oscar Collins, though not actively conducting the proceeding, was entered of record as one of the counsel for the accuser. We think any attorney of record does not come within the rule, generally, and, if any serious harm could have resulted from the court's action here, it is not shown. From the record before us, we find nothing in the claims of appellant save the claim that, because Collins was attorney for Baker and chief instigator of the proceeding, he came within the rule. The argument falls of its own weight.

[9] Finally, the appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment. This contention is that we, as a court of review, should practically retry the case upon the evidence before us—that we should determine the credibility of witnesses and the weight of the testimony as a matter of original jurisdiction, and disregard the judgment of the lower court. This we decline to do. There is nothing in the nature of a proceeding of this character that alters the general rule. In re Morton, 179 Cal. 510, 177 P. 453; In re Wharton, 114 Cal. 367, 46 P. 172, 55 Am. St. Rep. 72; Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 P. 322; In re McCowan, 177 Cal. 93, 170 P. 1100; In re Morganstern, 61 Cal. App. 702, 215 P. 721. Following the doctrine of the cases cited, we limit our inquiry to the determination of the existence of facts sufficient to uphold the judgment regardless of the conflict, qualifying this, however, to the extent that we regard only a real conflict as distinguished from one merely apparent.

[10] There was substantial evidence before the court which, if credited, showed this state of facts: Steve Baker was a Slavonian farmer of limited knowledge of business transactions and no knowledge of legal procedure. He had agreed to purchase from Phoenix Fruit Company a certain tract of land for the sum of $78,000, payable in yearly installments, and the last payment due some years hence. On this contract and in expenses incidental to the farming of the land, he had outlayed some $18,000 at most. In March of 1923 Baker had come to the conclusion that his venture was not a profitable one and that he could not pay out on it. As he was the owner of other lands, he feared that out of his undertaking a liability might arise that would involve his other holdings. He already had counsel, but he was advised to consult Mazuran, being told that the latter was an attorney of his own nationality and speaking the same language and a man of unusual attainments and legal ability, as the accused here modestly admits he is. Incidentally the property owned by Baker, aside from that under contract, would be of a valuation of about $50,000 at most, and then incumbered with a mortgage in the sum of $20,000. Baker accordingly met Mazuran and explained the situation to him regarding the Phoenix Fruit Company contract, and the relationship of attorney and client was shortly thereafter formed. Mazuran, the accused, then convinced Baker that the Phoenix Fruit Company contract could be set aside, and suggested a suit to that end, of which Baker did not approve and particularly sought to avoid. Mazuran thereupon secured from Baker a contract of employment, as alleged in the complaint (hereinbefore related), to perform all legal services necessary for Baker for an agreed price of $25,000, and caused Baker to make and deliver to him a note for that amount secured by mortgage on his own property, also advising Baker to make a gift deed to a niece of Baker's, subsequent to the mortgage, of the real estate exclusive of the Phoenix Fruit Company lands. At the time Baker also paid to Mazuran the sum of $1,200 in cash and at other times an additional amount of $300. During these proceedings Baker advised the accused that he had other counsel and suggested a conference. Mazuran dissuaded him from this, and convinced him that the other counsel would not give him the fullest service if they had not already betrayed him. Within a short time thereafter Baker did receive independent advice, and sought to repudiate the agreement and cancel the note and mortgage, and engaged counsel for that purpose. Then Mazuran again convinced Baker of the jeopardy attaching to his rights and had the proposed action deferred, at the same time stating that for the sum of $10,000 he would cancel the entire matter. Thereafter, and while a controversy still existed, Mazuran made an attempted assignment of the note and mortgage, and was instrumental in having the assignee commence action for foreclosure. The assignment so made was not in good faith, and was part of a plan and enterprise to cut off any alleged defense of Baker. It was further in evidence that there was no real controversy between Baker and the Phoenix Fruit Company, and that whatever difference or dispute might have arisen between them had been satisfactorily adjusted prior to the advent of Mazuran, which facts the accused could readily have learned. It also appears that the reasons given Baker in the securing of the mortgage were to the effect that, by divesting himself of all assets, no creditor could get the same on execution or otherwise. After Mazuran became aware that the Phoenix Fruit Company matter had been closed satisfactorily to Baker, he still refused to dismiss a suit he had instituted on behalf of Baker against that company, and became so indignant that he threatened the attorney for the Phoenix Company with disbarment proceedings on the ground of the latter's unethical tactics in dealing directly with Baker. The record discloses that Mazuran never did dismiss the action, but that a dismissal followed only after a substitution of attorneys under order of court in the guardianship proceedings.

We think these facts sufficient to support the judgment.

[11] Lastly, appellant contends that, if it is shown that the securing of the note and mortgage from Baker was with intent to defraud the creditors, then Baker was an accomplice, and his testimony, lacking sufficient corroboration, should be entirely disregarded. In other words, if an attorney advises an illiterate and ignorant client to commit a wrong, the attorney should be exonerated if the advice is followed. This last stand seems more like a confession than a contention. The accused was being tried for what he did, and not for what Baker did or what Baker wanted the accused to do. If Baker had plans not measuring up to a high moral standard, it surely was the duty of accused as an attorney to set him right and not to aid in the consummation of any plan of Baker of this nature. It is impossible that a case may arise wherein it would be held that one was an accomplice within the meaning of section 1111, Penal Code, and require corroboration even in a disbarment proceeding. The present case does not warrant such a conclusion.

Judgment affirmed.

FIRST NAT. HOUSING TRUST, LIMITED,
v. SUPERIOR COURT OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6095.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 11, 1928.

1. Divorce ⚡267—Court in divorce suit may appoint receiver and authorize him to sue to recover husband's property to pay alimony (Civ. Code §§ 137, 140).

While court in divorce suit is without jurisdiction to order receiver to seize property not included in judgment or which is claimed by one in possession not party to action, court has jurisdiction to appoint receiver to take possession of property of husband for purpose of carrying out orders relative to alimony, under Civ. Code §§ 137, 140, and may authorize receiver to maintain an action for the recovery of such property.

2. Divorce ⚡267—Order in divorce suit appointing receiver for interest of spouses in community property, and authorizing him to take possession and bring necessary actions, held valid (Civ. Code, §§ 137, 140).

Order in divorce suit, appointing receiver, during pendency of the action, of all the interest of the spouses in certain community property, and authorizing receiver to take possession and bring such actions that might be necessary, and requiring him to pay wife amount allowed her as alimony, held valid under Civ. Code §§ 137, 140.

3. Prohibition ⚡5(3)—Court acting within its jurisdiction in appointing receiver is not subject to prohibition to annul appointment.

Prohibition will not lie to annul the appointment of a receiver by a court acting within its jurisdiction.

4. Prohibition ⚡5(3)—Trustee alleging fee ownership in property under husband's deed held not entitled to prohibition to restrain proceedings for possession by receiver in divorce suit (Civ. Code §§ 137, 140, 863).

Trustee, claiming property as fee owner under deed from husband, held not entitled to prohibition to prevent receiver appointed in divorce suit from taking steps to secure possession of property under court's order, or to annul order as void, where husband's beneficial interest in property was not denied, since order appointing receiver for community property was within court's jurisdiction under Civ. Code §§ 137, 140, and interest of trustee was not inconsistent with existence of husband's beneficial interest in property under section 863.

Application by the First National Housing Trust, Limited, and others for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco, John J. Van Nostrand, Judge, to restrain proceedings under an order appointing a receiver. Writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

H. L. McAllister, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

E. R. Hoerchner and R. F. Mogan, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An original application for a writ of prohibition to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and to Eugene M. Levy, a receiver appointed in an action pending therein.

The petition, the averments of which are admitted by the respondents' demurrer, alleges that petitioner, First National Housing Trust, Limited, is a trust estate organized under the laws of Nevada; that petitioners A. E. Lasker and H. L. McAllister are its trustees; that petitioner first named, on or about January 22, 1927, by deeds from B. E. Priem, became the owner in fee of several parcels of real estate and certain personal property described in the petition, one of the parcels of real property being situated in Alameda county and the others in different counties in California. It also appears from the petition and the exhibits attached that before the execution of the above transfers B. E. Priem commenced in respondent court an action for divorce against Fannie F. Priem, his wife, to which the latter filed her answer, with a cross-complaint by which a divorce from Priem was sought, together with a division of the community property of the marriage. On December 24, 1926, the court ordered judgment for Mrs. Priem on her cross-complaint and a division of the community property in the proportion of 51 per cent. thereof to the cross-complainant and 49 per cent. to the cross-defendant. No findings of fact or judgment in the action have as yet been filed or entered. On February 18, 1927, the court made its order requiring Priem to pay to his wife as alimony the sum of $125 per month, and on April 4, 1927, a further order for the payment of $500 on account of attorneys' fees and costs. On April 8, 1927, upon the application of Mrs. Priem and after notice to her husband, an order appointing a receiver for the purpose of enforcing the orders for the payment of alimony, attorneys' fees and costs was made. In its last order the court found the property described in the petition herein to be the community property of the spouses, and Eugene M. Levy was appointed receiver during the pendency of the action of "all the right, title, and interest of B. E. Priem and Fannie R. Priem" therein and "of the rents, issues, and profits thereof." The receiver was authorized by the order to take possession of the property and to bring such actions as might be necessary, and was further required to pay to Fannie R. Priem the amounts previously allowed by the court for alimony, attorneys' fees, and costs.

The petition further shows that the receiver duly qualified in accordance with the order of appointment, that demand was made upon a tenant in possession of one of the parcels of real property for the payment of the rent to the receiver, and that an action for its recovery was commenced.

Petitioners contend that, in view of the conveyances made by Priem, respondent court was without jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, that the order was therefore void, and that further action thereunder should be prohibited.

[1] When an action for divorce is pending, the court may in its discretion require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself or to defend the action. Civ. Code, § 137. It may also require the husband to give reasonable security for providing maintenance or making any payments required under the above action, and may enforce the same by the appointment of a receiver or by any other remedy applicable to the case. Civ. Code, § 140; McAneeny v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 6, 87 P. 1020. A court is without jurisdiction to order its receiver to seize property not included in the judgment (Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 421, 50 P. 549; Staples v. May, 87 Cal. 178, 25 P. 346), nor may it authorize the seizure of property which is claimed by one in possession who is not a party to the action (Stuparich Mfg. Co. v. Superior Court, 123 Cal. 290, 55 P. 985; Tapscott v. Lyon, 103 Cal. 297, 37 P. 225; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 P. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192), but it may nevertheless authorize the receiver to maintain an action for its recovery (Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 405; Miller v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. App. 1, 217 P. 817).

[2] In the present proceeding it is alleged that the First National Housing Trust, Limited, is a trust estate and the owner in fee of the property described. These allegations are not inconsistent with the ownership of a beneficial interest in the property by Priem (Civ. Code, § 863); and the order of respondent court limited the power of the receiver to the right, title, and interest of Priem and his wife therein. While the order authorized the receiver to take possession of the property and the rents, issues, and profits, its provisions when read together clearly show that that was not the intention of the court, nor did it attempt to compel the relinquishment of possession by those claiming the right thereto otherwise than by suit, which the receiver was authorized to maintain.

[3, 4] The court had jurisdiction to appoint the receiver (Civ. Code, § 140), and its jurisdiction was not exceeded by its order of appointment. Prohibition will not lie to annul the appointment of a receiver by a court acting within its jurisdiction (Takeba v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 469, 185 P. 406; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, supra), and the alternative writ is therefore discharged and the proceeding dismissed.

PEOPLE v. RAENTSCH. (Cr. 1509.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 11, 1928.

1. Embezzlement $\S$ 35—Proof of defendant's embezzlement of \$2,500 held not fatal variance, under indictment charging embezzlement of \$3,575.

Proof of defendant's embezzlement of $2,500 held to sustain indictment charging embezzlement of $3,575, as against claim that there was a material variance between pleading and proof.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 829(9)—Refusal to require jury to consider testimony in light of presumption of innocence held proper, where court instructed that defendant was presumed innocent.

Where court instructed that "defendant in criminal action must be presumed innocent until contrary is proved," and "in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown he is entitled to an acquittal," refusal to give requested instructions that jury must consider all testimony in light of presumption of innocence held justified.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 829(18)—Refusal to instruct that as between conflicting conclusions jury should acquit held not error, where jury was fully instructed on reasonable doubt.

Refusal of court to instruct that if two plausible and reasonable conclusions could be drawn from evidence, one pointing to guilt and other to defendant's innocence, jury must return verdict of not guilty, held not error, where jury was fully instructed on question of reasonable doubt.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 695½—Ruling which correctly refused to permit impeachment of witness' testimony before grand jury was not rendered erroneous by subsequent presentation of matter in grand jury transcript.

Action of court in excluding testimony introduced to impeach witness' testimony before grand jury, where ruling was correct because of insufficient foundation, was not rendered erroneous by subsequently presenting matter contained in grand jury transcript, especially where actual record of trial failed to show such matter.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1120(6)—Where record failed to show witness had been indicted, objection, on appeal, to exclusion of impeaching questions relative to dismissing indictment, held unavailing.

Objection, on appeal, that trial court refused to permit impeachment of state's witness by showing bias or prejudice on account of indictment against witness having been dismissed, presented nothing for consideration, where record failed to show that witness had ever been indicted.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1120(3)—Alleged error in excluding records in another case, not identified by record, held not reviewable.

Alleged error of trial court in sustaining objection to offer of records and files in another case presented nothing for review, where it did not appear what the nature of the action was, where it was pending, or of what the records and files consisted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Karl Raentsch was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Paul B. D'Orr and Thomas P. Cruce, both of Los Angeles (Bingham Gray, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement. He appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The indictment charged that appellant was intrusted by the complaining witness with the sum of $3,575 and that he embezzled the entire amount. The evidence showed that he was intrusted with the sum total named, but that he converted to his own use but part of it, the sum of $2,500. Appellant contends that in these circumstances there was a material variance between pleading and proof. The point is answered by People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 5 P. 240, in which case the Supreme Court said that "proof of the embezzlement of only a part of the amount charged was sufficient to support the information." See, also, People v. Riordan (Cal. App.) 250 P. 190, and People v. Ledbetter (Cal. App.) 259 P. 982.

[2] It is contended that the trial court erred in refusing to give two certain requested instructions. One of them was to the effect that "the defendant is presumed to be innocent, and this presumption of innocence abides with the defendant until after you have considered your verdict," and that the "presumption of innocence goes with you in your retirement to consider your verdict, and you must examine the evidence in the light of that presumption of innocence." The second requested instruction recited that "you must consider all of the testimony in the light of the presumption of innocence of the accused; that you must permit this presumption of innocence of the accused to abide with you until after you have reached a verdict; and that you must consider all of the evidence in the light of that presumption." Laying aside all question whether the first of these proposed instructions was objectionable because it contained the statement that the presumption abided with the jury "until after you have considered your verdict," and the second because it recited that the jury must permit the instruction "to abide with you until after you have reached a verdict," we think the trial court was justified in refusing to give both. The jury was instructed that "a defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved," and that "in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown he is entitled to an acquittal." A situation exactly like the one here presented was before the Supreme Court in People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 636, 77 P. 666. It was said in the opinion there rendered that, "as reasonable men of ordinary intelligence, the jurors must have known that the presumption of defendants' innocence mentioned by the court had reference to the entire trial and to all the evidence there adduced." It was accordingly determined that the trial court's refusal to give a requested instruction similar to the ones asked for here was not injurious to the appellants. People v. Miles has been followed as late as People v. Wolfgang, 192 Cal. 754, 221 P. 907.

[3] Appellant also complains of the refusal of the trial court to give an instruction to the effect that "if, from the testimony, there are two plausible and reasonable conclusions to be drawn, one pointing to the guilt of the defendant, and one pointing to the innocence of the defendant, then you are to accept the one pointing to the innocence of the defendant, and find a verdict of not guilty." The sole argument advanced by appellant in support of the point is embraced in a quotation from the opinion in People v. Corey, 8 Cal. App. 720, 97 P. 907. We think the case can afford no comfort to appellant, especially as the trial court here instructed the jury fully upon the question of reasonable doubt, a similar circumstance having been the controlling factor in the case cited.

A point made by appellant is introduced thus:

"The next question for the court is on the question of evidence and the refusal of the trial court to permit defendant to question and to attempt to impeach the witness Olson. In order to bring this question clearly before the court, it will be necessary to set out in detail the evidence and the rulings of the trial court. * * * At page 266 of the reporter's transcript, the defendant attempted to impeach the testimony of the witness Olson and that impeachment was assented to by the trial court. The reporter's transcript involving that matter is as follows."

Appellant then sets out in his brief several pages of matter shown in the transcript, from which it appears that certain impeaching questions were asked and answered. However, as shown by the extract, appellant's counsel sought to present to the witness a certain portion of his testimony given before the grand jury. Upon objection the matter referred to was handed to the trial judge for his inspection. The record then shows, as quoted in the brief:

"The Court: This is the testimony of the witness on the stand?

"[Counsel for appellant]: The testimony of the witness on the stand before the grand jury.

"The Court (after reading transcript): Objection sustained."

The record is barren of any attempt to show what was the testimony before the grand jury which was submitted to the court's inspection and upon which the judge based his ruling, but nevertheless appellant, immediately after quoting the language which evidenced the ruling, proceeds to say in his brief:

"The matter asked of the witness, as he testified before the grand jury, in which the court sustained an objection by the district attorney, and referred to [in] * * * the reporter's transcript, is as follows."

Then are set forth ten or a dozen questions and answers, a reference to Boos Bros. being contained in one of the answers. Before the grand jury transcript was submitted to the inspection of the trial judge, counsel for appellant, as shown by a portion of the transcript of evidence taken at the trial which is reproduced in the brief, had asked the question: "How many $1,500 payments did you make to Boos Bros.?" Objection was interposed to the question and the objection was sustained. Immediately after his quotation of matter asserted by him to have been taken from the grand jury transcript, appellant concludes thus concerning the point he presents:

"It will be seen that the question asked of the witness Olson and the ruling of the court thereon * * * which is as follows: 'Q. How many payments did you make to Boos Bros.?' [the objection and the ruling then being stated]—was prejudicial to the defendant when the court made his further ruling on the offer of the grand jury testimony, as heretofore set out."

[4] We understand from the state of appellant's brief that the point made here is that the trial court erroneously excluded the question which called for the number of payments made to Boos Bros. We understand further that the contention is that the ruling became erroneous only when the court had excluded whatever it was that was shown by the grand jury transcript. Such a position is untenable. The ruling on the question as to payments was clearly correct when it was made—indeed, so much seems to be admitted by the manner in which appellant makes his point—and it could not have been made wrongful by what happened afterward. The question was not called to the attention of the court, and no attempt was made to press it after the foundation for it was attempted to be laid. But the foundation was not laid, to the extent that the point could be considered here, even if the matter in the grand jury transcript had been presented to the trial court before the question was asked, for the reason that the actual record of the trial fails to show what the matter was which was contained in the grand jury transcript. In the transcript of Olson's testimony, up to the point at which he was asked about the payments to Boos Bros., there is no mention of those individuals, nor of the fact that any payments whatever had been made to them.

Appellant contends that the trial judge unduly limited the examination of Olson upon a certain point concerning which his counsel sought to question him. The examination related to what is termed in the record the "French village" transaction. The argument of the point is very meager and from it we are unable to detect a semblance of error in the rulings of the trial court.

[5] Appellant asserts in his brief that the witness Olson himself had been under indictment and that the indictment had been dismissed. He then complains that the trial court "refused the defendant the right to question the witness Olson as to his relations with the defendant on trial and to show whether or not there was any bias or prejudice of the witness Olson by reason of the fact that the indictment against the witness Olson had been dismissed." Unfortunately, however, appellant fails to direct us to any showing in the record that Olson had been indicted, or that any indictment against him had been dismissed. Nor are we shown what questions were addressed to the witness for the purpose stated in the brief, nor what objections were made which impelled the attacked rulings of the trial court, nor, in truth, are the rulings themselves pointed out. It would appear, therefore, that appellant gives us nothing to consider.

[6] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in sustaining an objection to an offer of the "records and files" in a certain case. The portion of the reporter's transcript to which our attention is directed shows such an offer, objection, and ruling, but we are not shown what the nature of the action was, where it was pending, nor of what the "records and files" consisted. The consideration of this "point," therefore, imposes no heavy labor upon us. We cannot perceive that it is meritorious and appellant must therefore be satisfied with our conclusion that it is not.

The contention is made that the trial judge was guilty of misconduct affecting the substantial rights of appellant, but the point is so evidently without merit that we forbear to incumber the official reports with a further mention of it.

Judgment and order affirmed.

EDWARDS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF
STATE OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ.
5870.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 9, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 8, 1928.

1. Divorce ⇨264—Wife is entitled, under appropriate circumstances, to order supplementary to execution of alimony judgment (Civ. Code, § 137; Code Civ. Proc. § 1007).

Under Civ. Code, § 137, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1007, wife awarded alimony in divorce suit is entitled, under appropriate circumstances, to an order supplementary to execution of judgment.

2. Mandamus ⇨4(1)—Writ of mandate should be denied, where remedy by appeal exists (Code Civ. Proc. § 1086).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, issuance of writ of mandate should be denied, where a remedy by way of appeal exists.

3. Mandamus ⇨4(3)—Where reversal of order dismissing proceeding supplementary to execution of alimony judgment on appeal would leave appellant in no better position, she may have mandate to enforce rights (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

Ordinarily, remedy for error by trial court in dismissing proceeding supplementary to execution of judgment awarding wife alimony in divorce suit would be by way of appeal, rather than writ of mandate, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, but in special circumstances, as where mere reversal of order would leave appellant in no better position than before for lack of power to compel issuance of order to which entitled, she may have mandate to enforce her rights.

4. Mandamus ⇨4(3)—Mandamus will issue to require restoration to calendar of dismissed proceeding supplementary to execution of alimony judgment, appeal providing inadequate remedy (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

As appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, from order dismissing proceeding supplementary to execution of judgment awarding alimony to wife in divorce suit would not provide adequate remedy, even if decided favorably to her, in that it would merely confirm her right to demand issuance of order without empowering her to compel hearing thereon, peremptory writ of mandamus to restore proceeding to calendar will issue.

Application by Hortense I. Edwards for a writ of mandate requiring the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, Fletcher Bowron, Judge, to restore to the calendar a proceeding supplemental to execution. Peremptory writ granted.

Charles M. Easton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Claude H. McFadden, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. It appears that some time prior to the filing of the petition herein petitioner was granted a decree of divorce from her husband, wherein she was awarded alimony; that several months thereafter, because of the fact that nothing had been paid by the husband on account of such alimony, he was cited for contempt of court. At the same time, but under a separate proceeding supplementary to execution, the husband was ordered to answer respecting his property. When the two matters came on for hearing, the judge then and there presiding required the wife to elect whether she would proceed by and through the citation for contempt of court, or by virtue of the proceeding supplementary to the execution of the judgment. Upon the declination and refusal of the wife to so elect, the court thereupon dismissed the proceeding supplementary to the execution and caused to be entered in its minutes an order of which the following is a part, to wit:

"* * * The court gives plaintiff the right of election as to whether he elects to proceed upon the examination of judgment debtor or the order to show cause re contempt, the court holding that the two proceedings are inconsistent with each other. The counsel for plaintiff refused to elect between the two proceedings and the court then orders the proceeding in re examination of judgment debtor dismissed, to which plaintiff enters his exception. * * *

By virtue of a writ of mandate petitioner seeks to have the proceeding supplementary to the execution restored to the calendar of the lower court, to the end that the husband may be required to answer regarding his property.

[1] The question first raised by respondents as to whether, in an action for divorce where alimony is awarded the wife, under appropriate circumstances she is entitled to an order supplementary to the execution of the judgment. No authorities directly in point are cited. However, the provisions of the statutes would seem to be ample. Section 137 of the Civil Code gives the right to execution in satisfaction of an order of "alimony" during the pendency of an action for divorce; and section 1007 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"Whenever an order for the payment of a sum of money is made by a court, pursuant to the provisions of this Code, it may be enforced by execution in the same manner as if it were a judgment."

[2] No attempt is made by respondents to justify the "inconsistency" between the alleged contempt of court and the proceeding supplementary to the execution, as suggested by the judge before whom the several matters were set for hearing. It is, however, urged by respondents that mandamus is not the appropriate remedy to correct the error, if any, made by the lower court.

Section 1086 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the writ of mandamus must issue "in all cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, in the ordinary course of law." Under such provision it is generally held that where a remedy by way of an appeal exists, the issuance of the writ of mandate should be denied. 16 Cal. Jur. 787, and cases there cited. It therefore becomes important to inquire whether the order of dismissal of the proceeding supplementary to execution of the judgment was an appealable order.

[3] Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which specifies the several instances in which an appeal may be taken, among other things, contains a provision in effect that an appeal will lie "from any special order made after final judgment." In the case of Stensland v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 172, 178 P. 549, it is ruled that an appeal lies from an order made on proceedings supplementary to execution. In the instant matter, it would therefore follow that ordinarily, if an error was committed by the trial court, the remedy of petitioner, if any, would be by way of an appeal, rather than by the force of a writ of mandate. However, it appears that in special instances where, for example, the effect of a mere reversal of the order from which an appeal might be taken would leave the appellant in no better position than that occupied by him in the first instance—that is to say, with a simple right to the issuance of the order, but with no power to compel it—the party aggrieved may have a mandate to enforce his rights. The point is illustrated in the case of Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 P. 11, where a petition was presented to the court for a writ of mandate requiring the respondents to issue execution on a judgment. In that case Chief Justice Beatty, in speaking for the court, said in part:

"* * * Here it is suggested there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal from the order overruling the motion for execution; but this remedy, although plain, is neither speedy nor adequate. The appeal, in the ordinary course, would not be decided for a long time, and pending the appeal there would be no security for the payment of the judgment; and, besides, nothing would necessarily result from an appeal beyond a reversal of the order, and this would merely confirm the right of the petitioner to execution—a right already complete. So that, unless the judgment of reversal was accompanied by a mandatory direction to order the issuance of execution, the petitioner would find himself at the end of his appeal precisely where he is now—with a right to demand the issuance of the writ, but with no power to compel it. Considerations such as these must have been the ground of decision in Garoutte v. Haley, 104 Cal. 497, 38 P. 194. * * *

In the case of Sullivan v. Superior Court, 185 Cal. 133, 195 P. 1061, the same rule was applied as affecting a writ of assistance.

See, also, Hunt v. Broderick, 104 Cal. 313, 37 P. 1040; Garoutte v. Haley, 104 Cal. 497, 38 P. 194.

[4] In the instant case, as in substance is pointed out in each of the cases to which reference has been had, an appeal from the order in question, if decided favorably to the appellant, would fail in providing an adequate remedy in that it would "merely confirm the right" of the appellant in the premises and leave her at the end of her appeal precisely where she is now—with the right to demand the issuance of the order supplementary to the execution of the judgment, but with no power to compel a hearing thereon.

So far as the proceeding supplementary to execution is concerned, let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

88 Cal. App. 131

SAN BENITO COUNTY v. RILEY, State Controller. (Civ. 5899.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 30, 1927.

1. Highways §99¼—Motor Vehicle Fuel Act imposes mandatory duty on state controller to draw warrants in favor of counties complying with act.

Under the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act (St. 1923, p. 571), controller has mandatory duty to draw warrants on state fund in favor of counties for certain amounts, and only justification for refusal to perform such duty is that county has failed to comply with conditions of act as to creation of proper county road fund for reception of money, and in making reports.

2. Highways §99¼—County complying with Motor Vehicle Fuel Act has right to moneys under act regardless of indebtedness arising under another statute.

Where county has complied with conditions of Motor Vehicle Fuel Act (St. 1923, p. 571) as to the creation of proper county road fund and in making reports, there is no statutory law expressly or by implication vesting authority in the controller to suspend operation of mandatory legislative act and thus deprive county of moneys to which it is admittedly entitled, pending settlement of disputed indebtedness between state and county, arising under statute entirely foreign to particular one involved.

3. Highways §99¼—Under Motor Vehicle Fuel Act, state controller must upon ascertainment of county's share of taxes deliver his warrants for amount fixed.

Under Motor Vehicle Fuel Act (St. 1923, p. 571), county's proportionate share of motor vehicle fuel taxes is subject to mathematical ascertainment, and controller not having power to suspend operation of act, it becomes his ministerial duty to draw and deliver his warrant for amount fixed, irrespective of what his power and authority may prove to be relating to settlement of other accounts.

4. Counties §214—In county's mandamus proceeding to compel controller to pay county share of taxes, court was without jurisdiction of special defense that county was indebted to state for support of feeble-minded persons, in view of remedy at law (Motor Vehicle Fuel Act; Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, 4078).

In proceeding by county for writ of mandate to compel controller to issue warrants to county for its share of taxes under Motor Vehicle Fuel Act (St. 1923, p. 571), court held without jurisdiction, equitable or otherwise, to determine merits of disputed indebtedness set up in special defense that county was indebted to state for support of feeble-minded persons, under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, remedy for adjudication of merits of disputed claims being obtainable by an action at law under section 4078.

5. Counties §214—In county's mandamus proceeding to compel controller's payment of taxes, county's failure to pay state for support of feeble-minded persons held no defense, in view of other remedy (Motor Vehicle Fuel Act; Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In proceeding for writ of mandate by county to compel controller to issue warrants to county for its share of taxes under Motor Vehicle Fuel Act (St. 1923, p. 571), controller held not entitled to set up special defense that county was indebted to state for support of feeble-minded persons under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, in view of latter section confining enforcement of payment of such claims to the state commission in lunacy.

Petition for writ of mandate by the County of San Benito against Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California, to compel delivery to petitioner of certain state warrants under the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act. Writ granted.

See, also, 263 P. 352.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, and A. M. Runnells, Dist. Atty., of Hollister, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., and R. L. Chamberlain, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. The county of San Benito has petitioned this court for a writ of mandate to compel the state controller to deliver to the county certain state warrants for the payment of the total sum of $29,685.24, representing the county's share of moneys collected by the state pursuant to the terms of an act of the Legislature imposing a license tax upon the business of producing, refining, and distributing motor vehicle fuel, known as the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act. Stats. 1923, p. 571.

Answering, the controller expressly admits the allegations of the county's petition showing that according to the terms of said act the county is entitled to said warrants for the amount claimed, but he has interposed a special defense which in substance sets forth that the county refuses to pay to the state an alleged indebtedness in the sum of $13,336.44 incurred under the provisions of sections 2192 and 2193 of the Political Code for the support of feeble-minded persons committed to the Sonoma State Home by the superior court in and for that county. The prayer of the answer is:

"(1) That this court, as a court of equity, take up, consider and determine the respective claims of the plaintiff and the defendant as set forth in the pleadings herein, and adjudge the amount due respectively from one to the other. (2) That as a condition precedent to the issuance of any writ of mandate out of this court requiring said defendant to draw the warrants referred to in the pleadings herein, the said plaintiff, the county of San Benito, be required to pay to the controller in accordance with law, the sums so found by this court to be due from the plaintiff for the care and support of the inmates of the Sonoma State Home. * * *"

The county has demurred to the answer upon general and special grounds, among them being that the matters pleaded therein do not constitute a defense, and that in any event this court is without original jurisdiction to hear or determine the controversy pleaded in said special defense. We are of the opinion that the demurrer must be sustained.

The fuel act in question provides, among other things, that all money received by the state controller under its terms shall be deposited in the state treasury to the credit of the "motor vehicle fuel fund," and that after certain refunds are paid one-half of the money remaining shall be paid to the counties in the proportions specified in said act; that in the months of May and November of each year the state treasurer shall make a report to the controller for the preceding six months showing the condition of said fund, "and thereupon the controller shall draw his warrant upon the 'motor vehicle fuel fund' in favor of each county in the state for the amount to which each such county is entitled." And the act further provides: That "all such amounts so paid to the several counties shall be paid into a special road improvement fund. Such fund shall be expended by the county receiving it exclusively in the construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and culverts in each such county. In the event that any county has not established such a road fund, its proportion of such fund shall be retained by the state until provision for such a road fund has been made, and it shall then be paid over to such county." And, furthermore: That "the controller shall not draw such warrant in favor of any county which shall not have established such a road fund as is herein required or which shall be delinquent in its annual report to the state department of public works" as in said act required.

[1, 2] It will therefore be seen that there is a specific mandatory duty enjoined upon the controller by the terms of said act to draw warrants on the state fund in favor of the counties for certain amounts, and that the only justification for a refusal to perform such duty is that the county has failed to comply with the conditions of said act as to the creation of the proper county road fund for the reception of the money and in making said reports. Admittedly, the county of San Benito has not defaulted in either of these requirements; and there is no statutory law expressly or by implication vesting authority in the controller to suspend the operation of a mandatory legislative act and thus deprive a county of certain moneys to which it is admittedly entitled, and which are designed to be used for a specified purpose, pending the settlement of a disputed indebtedness between the state and the county, arising under a statute entirely foreign to the particular one involved; and, manifestly, in the absence of such statutory authority he may not do so.

A similar question was presented in the case of Posados v. City of Manila, 274 U. S. 410, 47 S. Ct. 704, recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the law as declared by the decision therein has direct application here. There the insular auditor of the Philippine Islands sought to enforce the settlement of an indebtedness claimed to be due the government from the city of Manila for the use of water by withholding from the city certain warrants in payment of the city's share of the internal revenue to which the city was entitled under the Philippine Administrative Code. In affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands granting to the city a writ of mandate directing the auditor and the internal revenue collector to deliver said warrants to the city, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Taft, said:

"It is apparent from reading the foregoing sections [sections 490-492, 494, 495, 497 of the Administrative Code] that they are directions by statutory law as to the distribution of the collections made by the internal revenue collector, and that the share to be paid to the city of Manila is fixed thereby, and the exact figure can be ascertained mathematically. This requires no exercise of discretion, judicial or otherwise, after the total amount of the internal revenue receipts are known, and in this case there is no dispute as to that amount. It becomes the ministerial duty of the internal revenue collector to draw his warrant for the share of the city thus fixed by statute. It becomes the duty of the insular auditor, when such a warrant of the internal revenue collector is presented to him, after ascertaining that the amount for which it is drawn is in accord with the directions of the statute, to countersign the same. Kendall v. United States, 12 Pet. 524, 9 L. Ed. 1181; Wright v. Ynchausti, 272 U. S. 640, 651, 652, 47 S. Ct. 229, 71 L. Ed. 454. No matter what the power of the auditor may prove to be with reference to the settlement of accounts as between the city of Manila and the metropolitan water board, or what his power with reference to enforcing the settlement so reached by him, nothing in the laws of the Islands is disclosed to us which enables the auditor in the enforcement of such settlements to dispense with or to suspend the operation of positive law in reference to the course which shall be followed in the disposition by the internal revenue collector of the receipts from internal revenue collections which he is directed by the statute to pay to the city. His duty is clearly set forth, and he has nothing to do but to comply with it, having ascertained exactly what the share of the city is under the foregoing provisions."

[3] And so here, there is a statutory distribution of the moneys collected by the state from the motor vehicle fuel taxes, and the proportionate share thereof to which each county is entitled is subject to mathematical ascertainment; therefore, when the amount is ascertained, the controller has not the power to suspend the operation of said act, and it becomes his ministerial duty to draw and deliver his warrant for the amount fixed by the statute, irrespective of what his power and authority may prove to be relating to the settlement of other accounts."

[4] Nor may the equitable powers of this court be invoked in a proceeding of this kind to aid defendant in accomplishing indirectly that which he may not do directly, namely, the withholding of the moneys admittedly due said county under the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act until there has been an adjustment and payment in full of the alleged indebtedness due the state from the county on the Sonoma State Home account, for the reason that in the absence of statutory authority the courts have no more power than the controller to suspend the plain, mandatory provisions of a legislative act. Moreover, this is a special proceeding, and, as in the case of Posados v. City of Manila, supra, wherein it was said that the only question involved was "what should be done with the share of the collections made by the internal revenue collector under the sections of the Administrative Code," the only matter presented for determination here is what shall be done with the collections made by the state under the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act. The question, therefore, as to whether or not the county is indebted to the state for the support of feeble-minded persons committed to the Sonoma State Home is one with which we are not here concerned.

Furthermore, this court, not being possessed of trial court powers, doubtless is without original jurisdiction, equitable or otherwise, to hear or determine the merits of the disputed indebtedness set forth in the special defense. As appears from the allegations of the special defense the state presented monthly claims against the county based upon said indebtedness which were by the board of supervisors rejected. Any adjudication of the merits of said rejected claims must therefore be obtained through the medium of an action at law (Pol. Code, § 4078), which affords either party a right of appeal from the judgment to be rendered therein. The original jurisdiction to hear and determine such an action is exclusively in a trial court.

[5] Finally, it would appear that the two exclusive remedies provided for by section 2193 of the Political Code for the enforcement of the payment of state claims against counties for the maintenance of feeble-minded persons committed to the Sonoma State Home must be exercised by the state commission in lunacy and that neither are available to the state controller. Said section declares that " * * * the state commission in lunacy may require the county treasurer by writ of mandate to pay to the state treasurer upon an order of the controller all amounts found to be due to the state, * * *" or that "said commission may, in its discretion, recover sums due from counties * * * by the presentation of claims against the board of supervisors. * * *" In view of the foregoing provisions, it would seem that in any event the subject-matter of state claims arising under said section may not be resorted to by the controller as a legal excuse for the refusal to perform the statutory duty imposed upon him by said act.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the demurrer to the answer is sustained, and the peremptory writ of mandate will issue as prayed except as to damages, the statute having made no provision for such allowance.

McCULLOUGH, Treasurer of County of San Benito, v. RILEY, State Controller.
(Civ. 5900.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 30, 1927.

1. Counties ⚡214—In county's mandamus proceeding for payment of fees, county's indebtedness to state for taxes and school lands held no defense (Motor Vehicle Act [St. 1923, p. 568]).

In county's proceeding for writ of mandate to recover its share of operators' and chauffeurs' license fees collected by state under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 568), controller's allegations that county was indebted to state on account of inheritance and property taxes and for the purchase of school lands held not to constitute a defense.

2. Counties ⚡214—In county's mandamus proceeding to compel payment of fees under Motor Vehicle Act, court was without jurisdiction of defense of county's indebtedness to state arising from other matters (St. 1923, p. 568).

In county's proceeding for writ of mandate to recover its share of operators' and chauffeurs' license fees collected by state under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 568), court held without jurisdiction to determine merits of defense of controller that county was indebted to state for collection of inheritance and property taxes and for the purchase of school lands.

3. Counties ⚡214—In mandamus proceeding, state's claim against county treasurer cannot be set off against county's claim against state for fees collected under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 568).

In county's proceeding for writ of mandate to recover its share of operators' and chauffeurs' license fees collected by state under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 568), claim of state against county treasurer for inheritance and property taxes and purchase of school lands cannot be urged as a set-off to county's claim against the state.

Petition by C. F. McCullough, as Treasurer of the County of San Benito in the State of California, against Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California, for writ of mandate, to be directed to respondent as state controller to compel delivery to petitioner of certain state warrants under the Motor Vehicle Act. Writ granted.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, and A. M. Runnells, Dist. Atty., of Hollister, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., and R. L. Chamberlain, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This proceeding in mandamus was instituted on behalf of San Benito county for the purpose of requiring the state controller to deliver certain state warrants for the payment of the total sum of $4,876.90 constituting the county's share of the state "Motor Vehicle Fund" collected by the state under the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 568). It is a proceeding identical in its nature to and involves the same main legal question presented in the one entitled "County of San Benito, Plaintiff, v. Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California, Defendant," numbered 5899, 263 P. 349, which has this day been decided by this court in favor of the plaintiff therein.

There the county was seeking to recover its share of motor vehicle fuel taxes collected by the state pursuant to the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act (St. 1923, p. 571), and the defense was that the county had refused to pay an alleged indebtedness to the state for the care of feeble-minded persons committed from that county to the Sonoma State Home. Here, as indicated, the county is seeking to recover its share of the operators' and chauffeurs' license fees collected by the state under the Motor Vehicle Act, the terms of which are similar to those of the Motor Vehicle Fuel Act with reference to the mathematical ascertainment of the counties' shares thereof and as to the specific mandatory duty enjoined upon the controller to draw and deliver his warrants therefor to each county, providing the county has complied with the requirements of said act by creating the property county fund for the reception of the money and in making its annual reports.

The controller here, as in the other proceeding, expressly admits the essential allegations of the petition showing that under the terms of the act the county is entitled to the delivery of the warrants for the total amount of money claimed, but he has interposed the defense that the treasurer of the county in whose official capacity this proceeding is being maintained has failed to pay to the state certain sums of money amounting in all to $5,750.88 claimed to have been collected by him for the state on account of inheritance taxes, property taxes, and the purchase of school lands; and the prayer of the answer is that this court, in the exercise of its equitable powers, adjust the claims of the respective parties and order withheld the warrants due the county until the treasurer pays the alleged indebtedness above mentioned.

[1, 2] In conformity with the conclusion reached in the other proceeding, it must be held here that the matters pleaded by the controller do not serve as a legal excuse for a refusal to perform the mandatory duty imposed upon him by the Motor Vehicle Act, nor do they constitute a defense herein, and, furthermore, that this court is without original jurisdiction to hear or determine the merits of the subject-matter thereof.

[3] The defense pleaded in the present proceeding is subject to this additional infirmity. The money which the state is withholding belongs, according to the terms of the act, to the county and not to the treasurer, the warrant therefor being made payable to the treasurer merely as the county's agent, whereas the liability for the alleged default in payment of the moneys claimed to be due the state as set forth in said special defense is against the treasurer alone, the money having been paid to him under the terms of various statutes as the fiscal agent of the state. The county is not concerned therewith, and, assuming that default occurs in payment of any portion thereof to the state, the county is in no way responsible. That being so, the alleged claim of the state against the county treasurer cannot be urged as a set-off to the county's claim against the state. Corbett v. Widber, 123 Cal. 154, 55 P. 764.

Plaintiff's demurrer to the answer is sustained, and the peremptory writ will issue as prayed for the delivery of said warrants and costs.

CULLINAN et al. v. McCOLGAN. *
(Civ. 6016.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Dec. 20, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 16, 1928.

1. Limitation of actions §199(1)—Where facts are agreed upon or ascertained, it is question of law whether demand is barred by limitations.

Where facts are agreed upon or ascertained, it is a question of law whether the demand is barred by the statute of limitations.

2. Limitation of actions §199(1)—Issue joined on plea of limitations, where evidence conflicts as to when cause of action accrued, is properly submitted to jury.

Where issue is joined on plea of statute of limitations and evidence is conflicting as to when, with reference to filing of complaint, a cause of action accrued, the question is properly submitted to jury as mixed question of law and fact.

3. Limitation of actions §199(1)—Case may not be taken from jury where plea of limitations is interposed and there is supporting evidence.

Case may not be taken from jury where plea of statute of limitations is interposed and there is evidence to support plea.

4. Appeal and error §932(1)—Appellate court would assume that verdict represented reasonable value of attorney's services for claims not barred by limitations.

Where attorney sued client for legal services rendered and client interposed defense of statute of limitations upon which court instructed jury, and client did not contend that all claims for services submitted to jury were barred, held appellate court would assume that verdict represented reasonable value of services which jury found not to have been barred by statute.

5. Attorney and client §165—Attorney representing client, where retainer is general, may be required to set out charge for each distinct matter.

Where retainer is general and attorney advised his client or performed services in number of distinct matters, he may properly be required to set out his charge for each distinct matter.

6. Attorney and client §140—Where services of an attorney relate to one subject-matter, it forms no just measure of value to separate transaction into parts.

When services of an attorney all relate to one subject-matter, it forms no just measure of value of services to separate transaction into parts and have attorney state what charge he made for each separate part.

7. Appeal and error §1033(7)—Where jury was instructed to make no allowance for attorneys' services not performed within limitation period, failure to prove particular service was not ground for complaint by client.

Where attorney testified in detail concerning services rendered and time when rendered, and jury was definitely instructed to make no allowance for any service attorneys had not proved to jury's satisfaction to have been performed within period of limitations, any failure of attorneys to prove particular service resulted in their disadvantage, and client may not complain, especially where he has waived right to raise point that evidence was not sufficient to justify verdict.

8. Partnership §140—Partnership held liable for attorneys' services, rendered on request of deceased partner, where surviving partner admitted attorney was employed for partnership (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

Contention of surviving partner that attorney employed by deceased partner was not employed for benefit of copartnership was without merit, where such partner, called as adverse witness, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, admitted that deceased partner employed attorney for copartnership business with his knowledge and consent.

9. Partnership §140—Partnership promising to pay held liable for attorney's services, though some of them were rendered for third persons.

Where attorney was employed by deceased member of partnership and some of services were rendered for benefit of third parties but employment was by and on behalf of partnership and partnership promised to pay for services, held it was liable for services.

10. Attorney and client $\S$ 130—Attorney need not be successful in litigation to recover compensation on quantum meruit.

Where surviving partner, sued by attorney for services rendered, contended that employment resulted in no benefit to partnership, held that it is not necessary that lawyer be successful in litigation and actually recover or preserve property for client before he was entitled to recover full value of services on quantum meruit.

11. Witnesses $\S$ 152—Attorney's testimony as to declarations of deceased partner held admissible in action against surviving partner; "executor or administrator;" "claim or demand against estate of deceased person" (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1880, subd. 3).

Testimony of attorney, in action against surviving partner for services, as to declarations, in absence of surviving partner, made to attorney by partner who died prior to commencement of action, held admissible, since action was neither against the "executor or administrator" nor a "claim or demand against the estate of deceased person" within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1880, subd. 3, in view of sections 1365, 1585.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Claim against Estate; Executor.]

12. Appeal and error $\S$ 1050(1)—Testimony of attorney as to profit made by deceased partner on loan, in action by attorney for services, held not prejudicial.

In action by attorney against surviving partner for services, rendered partnership, testimony of attorney as to profit made by deceased partner on loan, while immaterial as an element in determining value of professional services, was not prejudicial.

13. Pleading $\S$ 139—Court properly refused to permit partner to show attorney's services were in satisfaction of partnership claim, where it was not pleaded (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 437, 438, 439).

In action for services by attorney against surviving member of partnership, court properly refused to permit partner to prove services of considerable value were rendered under agreement that they were to be taken in pro tanto satisfaction of claim of partnership, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 437, 438, 439, where no counterclaim or set-off was pleaded in answer except claim for damages, which was abandoned.

14. Appeal and error $\S$ 932(1)—Where jury was instructed that partnership was liable for services rendered it by attorney only on partnership business, court on appeal must assume jury's award covered only such services.

In action by attorney for services rendered to partnership, where court instructed that partner would have no authority to make co-partnership liable for services, unless service concerned business of partnership, and burden of proving services were of that character was upon plaintiff, held that court on appeal can but assume that jury in its verdict awarded compensation only on business with which co-partnership was concerned.

15. Pleading $\S$ 236(2)—Refusal of request to amend answer, made at end of trial after case had been pending for 2½ years, was not abuse of discretion.

Refusal of request of defendant for leave to amend answer at end of trial, after case had been pending for 2½ years, was not abuse of discretion.

16. Appeal and error $\S$ 959(1)—Ruling in granting an amendment to pleading is subject to review only when there is an apparent abuse of discretion.

While court should exercise its power in granting amendments to pleadings freely and liberally in order that substantial merits of cause may be reached and determined, yet when court has exercised its power by granting or refusing an amendment, its ruling is subject to review only when it is apparent that an abuse of discretion has occurred.

17. Pleading $\S$ 236(1)—Application to amend pleading may be denied, where no showing is made to justify court's discretionary power.

An application to amend pleading may be denied, where no showing is made to justify court's discretionary power, or where there is negligence indicating bad faith.

18. Appeal and error $\S$ 1050(1)—Testimony as to value of attorney's services was not prejudicial where cumulative.

In action by attorney against surviving partner for services rendered partnership, testimony of witness as to value of services based on personal observation in certain case was not prejudicial, where it was merely cumulative.

19. Evidence $\S$ 571(7)—Testimony of experts as to value of legal services is not conclusive.

Testimony of experts as to value of legal services is not conclusive, nor does it necessarily control verdict of jury.

20. Trial $\S$ 260(1)—Refusal of requested instructions was proper, where covered by given instructions.

Refusal of requested instructions was proper, where matters were covered by given instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Eustace Cullinan and Thomas W. Hickey, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Cullinan & Hickey, against R. McColgan, as surviving partner of Daniel A. McColgan and R. McColgan, copartners doing business under the name of D. A. McColgan, and also under the names Daniel A. McColgan and R. McColgan, for legal services. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John L. McNab, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs, engaged in the practice of law, sued defendant Reginald McColgan, as surviving member of a copartnership of which his deceased brother, Daniel A. McColgan, was the other member, for the reasonable value of professional services rendered by plaintiffs to the copartnership. The action was commenced August 19, 1922. The copartnership is admitted by the pleadings, and so is the fact that it was engaged in a general loan and brokerage business. It is also admitted that the copartnership business was done under the names of both partners and also of each partner.

In the first count of their third amended complaint, plaintiffs allege that the partners, within two years immediately preceding the commencement of the action, became indebted to plaintiffs for services rendered, and that the reasonable value of such services so rendered within the two-year period was $28,525. In a second count of their third amended complaint, plaintiffs alleged that within four years immediately preceding the commencement of the action the two McColgans, as copartners, became indebted to plaintiffs, in the sum of $38,418.39, balance upon a book account for services and moneys advanced. A third count alleged that the McColgans as copartners became indebted to plaintiffs within four years immediately preceding the action on a balance due of $38,418.39 upon a mutual, open, and current account for services rendered and money advanced. In a fourth count it is alleged that the defendant, as surviving partner, is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $38,418.39 for services rendered and moneys advanced by plaintiffs to the copartners at their special instance and request. The fifth count asserts that on or about February 28, 1920, an account was stated between plaintiffs and the copartners by which it was agreed that a balance of $508.39 was owing for moneys advanced. A sixth count alleges that the copartnership and Reginald McColgan, as surviving partner, are indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $37,910, a balance owing on account of services, that the copartners agree to pay the reasonable value of the services, and that the reasonable value was and is $41,560, of which $3,650 had been paid, leaving a balance unpaid of $37,910 on account of services. Each count is supported by the customary averments. The death of Daniel A. McColgan is alleged and admitted in the answer to have occurred May 12, 1921.

In support of their complaint, plaintiffs filed an "amended and further bill of particulars." In this bill of particulars plaintiffs recited the services rendered, and that such services were rendered for and at the request of the McColgan partnership, and set forth the moneys advanced, the payments on account, the facts concerning their claim, and the charge they made for each separate piece of work. There is a summary and recapitulation in the bill of particulars in which plaintiffs separately list the services completed within two years prior to the filing of the complaint and the services completed within four but not within two years prior to that date.

The bill of particulars, besides being filed, was introduced in evidence as Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 118, and Mr. Cullinan testified to its correctness.

Reginald McColgan filed a verified answer to the third amended complaint, in which he admitted being the surviving member of the copartnership, but, by appropriate allegations, denied the indebtedness either for services rendered or money advanced, and denied that the services were rendered at the instance or request of the copartners, or either of them, denied any promise to pay, denied that the services were worth the amounts alleged or any other amount, denied that plaintiffs had advanced any money for the use or benefit of the copartners, and pleaded the statute of limitations as against each count of the third amended complaint. In addition, the defendant set up a cross-complaint in which he charged plaintiffs with having caused the copartners a loss of $6,278 by reason of their negligence as attorneys for the copartnership in failing to have the summons served on one William L. McGuire in an action which the copartners commenced against McGuire. To this cross-complaint plaintiffs filed an answer, denying negligence on their part or damage to defendants, alleging that Daniel A. McColgan and Reginald McColgan had expressly instructed them not to have the summons served in that matter and not to proceed further therein. Defendant, however, offered no evidence in support of his cross-complaint, and judgment of nonsuit was entered thereon.

The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $10,835.19.

At the trial, counsel for plaintiffs announced that plaintiffs had come to the conclusion that their books, as kept, did not constitute what the law defines as an open book account or an open, mutual, and current account, and that, in view of the plea by defendant of the statute of limitations, the plaintiffs wished to withdraw from the consideration of the jury their claim for services in any matter in which the services were not completed within two years prior to the commencement of the action. Plaintiffs also notified the court at the time that by reason of errors respecting dates they had included in group 1 (the two-year group) in the bill of particulars certain matters which ought properly to have been placed in group 2 (the four-year group). As a result of those adjustments, plaintiffs' claim was reduced to $26,955.69, of which $508.39 was a balance on an account stated for moneys advanced, and the remainder was the reasonable value of services alleged by plaintiffs to have been completed within two years.

At the trial, evidence was introduced of services rendered and completed more than two years prior to the commencement of the action for the limited purpose of showing that such services were of a reasonable value in excess of a sum of $3,650, which was paid to plaintiffs by the McColgans at various dates between October 12, 1917, and July 31, 1920, and by plaintiffs applied in payment for services then earliest in time of completion and not at that time outlawed.

The record contains a stipulation that the examination of jurors and the exhibits may be omitted from the record, "and that appellant has waived the right on appeal herein to raise the point that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict or judgment, or to raise any points other than those stated in the letter of Herbert W. Erskine to Eustace Cullinan, dated June 5, 1925."

Appellant has raised no points on this appeal that were not stated in the letter of his attorney, dated June 5, 1925, and it is admitted that the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict or judgment.

This limits the points urged for a reversal of the judgment to two general objections: (1) that recovery for some of the services presented to the jury was barred by the statute of limitations; and (2) erroneous rulings of the court.

As to the first point, it may be said that on motion of plaintiffs the court withdrew from the consideration of the jury all services which they deemed might come within the bar of the statute, and the court specifically so instructed the jury. In instruction XVI the jury was told that:

"Counsel for the plaintiffs, believing that the account which had been kept was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the law with reference to being either a book account or an open, mutual, and current account, has not presented the matter from that angle, so that that particular count of the complaint cannot be considered by you in fixing the amount of your verdict. You can consider the items set forth in the count in the complaint which claims that the reasonable value of the services is the total amount that was set forth in the bill, deducting from that amount the amount stated in group 2, and being barred by the statute of limitations, and I understand that in this substituted group, Mr. McNab, that you have included the case of King v. Crabtree, Huster v. McColgan, Courtney v. Kettler, all of which appear in group 1 of the original.

"Mr. McNab: We have conceded, if your Honor please, that they are barred by the statute of limitations.

"The Court: So you are not to consider, in determining the amount of your verdict, anything as being recoverable by the plaintiffs in the action in excess of the amount stated on this summary here before you, to wit, $26,955.69, of which a portion of that, the sum of $508.39, is contained in one other count of the complaint as being on an account stated."

And in instruction XXXIV the jury was instructed:

"That the plea of the statute of limitations is a legal plea as against every claim of the plaintiffs that is barred by the statute of limitations."

And in instruction XXXV:

"You are instructed that the plaintiffs cannot recover for any services they claim to have rendered, and which services were completed more than two years prior to the date on which this action was commenced. This action was commenced on the 19th day of August, 1922."

[1-4] In other words, the court withdrew from the consideration of the jury all services that the plaintiffs performed which were completed more than two years before the commencement of the action, and, further, at the request of defendant, instructed the jury specially that of the remaining services which plaintiffs claimed were not barred by the statute, the plaintiffs could not recover for any the jury might find to have been completed more than two years before the suit was filed. The facts concerning the time when the services were performed were presented to the jury, and we may assume that, in arriving at the verdict awarding plaintiffs $10,835.19, the jury excluded from its consideration any services that were completed more than two years prior to the commencement of the action. Where the facts are agreed upon or ascertained, it is a question of law whether a demand is barred by the statute of limitations (Reed v. Swift, 45 Cal. 255; Towle v. Sweeney, 2 Cal. App. 29, 83 P. 74), but where issue is joined on a plea of the statute and the evidence is conflicting as to when, with reference to the filing of the complaint, a cause of action accrued, the question is properly submitted to the jury as a mixed question of law and fact (Pacific Improvement Co. v. Maxwell, 26 Cal. App. 265, 146 P. 900; Towle v. Sweeney, supra; Crawford v. Duncan, 61 Cal. App. 647, 215 P. 573), and the case may not be taken from the jury where the plea of the statute is interposed and there is evidence to support the plea (Heilbron v. Heinlen, 72 Cal. 376, 14 P. 24). Appellant does not contend that the claims for all the services submitted to the jury were barred, and we must therefore conclude that the amount of the verdict represented the reasonable value of the services which the jury found not to have been barred by the statute.

Appellant contends that in Re Miles Baird there were, among other services, four actions in which the services were performed in 1917 or earlier, and on the theory that each of these was a complete proceeding, the claim for compensation for services in these matters was barred. The court's instructions concerning the statute of limitations were so clear and definite that, if any services rendered in the Baird matter were barred, the jury must be supposed not to have included compensation for them in the verdict. But there is evidence that none of the services in the Baird matter were in fact completed prior to the two years' period. These four matters were incidental to the main objective of the Baird litigation, so far as the McColgan's were concerned, namely, to establish Daniel A. McColgan's title to Miles T. Baird's interest in the David J. Baird estate, and none of these matters had terminated by the end of 1920, when plaintiffs ceased to represent defendant and his brother in them. The plaintiff Eustace Cullinan testified on this question as follows:

"Mr. McColgan brought me the three complaints and the temporary restraining order and the preliminary restraining order and the writ which has been introduced, and in the course of the conference with him, he told me the story of the Baird Case and his relations with Mr. Baird and the relation of his client, Williams, with Mr. Baird, and he told me he wanted Cullinan & Hickey to represent his interests and the interests of his firm, and incidentally the interest of R. C. Farley, F. W. Morrison, and C. W. Williams, so long as they had an actual interest—so far as they had an actual interest in the entire Baird matter—and these three suits were all a piece of the Baird matter."

The witness further testified that the Baird matter had not been completed, but was still pending, when he gave the substitution of attorney to Mr. O'Connor.

Osborn v. Hopkins, 160 Cal. 501, 117 P. 519, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1413, quoted by counsel for appellant, was a case of a general employment of an attorney who represented his client in a number of separate matters. The Baird matter, however, was one employment or matter with a single objective—the establishment of McColgan's title in a certain interest in the David J. Baird estate. Incidental to that objective, it became necessary to defend several actions and to prosecute a proceeding under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure. These actions were not single, distinct matters, but, if they were, none of them had terminated more than two years prior to the commencement of this action, and Mr. Cullinan was required to give them his attention up to the conclusion of his employment, which employment was concluded December 31, 1920. Hancock v. Pio Pico, 47 Cal. 161. In Taft v. Shaw, 159 Mass. 592, 35 N. E. 88, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, says:

"The insolvency proceedings, however, were finished in 1885, so that the claim for services in them is barred if they were rendered under a separate contract. The plaintiff contends that these services were only incidental to the suit, and were rendered under an entire contract covering both matters. Taft testified that, soon after he had brought the suit, the defendant in it, E. D. Shaw, went into insolvency, and he was consulted by the present defendant, and at his request did what he did in the insolvency proceedings, and that he did it with reference to the suit, and as a part of it. It is true that he also testified that he was consulted by three other creditors, and that it was the understanding, from the time that he went to the creditors' meeting, that the proceedings should be in the interest of all of those four creditors. But this is not inconsistent with the other testimony, and does not necessarily have any bearing on the question of the nature of the contract between Taft and the present defendant. We cannot say that the judge was not warranted in finding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount of his claim."

In Osborn v. Hopkins, supra, quoted from by appellant, the attorney was engaged to defend a husband in any actions for divorce or maintenance that his wife might bring. He defended three such actions. Obviously, each action was a separate piece of work. There was no affirmative general objective. In each case the object was to win that case. Had the attorney been employed to obtain a divorce for the husband instead of defending one for him—an affirmative instead of a purely negative service—the situation would have been different. As counsel for respondent suggests, suppose, on the contrary, the attorney was employed to secure a divorce for his client and had brought an action in one jurisdiction and had then abandoned or dismissed it for reasons of convenience, policy, or jurisdiction and commenced an action in another court, another county, or another state, it is clear that each action would not have been deemed a separate service or employment, for all would have been moves to obtain for his client a decree of divorce. The same would be true of services which he might have rendered incidentally in defending the husband against a cross-complaint or another action for divorce the wife might institute as a counter attack, for the wife's success in such litigation would defeat the husband's objective, namely, the procuring of a divorce. The facts in Osborn v. Hopkins are not analogous to the facts in the present case, which more nearly parallel those in Taft v. Shaw, supra.

[5, 6] Appellant raises the question concerning respondents' employment in Estate of Baird, that respondents "abandoned" the proceedings under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure "as being a waste of time."

In regard to this, Mr. Cullinan testified that when he got the proceeding at issue it was obvious that it would be a waste of time to go further with it at that time until Dodie Valencia had either established or failed to establish the claim of her son. Appellant also with respect to the Baird Case complains that respondents "declined to specify the charge for each of the consultations, or the number, nature, or extent of the consultations, but insisted in 'bunching' all services together and insisted on pursuing the same arbitrary method in charging for consultations." Mr. Cullinan testified that he was unable to specify those matters with the particularity desired by appellant's counsel. Appellant, however, was not precluded from proving by his own witnesses the value of each item of service rendered by respondents in the Baird employment or any other employment involved in the action. If Mr. Cullinan could not recall the number of consultations and the particular subject of consultation in each instance, it is hard to see how he could be required to testify regarding them. Both Mr. Cullinan and the expert witnesses who testified in his behalf to the value of all or some of the services performed place a valuation on each separate piece or unit of work to which their testimony related as the various matters are set out in the amended bill of particulars. The rule seems to be that, where the retainer is general and an attorney advises his client or performs services in a number of distinct matters, he may properly be required to set out his charge for each distinct matter. That was done in this case, as the amended bill of particulars and the testimony of Mr. Cullinan and the expert witnesses make very plain. But the authorities seem to be without conflict that, when the services of an attorney all relate to one subject-matter it forms no just measure of the value of the services to separate the transaction into parts and have the attorney state what charge he made for each separate part. In Moore v. Scharnikow, 48 Wash. 564, 572, 94 P. 117, 120, the Supreme Court of Washington uses this language:

"The only correct method is to view the service as a whole, since by no other method can one of its most important elements, namely, the result of the service to the client, be taken into account in estimating the value of the service. From the earliest times the courts have made this distinction between a bill of particulars for an attorney's service and bills of particulars of accounts generally."

The court in Moore v. Scharnikow cites to the same effect Randall v. Kingsland, 53 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 512, Pierce v. Wilson, 48 Ind. 298, Davis v. Johnson, 96 Minn. 130, 104 N. W. 766, and Donahue v. Pomeroy, 65 Hun, 620, 19 N. Y. S. 569, and further says:

"The case of Plummer v. Weil, 15 Wash. 427, 46 P. 648, is not an authority for the position taken by the court below. In that case the appellant sought to recover for services that not only extended over a long period of time, but which related to many distinct matters. The court by its order required the attorney to set out the several matters in which he claimed to have performed services, and the charges made for each separate matter, but there was no requirement that he split up into parts the services performed in any one distinct matter, and make a charge for each several part."

This same rule is followed in the later case of Thorp v. Ramsey, 51 Wash. 530, 99 P. 585.

[7] As to the services rendered, Mr. Cullinan testified in detail concerning the service rendered and the time when rendered and that such services were not completed within two years prior to the commencement of the action, not only with respect to the Baird matter but concerning the services rendered in all other cases and matters submitted to the jury, and the jury was definitely instructed to make no allowance for any service that the plaintiff had not proved to the jury's satisfaction to have been performed for the copartnership within the period of the statute. Any failure of plaintiffs to prove the performance of a particular service within the two years or to prove the value of that particular service must have resulted to their disadvantage, and the defendant surely may not complain of it, especially in view of his waiver of the right to raise the point that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict. Since it is conceded that the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict, a failure to specify the value placed by respondents on each item of service has resulted in no harm to appellant.

[8] As to appellant's contention that he is not liable for services rendered at the request of Daniel A. McColgan, his brother and partner, because respondents have not shown that the decedent, Daniel A. McColgan, in employing respondents, acted within the scope of his authority, it may be said that the third amended complaint alleges and the answer thereto admits the copartnership between Reginald McColgan and Daniel A. McColgan and that they were loan brokers. Reginald McColgan, called as an adverse witness under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, admitted that his brother employed Messrs. Cullinan and Hickey for the copartnership on copartnership business and with his knowledge and consent. Mr. Cullinan testified that his employment was by the firm of which Reginald McColgan is the surviving partner, that he was employed to act for the copartnership and that the McColgans were the real parties in interest and the parties whose interests he represented in all the matters in which he sought compensation.

[9] Appellant also asserts that the decedent in employing respondents "for third persons" had no authority to bind the partnership and that the employment in the Baird Contra Costa litigation was employment by Daniel A. McColgan individually and not for services to the McColgan copartnership, that such services were rendered to "Miles T. Baird," and that the appearances as made were made for Miles T. Baird. The testimony, however, shows that in the Baird, as in other matters, D. A. McColgan employed Cullinan & Hickey to act for the copartnership. In the litigation in which respondents appeared, the formal appearance was at times for clients of, or for trustees or dummies for, the McColgans, but all the litigation involved the copartnership interests. But, even if any separate litigation did not involve a copartnership interest of the McColgans, the employment was by and on behalf of the copartnership business, and it was the copartnership that promised to pay for the services. The person liable to compensate an attorney for his services is the one who employs him, not necessarily the one who receives the benefit of the services (Kelly v. Ning Yung Benev. Ass'n, 2 Cal. App. 460, 466, 84 P. 321). This is not a case of a partner guaranteeing the obligation of a third party.

[10] The contention that the employment of respondents in the Baird matter resulted in no benefit to the McColgans is without merit. While Mr. Cullinan testified that the services rendered by him were of great benefit, it is not the law that a lawyer must be successful in litigation and actually recover or preserve property for a client before he may become entitled to the value of his services on a quantum meruit. Foltz v. Cogswell, 86 Cal. 542, 548, 25 P. 60; French v. Cunningham, 149 Ind. 632, 49 N. E. 797. "A lawyer is not an insurer of the result in a case in which he is employed, unless he makes a special contract to that effect, and for that purpose." Babbitt v. Bumpus, 73 Mich. 331, 41 N. W. 417, 16 Am. St. Rep. 585. In the Baird matter, as in all other matters in which services were rendered by respondents for the McColgan partnership, the uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Cullinan is that the services were performed at the request and under the eye of D. A. McColgan, who was himself a lawyer, and who was kept informed of every step taken and every paper filed.

[11] Appellant objected to Mr. Cullinan testifying to declarations made to him by D. A. McColgan, who died prior to the commencement of the action, in the absence of appellant, which objections were overruled by the court, appellant claiming that the estate of the decedent would be adversely affected by a judgment against the surviving partner. This is an action against a surviving partner, and is neither against "an executor or administrator" nor "upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person." So far is a surviving partner from being the same as an executor or administrator of a deceased partner's estate that he is barred from appointment as such (Code Civ. Proc. § 1365), and the executor or administrator has no voice in the settlement of the partnership affairs (Code Civ. Proc. § 1585). Subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure has always been strictly and literally construed, and has never been extended to cover cases nor parties not within the express terms of the statute. Merriman v. Wickersham, 141 Cal. 567, 75 P. 180; City Savings Bank v. Enos, 135 Cal. 167, 67 P. 52; Poulson v. Stanley, 122 Cal. 655, 55 P. 605, 68 Am. St. Rep. 73; Booth v. Pendola, 88 Cal. 36, 23 P. 200, 25 P. 1101; Maguire v. Cunningham, 64 Cal. App. 536, 222 P. 838. The California cases cited by appellant are actions against executors or administrators and are not authority that subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure has application here.

Appellant complains that in the case of Bell v. McColgan respondents declined to segregate the services or itemize them or their value or furnish the jury any data or facts upon which it could determine the reasonable value of the services. In Estate of Seiler it is contended the alleged services were performed more than two years before the suit was filed, and that respondents were unable to state the nature or extent or furnish any facts upon which the jury could intelligently determine the reasonable value, and also that the services were not rendered for the McColgan partnership but for third persons; that the employment in Estate of Callaghan was to render services for third persons; that in Estates of Jeremiah and John Mahony the claim is barred by the statute and is being based on an employment by D. A. McColgan and having no relation to the partnership business and also on an employment by D. A. McColgan as agent for Reginald Bell. In Estate of Monnier appellant asserts the claim was barred by the statute and based on an employment of respondents by D. A. McColgan to represent the interests of third persons; that the claim in Estate of Eusebia Woolley was barred by the statute, and it was therefore error to submit this claim to the jury. In the Lineker Case, appellant repeats his claim respecting the segregation of the services, that Mr. Cullinan was unable to place a valuation of each particular item of services rendered; and in McColgan v. Magee the same objection is urged. In Vandall v. Baggott it is claimed the services were rendered to C. H. Williams and not to the McColgan partnership; and in Forrest v. Gage that the claim was barred, and further the services rendered were rendered D. A. McColgan and R.

McColgan as trustees, and therefore the court erred in submitting this claim to the jury.

What has already been said respecting the objections urged against the claim for services in the Baird matter has application to the claims in the cases and matters enumerated, and it may further be said that according to the amended bill of particulars, which was testified in detail by Mr. Cullinan to be correct, none of these matters or cases were concluded more than two years prior to the commencement of the action, and that, where the services were performed in cases or matters in which respondents' formal appearance was for third parties, the contract of employment was with the copartnership. These matters, the dates of employment, and the conclusion of the services, and all matters connected with them, whether or not respondents were appearing in litigation for third parties or under contract of employment by the copartnership or by the copartnership as trustees, were determined by the jury upon the evidence presented and which evidence was sufficient to support its findings.

In Pacific Improvement Company v. Maxwell, supra, the court says:

"Issue having been joined on the plea of the statute of limitations, and the evidence upon this phase of the case being conflicting, the question as to when with reference to the commencement of the action the defendant's cause of action on his counterclaim accrued was a mixed question of law and fact, which was properly left to the jury for determination."

See, also, Crawford v. Duncan, 61 Cal. App. 647, 215 P. 573.

[12, 13] Under the heading, "Other Erroneous Rulings," appellant complains that the trial court erred in permitting the witness Cullinan to testify, over his objection, to the profit D. A. McColgan made out of the loan in which he was interested in the Forrest-Gage Case, and cites People v. Supervisors, 45 N. Y. 202, as authority for his contention. While such evidence may have been immaterial as an element in determining the value of the professional services alleged to have been rendered, we cannot see, even if improperly admitted, how it could have prejudiced appellant. Regarding appellant's contention that the court erred in refusing to permit him to prove that services of considerable value were rendered, the McColgans, under an agreement that they were to be taken in pro tanto satisfaction of the claim of respondents, it may be said that no set-off or counterclaim was pleaded in the answer, except a claim for damages, which was abandoned. Such a counterclaim or offset must be pleaded. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 437, 438 and 439.

[14] Appellant urges error in the court's refusing to permit appellant to show that part of the consultations for which respondents are seeking to recover compensation were in fact consultations concerning the business of respondents by them intrusted for transaction to the McColgans as their agents. In view of the testimony of Mr. Cullinan, who several times testified that he was seeking compensation only for consultations with D. A. McColgan on the McColgans' business, and the instructions of the court:

"You are instructed that Daniel A. McColgan would have no right or authority to bind or make liable the copartnership composed of himself and the defendant for services rendered by the plaintiffs, unless such services concerned the business of the partnership and were within the scope of the partnership business. The burden of proving that the services rendered were services of the character stated is upon the plaintiff. In the absence of such proof respecting any of the alleged services, your verdict must be in favor of the defendants as to such services."

—we can but assume that the jury in its verdict awarded compensation for consultations only on business in which the copartnership was concerned.

[15-17] Appellant next contends that the court erred in refusing defendant leave to amend his answer, and cites us to a number of cases as holding that, where the trial court abuses its discretion in denying a party to an action leave to amend, the appellate court will order a reversal. In the present case, however, we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion. While the court should exercise its power of granting amendments freely and liberally in order that all the substantial merits of a cause may be reached and determined, yet, when the court has exercised its power, either by granting or refusing an amendment, the ruling is subject to review only when it is apparent that an abuse of discretion has occurred. Wixon v. Devine, 91 Cal. 477, 27 P. 777; Miner v. Rickey, 5 Cal. App. 451, 90 P. 718. An application to amend may be denied where no showing is made to justify the exercise of a court's discretionary power, or where there is negligence indicating bad faith. Tulare Building, etc., Ass'n v. Coleman, 5 Cal. Unrep. 334, 336, 44 P. 793. The following colloquy, when appellant was a witness, will serve to show that the court did not abuse its discretion:

"Q. Did you ever—were you and your brother—were you carrying on any business or doing any, or performing any services for Cullinan & Hickey during this period?

"Mr. McNab: What period?

"Mr. Erskine: Q. During the period covered by this general consultation fee, $500. A. Well, I will tell you, he came to me one day and he wanted to get—

"Mr. McNab: Just a moment. This is a matter which counsel stated in his opening statement he expected to prove, but the answer of the defendant in this case distinctly denies that any services were performed, distinctly denies that he or the partnership ever at any time authorized Cullinan to perform any services, and does not plead the payment even, denies that the amount which we allege was paid $3,600, even denies that was paid. It does not set up any claim to payment, and it does not set up any counterclaim of any kind or make any claim whatever, save one, and that is the cross-complaint, a suit for $6,000 damages against Mr. Cullinan for the alleged failure to serve a summons in one matter. Now any testimony of that character, I respectfully submit, cannot be introduced here.

"The Court: I will sustain the objection.

"Mr. Erksine: My purpose was—

"Mr. McNab: We know your purpose.

"Mr. Erskine (continuing)—was to show that there was an arrangement here at least that some of these services performed that I referred to, performed by McColgan, were in payment, and an offset on the claim now made, and that some of the consultations that they allege were had, were had about Cullinan & Hickey's own business.

"The Court: That cannot be done under the answer. There is no offset claimed.

"Mr. Erskine: Will your honor allow me at this time to amend my answer?

"The Court: No; I cannot do that. It is too late. This comes at the end of the trial after the case has been pending for two years and a half, and to set up a plea of payment, which is waived, if there ever was one, under the provisions of the Code."

The facts stated by Mr. McNab, counsel for plaintiffs, in his objection, are fully borne out by the record, and we therefore think the present case falls under the conclusion of "inexcusable negligence" reached in Tulare Building Assn. v. Coleman, supra.

[18, 19] Appellant's next objection is that the court, in permitting the witness Williams to testify on the basis of his personal observation as to the reasonable value of the services of respondents in the case of Bell v. McColgan; that opinion testimony as to the value of services must be restricted to the services in evidence and cannot extend to personal observations of the witness unless the facts he observed are first detailed by him. In answer to this contention, it may be said that, apart from the testimony of the witness Williams, there is the testimony of the value of the services by Mr. Cullinan, Nathan Moran, Louis V. Crowley, and Louis S. Beedy, and the testimony of Mr. Williams was merely cumulative, and it cannot be said under the circumstances that appellant was in any way prejudiced. Furthermore, the testimony of experts as to the value of legal services is not conclusive, nor does it necessarily control the verdict of the jury. As was said by Mr. Justice Field in delivering the opinion of the court in Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45, 26 L. Ed. 1028:

"It was the province of the jury to weigh the testimony of the attorneys as to the value of the services, by reference to their nature, the time occupied in their performance, and other attending circumstances, and by applying to it their own experience and knowledge of the character of such services. To direct them to find the value of the services from the testimony of the experts alone, was to say to them that the issue should be determined by the opinions of the attorneys, and not by the exercise of their own judgment of the facts on which those opinions were given."

And in Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 307, 104 P. 320, 323, the court says:

"The testimony of experts is, of course, admissible to prove the value of attorneys' services [citing authorities]. But the opinions of the experts in such cases are not binding upon the jury, who may apply to the testimony 'their own experience and knowledge of the character of such services.'"

See, also, Estate of Duffill, 188 Cal. 552, 206 P. 42; Estate of Iser, 52 Cal. App. 405, 198 P. 1014.

Appellant complains of the court's refusal to give instructions requested by him embracing the following principles of law: For any services rendered by plaintiffs to a third person and not to the partnership composed of Daniel A. McColgan and the defendant, even if rendered at the request of Daniel A. McColgan, and he agreed to pay for or become responsible for or guaranteed payment of the same to plaintiffs, the defendant is not liable; that a partner has no right or authority to bind or make liable the partnership nor his copartner for services rendered a third person nor to guarantee or become surety for the payment of the same, unless the authority to do so is in writing and subscribed by his copartner in such a manner as to be binding on the partnership; that plaintiffs cannot recover for services rendered by them in any instance where Daniel A. McColgan or the defendant was named trustee in a deed of trust and the services were rendered the trustee as such; that Daniel A. McColgan had no authority to bind the partnership as to any matter foreign to the partnership, nor could he make any admissions bringing such matters within the scope of the partnership business; that plaintiff Eustace Cullinan cannot recover in any matter, suit, or litigation concerning any deed of trust in which he was designated as a trustee; that, if plaintiffs were employed by the partnership in any specific litigation, such services included all incidental advice and consultations, and such advice and consultations cannot be made the basis for a separate charge; that the jury cannot award plaintiffs compensation for consultations or advice in the absence of any evidence as to the specific nature or character of the consultations or advice in each instance and of the reasonable value of each of the specific consultations; that plaintiffs are restricted by the allegations of their complaint to professional services, and cannot recover for services of a nonprofessional nature, such, for instance, as trips to Santa Barbara or elsewhere to examine lands and determine their value; that, in determining the value of services, the jury cannot take into consideration the matter of defendant's wealth nor the amount of profit in any particular transaction; that the jury should disregard and give no weight to the testimony of the witness Cullinan respecting the acts, declarations and statements of Daniel A. McColgan, deceased, such being incompetent against the surviving partner; that plaintiffs cannot recover on a quantum meruit for services that were of no benefit to the partnership; that Eustace Cullinan cannot recover compensation for services rendered in preparation for defense of himself as a party defendant in the case of Lineker v. McColgan et al.

Answering the objection that plaintiffs cannot recover for any services rendered where Eustace Cullinan performed services as trustee or appeared in an action in which by reason of being a trustee he was made a party, or be allowed compensation where Daniel A. McColgan was named as a trustee in a deed of trust, it may be said that, while plaintiff Eustace Cullinan was a nominal party to the action as trustee, the McColgans were also parties, and respondents represented them as their attorneys and are suing for services rendered directly to them, and the instructions that were given made such fact sufficiently plain to the jury, and the same may be said with respect to representing them in the matter in which Daniel McColgan was a trustee in the deed of trust.

The objections that the defendant's wealth could not be taken into consideration by the jury and that the jury should disregard declarations made by the deceased partner and that compensation could not be awarded for consultations in the absence of evidence as to the reasonable value of each specific consultation have already been sufficiently discussed.

[20] As to the objections that the court refused to give the other instructions summarized, it may be said that such portions of the requested instructions as are proper and material are sufficiently covered in other instructions given. The jury was instructed:

"That Daniel A. McColgan would have no right or authority to bind or make liable the copartnership composed of himself and the defendant, for services rendered by the plaintiffs, unless such services concerned the business of the partnership and were within the scope of the partnership business. The burden of proving that the services rendered were services of the character stated is upon the plaintiffs. In the absence of such proof respecting any of the alleged services, your verdict must be in favor of the defendant as to such services."

This disposes of the points raised by appellant, and, from what has been said, it follows that in our opinion the record contains no error calling for a reversal of the judgment. The equities of the case seem to be with respondents. There can be no doubt but that respondents rendered considerable service for which they have not been compensated. The issues presented were fairly tried, and the amount of the verdict is not disproportionate to the value of the services rendered.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

88 Cal. App. 233

HULING v. SECCOMBE et al. (Civ. 3393.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 4, 1928.

1. Quieting title $\S$ 10(2)—Plaintiff claiming land under redemptioner at mortgage foreclosure had no title since redemption inured to redemptioner's prior grantee (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 701; Civ. Code $\S$ 1106).

In action to quiet title, plaintiff claiming title under former owner who redeemed land after mortgage foreclosure had no title, since under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 701, and Civ. Code, $\S$ 1106, redemption by former owner inured to redemptioner's former grantee.

2. Estoppel $\S$ 70(1)—Record owners did not forfeit title by failure to sue to cancel deed from redemptioner at mortgage foreclosure to plaintiff's ancestor (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 701; Civ. Code, $\S$ 1106).

Where defendants had record title through deed from prior grantee of plaintiff's predecessor in title, and where redemption of land from mortgage foreclosure by plaintiff's predecessor inured under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 701, and Civ. Code, $\S$ 1106, to prior grantee, and after redemption redemptioner conveyed land to plaintiff's ancestor, defendants as record owners did not forfeit title by failure to sue to cancel deed to plaintiff's ancestor.

3. Adverse possession $\S$ 88—Payment of taxes on vacant lot held not to show adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 323).

In action to quiet title to vacant and uncultivated lot, evidence as to payment of taxes thereon by plaintiff held not to show his adverse possession, within Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 323.

4. Adverse possession $\S$ 24—Occasional cutting of grass or weeds on vacant lot is insufficient basis for claim of adverse possession.

Occasional cutting of wild grass or weeds on unoccupied, uninclosed, uncultivated lot is insufficient basis for claim of adverse possession.

5. Adverse possession $\Leftrightarrow$ 85(1)—Burden is on one occupying vacant lot to affirmatively establish his adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 321).

Where legal title to vacant city lot was in defendants, plaintiff's occupation thereof would be deemed to be in subordination to defendants' title, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 321, burden was on plaintiff to affirmatively establish his adverse possession.

6. Adverse possession $\Leftrightarrow$ 13—"Adverse possession" must be based on notice to legal owner and be open, notorious, exclusive, visible, and not consistent with record title.

"Adverse possession" must be based on either actual or constructive notice to legal owner, and in either case must be open, notorious, exclusive, visible, and not consistent with record title, and must indicate an occupant other than record owner, and be sufficient to put prudent man on inquiry.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Adverse Possession.]

7. Trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 358—Where findings irreconcilably conflict, judgment must be reversed.

Where findings are irreconcilably in conflict, judgment must be reversed because of impossibility to determine which findings controlled in rendering judgment.

8. Appeal and error $\Leftrightarrow$ 616(1)—Notice to clerk to prepare proceedings is not necessary part of transcript to be certified by trial judge (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953, 953a).

Since clerk is proper officer, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953, to certify correctness of notice of appeal, where appeal was perfected under section 953a, notice to clerk to prepare proceedings was not a part of transcript to be certified by trial judge, and hence motion to affirm judgment because transcript did not contain notice to clerk will be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Edward E. Huling against A. H. Seccombe and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

C. F. Seccombe, Pascal H. Burke, and Burrel D. Neighbours, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Wirt C. Smith and Frank H. Snyder, both of Glendale, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a decree quieting title to a certain lot situated in Long Beach, Cal. Appellant contends that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence.

Much of the evidence was stipulated. The respective parties claim title through a common ancestor. The property in question is an unimproved vacant lot in the suburb of Long Beach, which has never been used, inclosed, occupied, or cultivated. It was without buildings, fences, or street improvements. The only evidence tending to show adverse possession on the part of respondent or his predecessor in title was the payment of taxes for the required length of time and the possible clearing away of weeds from the lot on one occasion. February 2, 1905, William Clague was the owner of the lot. On March 30, 1908, he executed and delivered to Emma D. Davis his promissory note for $2,700 secured by mortgage on said premises. April 14, 1910, for a valuable consideration Clague executed and delivered his deed of conveyance of said lot to John H. Warner. June 17, 1910, Warner deeded it to Henry Freedman. On the last-named date foreclosure proceedings upon said mortgage were commenced by Emma D. Davis against Clague, Freedman, and others. Subsequently the action was dismissed as to Freedman. Upon proceedings duly had a decree of foreclosure was entered August 10, 1910, and a month later the sheriff sold the property to the mortgagee, Davis, under the decree of foreclosure. Fourteen days later Freedman executed a deed of conveyance of this property to one Foreman, who, in turn, quit-claimed the tract to appellants. June 11, 1911, Clague formally redeemed the property, and subsequently conveyed it to the father of respondent, Edward E. Huling, who claims title through a decree of distribution duly made in his father's estate. This action to quiet title was then instituted November 21, 1923.

[1] It thus appears that the record title was in appellants. Having formally conveyed the premises to Warner by deed dated April 14, 1910, Clague had thereby divested himself of all title and had none to convey to the deceased.

A judgment debtor has the right to redeem land from a mortgage foreclosure, notwithstanding the fact that he previously transferred his title to another. Code Civ. Proc. § 701; Yoakum v. Bower, 51 Cal 539; Bateman v. Kellogg, 59 Cal. App. 464, 479, 211 P. 46. The effect of redemption, however, is to satisfy the mortgage debt and discharge the lien. Where redemption from foreclosure sale is accomplished by the mortgagor himself, it cancels the mortgage sale. 2 Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) 642, § 1051d. The redemption of property by a mortgagor after a foreclosure sale adds nothing to his title, but the redemption inures to the benefit of his former grantee. Civ. Code, § 1106; 2 Jones on Mortgages, supra, 644, § 1051d; Witham v. Blood, 124 Iowa, 695, 100 N. W. 558. In Bateman v. Kellogg, supra, it is said:

"When Woodruff redeemed [the property], the foreclosure sale to Stickney was terminated (Code Civ. Proc. § 703), thereby leaving the legal title to the land the same as if no mortgage had been given. Therefore his redemption could not have the effect, either in law or in equity, of transferring appellant's title to him."

It necessarily follows that whatever benefits were acquired by Clague by virtue of his redemption of the mortgaged premises inured to the benefit of his former grantee Warner, and thence to his grantees, and hence Clague had no title to convey to Huling, and respondent is therefore not the owner of the record title.

[2] Nor did the record owners forfeit their title by failure to institute proceedings to cancel the deed from Clague to Huling. "There are no equities in favor of a party seeking by adverse holding to acquire the property of another. Hence the rules, that user measures the extent of a prescriptive right, and every statutory requirement of the acquisition of lands by adverse possession must be fulfilled." 1 Cal. Jur. 492, § 3. In the case of Secret Valley Land Co. v. Perry, 187 Cal. 420, 202 P. 449, which was an action to quiet title, Mr. Justice Sloane approvingly quoted the following language:

"Both parties are claiming under a record title from a common source, and the only question is superiority. Limitation or lapse of time does not perfect a defective record title in the absence of possession. If the situation of these two parties had continued ten, fifteen, or twenty years longer, and the question should then arise, as now, as to which title of record is superior, a plea of limitations would not avail for either party against the other. Appellants show that they have legally paid taxes on the land. * * * One cannot acquire title to the land of another by paying the taxes on it, nor will a claim of title under a void deed, although recorded, ripen into a fee by lapse of time, nor will limitations run against the owner of record in favor of a claimant not in possession, nor is it incumbent upon the owner to sue for cancellation of a void deed, or to take steps to remove a cloud upon his title. * * * A mere claim of title even of record, unaccompanied by adverse holding, will not start the statute.' * * * A defendant holding the legal title, or a paramount claim to the legal title, is not called upon to take action against a hostile claim which is not of a nature to ripen into a valid adverse title."

[3, 4] The record in the instant case is insufficient to sustain a finding of adverse possession in respondent. The evidence is undisputed to the effect that the lot in question was vacant during ten years prior to the commencement of this action, and was unoccupied, uncultivated, and unused. It contained no improvements and had no sidewalks or street improvements whatever. During the winter it was usually flooded with water, and in summer time it was overrun with weeds. The only evidence tending to show adverse possession consisted of the payment of taxes by respondent. He testified that once he offered it for sale, but he does not state when, to whom, or how he offered it for sale. He also claims to have once cut the weeds from the place, but the evidence as to this circumstance is unsatisfactory. In this regard respondent testified:

"I haven't been to that property for 10 months, maybe more.

"Q. What acts of ownership or control have you seen your father perform? A. Once I went there with him myself and helped clean the weeds off the property; I can't tell you what year that was. * * * So far as I know, he (my father) never offered it for sale. * * * Once since that time, I had the weeds cleaned off. * * * I offered to sell it about 4 years ago."

Upon the contrary, two witnesses who had lived adjacent to the property testified that the lot was never occupied, cultivated, or used, and that they had observed no acts or evidence of ownership on the part of any one. Respecting the cutting of weeds, Mr. Seecombe testified:

"I moved there [adjoining the property] in 1914 or 1915. * * * I never seen anything done to it at all, * * * [except] long ago, the fire department was down there and put a grass fire out on it. * * *

"Q. Did you ever see any one cut any weeds on it? A. No, sir; I never did. * * *

"Q. Did the lot show that the weeds had been cleared off of it? A. No; I never noticed it, * * * in fact, I never seen any weeds cut off of there at any time one way or another. * * * It was a swamp. * * * It used to be full of water every winter."

This is an insufficient showing upon which to rest a claim of adverse possession. The mere occasional cutting of wild grass or weeds will not suffice to base a claim of adverse possession. 2 C. J. 67, §§ 24-26.

[5] Having failed to establish a legal title to the lot in question, there is no presumption in favor of respondent's possession of the premises, and even though he actually occupied the property, it would be deemed to be in subordination to the legal title held by another, and the burden would be upon respondent to affirmatively establish all the necessary elements constituting adverse possession. Code Civ. Proc. § 321. But the evidence is undisputed that the premises were not in fact actually occupied by any person whomsoever. Nor can the property be deemed to have been possessed or occupied pursuant to the provisions of section 323, Code of Civil Procedure, for it was not cultivated or improved; it was not fenced or inclosed; it was not used to supply fuel, or fencing timber, or pasturage, or for any use whatever. The record in this case is devoid of evidence of any acts on the part of respondent to indicate a claim of adverse possession, with the exception of the payment of taxes for the required length of time.

[6] Adverse possession must be based upon either actual or constructive notice to the legal owner. Even though the possession relied upon is constructive, it must nevertheless be "open, notorious, exclusive, visible, and not consistent with the record title. * * * It must indicate not alone who the occupant is, but it must indicate an occupant other than the record owner." 1 Cal. Jur. 534, § 28. The circumstances must be sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry. The payment of taxes alone is not sufficient upon which to rest a claim of adverse possession. 1 Cal. Jur. 551, § 40, p. 556, and section 46; 2 C. J. 69, § 30; McGrath v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 626, 24 P. 793.

[7] The findings of facts are in irreconcilable conflict. The first finding of fact is "that all the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint herein are true." The second finding of fact is "that all the material allegations of the defendant's answer herein are not true." This is a negative pregnant, and leaves the inference that all of the material allegations of the defendants' answer are true, except perchance one of them. The third finding of fact is "that the plaintiff is the owner in fee" of the real property described, while the fourth finding of fact is "that the plaintiff's claim of title * * * to said real property is unfounded and without right." Where findings are irreconcilably in conflict the judgment must be reversed, for the reason that it is impossible, under such circumstances, to determine which findings controlled the court in rendering its judgment. Los Angeles Land Co. v. Marr, 187 Cal. 126, 200 P. 1051; Estep v. Armstrong, 91 Cal. 659, 27 P. 1091; Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 P. 872, 21 P. 11; 2 Cal. Jur. 1030, § 612.

[8] The appeal was perfected in this case pursuant to section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. Respondent claims that the judgment should be affirmed because the transcript of proceedings which is certified by the trial judge does not contain a copy of notice to the clerk to prepare the proceedings pursuant to said section. This notice, in the language required by that section, however, was duly served and filed with the clerk within the time prescribed by law, and is properly certified by the clerk as a part of the record on appeal. This procedure complies with the statute. Section 953a, supra, provides that this method of presenting the proceedings on appeal is "in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions." Under our statute, a notice of appeal was never required to be included in a bill of exceptions. The foregoing section specifies exactly what shall be included in the transcript of proceedings. The notice of intention to appeal and to prepare the transcript is not included therein. The request for the transcript was properly included in the notice of appeal. This section provides that:

"Any person desiring to appeal * * * (shall) file with the clerk * * * a notice stating that he desires or intends to appeal, * * * and requesting that a transcript of the testimony, * * *" etc., be prepared.

The clerk is the proper officer to certify to the correctness of the notice of appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 953; Estate of King, 49 Cal. App. Dec. 153;¹ Martin v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 195 Cal. 544, 234 P. 321. None of the cases cited by the respondent in this regard hold that this notice is a necessary part of the transcript of proceedings which must be certified by the judge. All of these cases cited by respondent have reference to the necessity of including instructions given to the jury or refused, or the including of other matters specifically mentioned in that section. The record on appeal in this case is therefore sufficiently authenticated.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Actions by J. L. Armstrong against Kubo & Co. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgments modified and affirmed.

Robert H. Schwab, of Sacramento, and W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellant.

Ray Manwell, of Marysville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff filed two complaints in the court below against the defendant, had judgment against the defendant in both actions, and, as the evidence in the actions are the same, both are presented to us for consideration upon one transcript.

In action No. 5819 in the trial court the complaint alleges as follows: That within one year last past the defendant became and now is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $653, lawful money of the United States of America, being the balance due the plaintiff from the said defendant for the reasonable value of goods, wares and merchandise stolen and taken from plaintiff by defendant and carried away to defendant's place of business without the plaintiff's consent or permission. That the value of said goods, wares and merchandise was the sum of $653. Also, that all of said goods, wares and merchandise were taken and carried away by the defendant from the possession of the plaintiff without plaintiff's consent or permission, between the 23d day of January, 1926, and the 12th day of June, 1926, at Marysville, in the county of Yuba, state of California, and that the defendant did thereafter unlawfully convert and dispose of the same to its own use, to the damage of the plaintiff in the said sum of $653.

In action No. 5854 the charging portions of the complaint are to all intents and purposes identical with the complaint in action No. 5819, the only difference being that the value of the property is alleged to be the sum of $1,005.41. In action No. 5819 the plaintiff had judgment in the sum of $53.10, and in action No. 5854 judgment went for plaintiff in the sum of $643.32. No demurrer was filed by the defendant to either one of the plaintiff's complaints. Upon appeal, however, it is insisted that the plaintiff's complaints do not state a cause of action; that the form of action as presented by the record cannot be sustained; and, further, that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the trial court.

The record shows that the plaintiff in the year 1926 had a contract with the United States government to transport mail from Yuba City, Sutter county, and Marysville, Yuba county, post offices, to the Southern Pacific Railway, Northern Electric Railway, and Western Pacific Railway depots in said cities, and to receive from said trains United States mail and transport the same to said post offices. The mail was transported in a screened automobile truck belonging to the plaintiff. The truck was operated by the plaintiff in the daytime, and during the night by an employee of the plaintiff named Edgar Goldstone. During the period of time mentioned, a number of packages of mail consisting of goods, wares and merchandise shipped or transported by mail, were extracted from the mails, or, rather, stolen by the said Edgar Goldstone, and sold to the defendant in this action. It appears that Kubo & Co. consisted of a Japanese named Kubo and a Japanese named Hashimoto. The store conducted by Kubo & Co. was situated in the town of Marysville, about 75 feet from the United States post office therein. A number of the articles extracted from the mails consisted of insured parcels shipped to various persons at the places named, and were sold to the defendant in this action. The circumstances show beyond question that the defendant had full knowledge that all the articles received from Goldstone were stolen by him. The different packages delivered by him to the defendant bore the names and addresses of the consignees in most instances, and were delivered under such circumstances as to unavoidably force the conclusion that the defendant was, to all intents and purposes, an accomplice in the various thefts. Two actions were begun against the defendant to recover the value of the property taken from the mails by Goldstone and sold to the defendant. This is accounted for by reason of the fact that when the first action was begun it had not then been discovered that the goods referred to in the second action had also been stolen from the mails by Goldstone while employed by the plaintiff, and sold to the defendant. When this discovery was made the second action was begun. When the extent of the thefts by Goldstone had been discovered and the value of the parcels stolen ascertained, the plaintiff in this action turned over and paid to an agent of the United States Postal Department the full value of all the stolen parcels for the purpose of making settlement with the various consignors of the parcels that had been stolen. After making such settlement the plaintiff instituted said actions to recover the value of the goods unlawfully converted by the defendant. Can such actions be maintained? We think so.

[1, 2] The law seems to be well settled that every bailee or person clothed with the exclusive right of possession has a temporary or qualified ownership in the property to the extent of enabling him to maintain actions in respect thereto against third parties. Bode v. Lee, 102 Cal. 583, 36 P. 936; Roberts v. Burr, 135 Cal. 156, 67 P. 46; 3 R. C. L. p. 85; 6 C. J. 1107. Other cases might be cited, but the foregoing are sufficient. In the case of Bode v. Lee, supra, it appears that a number of boxes of tin had been left with the proprietors of a warehouse by different consignors, and the court, in speaking of an action by the warehouse owners against one who had wrongfully obtained possession of said boxes of tin, used the following language (we are quoting from the syllabus):

"The proprietors of a bonded warehouse, who are the bailees of boxes of tin left in the warehouse by several different bailors, have a single cause of action to recover for fraudulent conversion of the tin by persons obtaining it through embezzlement by an employee of the warehouse with whom they had conspired for the purchase of the tin," etc.

This case is almost identical with the one at bar.

In 3 California Jurisprudence, p. 377, we find the following:

"Despite the general principle that an action of assumpsit is based upon a contract, express or implied, in some instances such an action may be maintainable as founded upon an implied contract when in fact there is no contract at all. For instance, if B stole A's watch, A could treat the theft as a contract of sale and sue in like manner ex contractu, though in fact there was no foundation whatsoever for the fiction other than the need of broadening A's remedies. In other cases of assumpsit upon implied contract, the contract may lie at the base of the wrong or may have enabled the perpetrator to have accomplished his wrong. In short, it may be pronounced as a general rule, repeatedly sanctioned by the courts of California, that where personal property is wrongfully converted, the owner may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit."

Again, on page 379 of the same volume, quoting from section 7:

"In many jurisdictions the doctrine that where the personal property is wrongfully converted, the injured party may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit is limited to cases where the wrongdoer has sold the property or otherwise converted it into money, in which event the plaintiff may maintain an action for the proceeds. But in California, as in a number of other states, a broader rule enables one whose goods are wrongfully taken and used by another to sue in assumpsit for their value as for goods sold and delivered."

This latter statement of the law is clearly set forth in the case of Bechtel v. Chase, 156 Cal. 707, 106 P. 81, where, after speaking of the limited amount which may be recovered in assumpsit, this broader rule is stated:

"In this state, however, as in a number of others, a broader rule enables one whose goods are wrongfully taken and used by another to sue in assumpsit for their value, as for goods sold and delivered"—citing Roberts v. Evans, 43 Cal. 380; Lehmann v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 25 P. 161; Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 178, 26 P. 626.

In Corey v. Struve, 170 Cal. 170, 149 P. 48, the court, in considering this question, thus states the law:

"While the complaint does allege that the property was 'converted' by the defendants, we think that the action was in reality one in assumpsit for the value of the property sold, or perhaps it might be more aptly characterized as one in the nature of a suit for money had and received. In this state, one whose goods are wrongfully taken and used by another may sue in assumpsit for their value, as for goods sold and delivered (citing the cases which we have heretofore referred to), but we are not here greatly concerned about the particular form of the action. In this state we have but one form of action which has no special designation, and it cannot be defeated, as at common law, because not properly named"—citing Faulkner v. First National Bank, 130 Cal. 263, 62 P. 463.

In the case of French v. Robbins, 172 Cal. 670, 158 P. 188, relied upon by the appellant, the action was not for the value of the goods wrongfully converted, but for money had and received by reason of the sale of property belonging to the plaintiff and necessarily required proof as to the money received by the defendant, and is not authority here. Likewise, the case of Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 166 P. 1, urged upon our attention by the appellant, is not pertinent to this action. The question there presented and determined was when a writ of attachment would lie, and not whether a plaintiff could or could not recover from one who had stolen his property, the value of the goods stolen. Again, the case of Lehmann v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 25 P. 161, does not support the appellant's contention. The opening sentence of the opinion in that case is in the following words:

"The authorities are clear upon the proposition that when one person converts to his own use the personal property of another, the latter may waive the tort, and sue in assumpsit for the value thereof"—citing several authorities.

[3, 4] These cases are sufficient to clearly establish the law in this state that one whose property has been stolen by another may waive the tort and sue and recover the value of the property so wrongfully taken and conveyed. We think each complaint states a good cause of action, at least as against a general objection.

[5] It is finally urged that the testimony is insufficient to support the findings in that it does not show the articles of merchandise received by the defendant through the activity of Goldstone. In order to understand the testimony to which we are about to refer, we will first state that a United States inspector submitted two lists of merchandise which had been abstracted from the mails by Goldstone during the period of time involved in said actions. These lists were in the hands of the attorneys for the respective parties during the examination of the witness Goldstone, and were submitted to him by counsel for inspection, and his testimony was all directed to the various articles mentioned therein. With this explanation we may examine the testimony to ascertain to what extent it supports the findings of the trial court. The witness Goldstone testified in substance as follows: That he began operations the last part of March and continued the same up to about the 18th of June, 1926. That he took different parcels from the mails and sold them to Kubo and Hashimoto. That the store conducted by Kubo & Co. was situated on Oak street in the city of Marysville, about 75 feet from the post office therein. That he did not dispose of any articles taken to any one excepting to Kubo & Co. When shown the lists just mentioned, on direct examination, the witness stated he could not positively identify any particular article; that whenever he had a chance to put a package over he took it from the mails and delivered it to Kubo & Co. The direct examination of the witness does leave the testimony in doubt as to whether or not all of the stolen parcels mentioned in the lists as being taken from the mails by Goldstone were delivered to Kubo & Co., but the cross-examination we think clears up this matter sufficiently to support the findings of the trial court, excepting as hereinafter stated. With the lists of the property stolen as hereinbefore referred to, shown to the witness, on cross-examination said witness testified as follows:

"It is impossible for me to identify any of these packages here because they are not like the way I delivered them. Sometimes I tore open the box, tore off the top; sometimes he'd tear it off later. I didn't have a talk with the inspector. When the list was presented to me the first time I had nothing to do with making it up.

"Q. Now then, just what was your method of taking these parcels from the mail; just what did you do? A. I just took them and handed them over to him. * * * I did not take them right from the mail truck to the store. All would depend on what train it came on. I would place the package on the truck and drive around the block and hop it off. I would drive the mail truck up in front of the store. I was paid for every package that I delivered. * * *

"Q. By the time you made your deliveries to Kubo and you made your deliveries to Hashimoto—you testified to this this afternoon that you would make your deliveries of these packages to either Kubo or Hashimoto—that you would say 'I have a package?' A. Not all the time; just passed by the store, and when the train came in I would drive around. The only time I would tell him was when the 3:15 came in. Most of the stuff came on the 3:15; some at 6:20. * * * That stuff, I got it after work; leave it on the mail truck; I would leave it outside. I would stay around until I had a chance to drive up to his store on the side of the post office. It is about 75 feet from the post office. I would deliver it at night; sometimes around 9 o'clock; sometimes at 11 o'clock. Sometimes I would hold it over until I saw him in the morning. After I got through my work I would drop around and say I had a package. The packages that came in at 3:15 I put in my room; then I would take it out on the truck.

"Q. Is that true of all these packages? A. I didn't, as I say, all the time, but most of the time, some of the time, but not all of the time. * * * I didn't keep these packages in the mail truck all the time. Sometimes I took them to my room. Sometimes it would be 4 or 5 days or a week after I received the goods before I delivered them. I never did keep these parcels more than 24 hours in my room. I didn't do anything until he told me he wanted cigarettes. I would pick up a package when he wanted it. I would take up a package and let him know I got it, and that is the way it goes. When I went to his place to get a drink of soda, he would say, 'Got any Strikes or Chesterfields?' * * * It would be 2 or 3 days and I would drop in the following night and give him a package. I never sold any articles to anybody else. There were no articles in my room at the time I was arrested which I had taken from the mail. I never delivered any auto tubes, auto tires, hams, candies, ice cream cartons or pimento loaves to Kubo & Co."

[6] There being no other testimony in the record as to parcels described as auto tubes, auto tires, hams, candies, ice cream cartons and pimento loaves, the value of those items allowed in the judgments referred to must be stricken therefrom. Thus, in action No. 5819 the plaintiff is allowed for the value of parcels in the sum of $60.16 in excess of what is shown by the testimony, and in action No. 5854 the plaintiff has been allowed for the value of parcels in excess of that shown by the testimony in the sum of $151.30. It follows, therefore, that the judgment in action No. 5819 must be reduced to the sum of $593.07, and the judgment in action No. 5854 must be reduced to the sum of $492.02. And it is so ordered. The objection to the admission of the lists in evidence need not be considered by reason of the fact that if any error was committed therein, it in no wise affected the judgment, as the cause of action rests entirely upon the testimony of Goldstone.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment in action No. 5819 be modified to award the plaintiff the sum of $593.07, and action No. 5854 be modified so as to award the plaintiff the sum of $492.02, and, as so modified, the judgments will be affirmed.

Appellant is allowed its costs on appeal.

Circumstantial evidence, to sustain a verdict, in civil cases in order to be sufficient, need not rise to that degree of certainty which will exclude every reasonable conclusion other than that drawn by the jury.

Action by George W. Ley against H. B. Bishopp. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert and W. H. Dehm, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur A. Weber, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. A jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $750, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant appeals.

It is contended as grounds for reversal that the verdict is unsupported, and that the trial court erred in denying a motion for nonsuit, and by permitting certain tests to be made in the presence of the jury.

The defendant, a dental surgeon, was employed by the plaintiff to prepare for the use of the latter four removable bridges, and in the course of making certain casts or impressions for that purpose it was alleged that, due to the defendant's negligence, plaintiff's mouth was burned, causing him severe pain and a serious illness.

The evidence shows that the casts used were not prepared by the defendant or by a licensed dentist but by a person temporarily employed at the office of the defendant for that purpose. It was testified that the casts were composed of a mixture of plaster of paris and potassium sulphate, to which water was added, and that the combination of these substances produces heat. The plaintiff described the effect when the mixture was applied and the extent and character of his injuries, his testimony in the latter respects being corroborated by that of his wife; and a physician by whom he was examined on the same day testified that the condition observed appeared to have been caused by burns. Expert witnesses differed in opinion as to the degree of heat which such mixtures might produce, but it sufficiently appears from the testimony that the result would be affected by the temperature of the water and the proportions of the other ingredients used. There was also a difference of opinion as to the temperature which would cause injury, but the testimony reasonably supports the inference that the addition of water at too high a temperature to improper proportions of the other substances mentioned would generate heat sufficient to have an injurious effect.

The defendant contends that the conclusion of the jury as to the cause of the injuries was based upon circumstantial evidence; and that, if other conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom, that of the jury cannot be sustained. Reliance is placed upon Wilbur v. Emergency Hospital Ass'n, 27 Cal. App. 751, 151 P. 155, and Hopkins v. Heller, 59 Cal. App. 447, 210 P. 975, where, citing with approval the case of Neal v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 129 Iowa, 5, 105 N. W. 197, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 905, it was held that a theory cannot be said to be established by circumstantial evidence even in a civil case, unless the facts relied upon are of such nature and so related to each other that it is the only conclusion that can fairly or reasonably be drawn therefrom. In Estate of Wallace, 64 Cal. App. 107, 220 P. 682, the above rule was approved; but the Supreme Court, in denying a petition for a transfer said:

"* * * We do not wish to be understood as approving the statement of the rule by the District Court of Appeal as to the method of weighing circumstantial evidence when applied to a reviewing court on appeal. The rule is stated and applied in the recent cases of Estate of Loucks, 160 Cal. 551, 554, 555, 117 P. 673, Ann. Cas. 1913A, page 868, People v. Tom Woo et al., 181 Cal. 315, 184 P. 389, and Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123."

In People v. Tom Woo, supra, an appeal from a judgment of conviction on a criminal charge, it being contended that the evidence—which was circumstantial—was insufficient to sustain the verdict, the court said:

"The principal question on this appeal is whether the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict against the appellants. * * * In passing upon this question we will not attempt to determine the weight of the evidence, but will decide only whether upon the face of the evidence it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found by the jury to warrant the inference of guilt. For it is the function of the jury, in the first instance, and of the trial court after verdict, to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and before the verdict of the jury, which has been approved by the trial court, can be set aside on appeal on the ground we are discussing it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below."

[1] As the rule is stated in other jurisdictions, circumstantial evidence in civil cases, in order to be sufficient, need not rise to that degree of certainty which will exclude every reasonable conclusion other than that drawn by the jury. Midland Valley Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 85 Okl. 95, 204 P. 1102; Meier v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co., 51 Or. 69, 93 P. 691; Pittsburgh, C. & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Hoffman, 57 Ind. App. 431, 107 N. E. 315, 231; Hashman v. Wyandotte Gas Co., 83 Kan. 328, 111 P. 468; Farber v. Boston Ins. Co., 215 Mo. App. 564, 256 S. W. 1079; St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Moss (Tex. Civ. App.) 203 S. W. 777.

[2] In addition to evidence tending to show that the mixture under certain conditions might do harm appears the testimony of the plaintiff who experienced its effect; and this with that of the witnesses who observed the condition after its use sufficiently supports the conclusion of the jury as to the fact and cause of the injury.

[3] The implied contract of a physician or surgeon who undertakes to treat a patient is that he possesses the skill and knowledge ordinarily possessed by members of his profession, and that he will use ordinary care and skill in the application of such knowledge to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed. Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 P. 128. If, however, he fails to conform to the proper standard, and an injury results to the patient, or if such injury is caused by a want of proper skill or care on the part of his agents or assistants, he will be liable. Mernin v. Cory, 145 Cal. 573, 79 P. 174; McCollum v. Barr, 38 Cal. App. 411, 176 P. 463; Mullins v. Du Vall, 25 Ga. App. 690, 104 S. E. 513; Klitch v. Betts, 89 N. J. Law, 348, 98 Atl. 427; Smith v. Swinehart, 209 Ill. App. 175.

[4] In the present case the testimony shows that the injury followed the use of the mixture; and while the question whether its effect was due to a lack of skill or care on the part of the defendant or his assistant in its preparation, or to some other cause, was one respecting which different inferences might be drawn, the conclusion reached by the jury finds reasonable support in the evidence and cannot be disturbed. Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332; People v. Stafford Packing Co., 193 Cal. 719, 227 P. 485.

[5, 6] The court permitted an expert to make tests for the purpose of showing the effect of using in its preparation different proportions of the ingredients of the mixture and water at different temperatures. It is contended that the proportions and the temperature of the water used in certain tests were different from those which, according to the testimony of defendant's assistant, were used in the mixture in question, and that the tests were consequently misleading. The jury, however, was not bound to accept this testimony as conclusive; and as the court explained:

"These tests are merely for the purpose of throwing light upon the testimony of the experts as to the various degrees of heat which can be attained in different methods of mix or by using different degrees of temperature of water. Of course, it is not the purpose of the tests to show that in this particular case the defendant used the particular mixture that is being demonstrated."

In view of the explanation of their purpose the tests were not misleading, and the facts shown were relevant to the issues. The admission of evidence of this character is largely within the discretion of the trial court (Maris v. Crummeys, Inc., 55 Cal. App. 573, 204 P. 259), and in the present case no abuse of discretion is shown.

The motion for nonsuit was properly denied, and, the verdict being supported by the evidence, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

DEACON v. BRYANS. (Civ. 4873.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 13, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—If evidence conflicts, trial court's findings will not be disturbed.

If record discloses a substantial conflict in evidence, trial court's findings will not be disturbed.

2. Evidence ⇨594—Testimony of witness need not be accepted as true merely because there is no direct evidence contradicting it.

Testimony of witness need not be accepted as true merely because there is no direct evidence to contradict it, since it within itself may bear earmarks of falsity, or other facts at trial may justify inferences or presumptions establishing conflict therewith.

3. Evidence ⇨178(8)—After plaintiff testified instruments sued on could not be found, evidence was admissible to prove their execution, delivery, and contents.

Where plaintiff sued on lost notes, his testimony that, subsequent to death of maker, search was made, and instruments could not be found, was foundation for admission of evidence to prove contents of instruments and their execution and delivery.

4. Lost instruments ⇨23(3)—Witness' description of lost note, sued on, held inadequate as identification thereof.

In action on lost note, alleged to be of value of $5,000, payable in monthly installments, with acceleration of maturity clause, testimony of witness who qualified as to his familiarity with maker's signature, being insufficient as to details of note, was inadequate as identification of note sued on.

5. Lost instruments ⇨23(3)—In proving lost instrument, evidence of contents should be sufficient to show without reasonable doubt its substantial parts.

In proving a lost instrument, evidence of contents should be sufficient to show without reasonable doubt its substantial parts.

6. Lost instruments ⇨23(3)—In suit on lost instrument, evidence must be sufficient to identify instrument as being one sued on.

In addition to need for evidence to prove substantial parts of document lost, there must be sufficient evidence to identify instrument as being the one on which suit is brought.

7. Lost instruments ⇨23(3)—Testimony of witness as to contents of lost note held insufficient to identify note described with instrument sued on.

In action on lost note for $5,000, testimony of witness familiar with maker's handwriting, and claiming to have seen note that it was in usual legal form, and that he recognized sameness of note with other notes of maker, held insufficient as to contents to identify it with note sued on.

8. Appeal and error ⇨843(2)—Where finding that description was insufficient to identify lost note was supported by evidence, determination whether parts of note were material was unnecessary.

In action on a lost note, where trial court's finding that description of note by witness did not identify it with note sued on was one of fact, determination whether certain parts of a note are material was not required.

9. Lost instruments ⇨23(3)—Existence of note for $966 sued on as lost instrument was not proved, where only evidence showed note for something over $600.

Where note sued on as a lost instrument was alleged to be for $966, existence of note was not proved, where no witness testified to having seen note for approximately that sum; one witness only having claimed to have seen a note something over $600.

10. Witnesses ⇨178(3)—Where cross-examination of party was waiver of incompetency, sustaining objections to questions on redirect examination as to incidents before deceased's death was error (Code Civ. Proc. § 1880).

In action against executor to recover on notes of testatrix as lost instruments, defendant, by cross-examining plaintiff as to incidents occurring before death of deceased, waived incompetency of plaintiff as witness under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, and hence rulings sustaining objections to questions to witness on redirect examination on material issues and incidents occurring before death of deceased were prejudicially erroneous.

11. Lost instruments ⇨23(3)—Evidence held not to sustain finding that deceased executed note for $3,000, sued on as a lost instrument.

In action against executor on note of deceased for $3,000 alleged to have been lost, evidence held not to sustain finding that testatrix executed note for amount sued on as alleged.

12. Evidence $\Rightarrow$ 471 (29)—Testimony of witness that notes were in same form as Plaintiff's Exhibit A was not inadmissible as witness' conclusion.

In action to recover on notes as lost instruments, testimony of witness that notes he saw in possession of plaintiff were in same form as Plaintiff's Exhibit A was not inadmissible as witness' conclusion, since witness was testifying as to a fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action by Daniel A. Deacon against E. F. Bryans, as executor of the last will and testament of Helene D. Henrich, deceased. From judgment for plaintiff on one count only of the complaint, both parties appeal. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for Deacon.

Arthur F. H. Wright and Heskett & Weinberger, all of San Diego, for Bryans.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. Both parties appeal from the judgment rendered. The plaintiff does so, claiming that he should have recovered on all four counts contained in the complaint. The defendant insists that the evidence does not warrant any judgment against him. In each count a cause of action is stated upon a promissory note alleged to have been executed by Helene D. Henrich, deceased, and of whose estate Bryans is the executor. Each note is alleged to have been lost or stolen from the plaintiff, and to have long since been due and payable and unpaid. The principle of the note described in the first count is said to have been $5,000; that mentioned in the second count, the same amount; that in the third, $966, and that in the fourth, $3,000. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff on the fourth count, and for the defendant on the other three, as to which the findings are that it is not true that the said Helene D. Henrich executed the notes set forth therein.

[1, 2] The plaintiff-appellant insists as one of his grounds for reversal that these findings are unsupported by, and contrary to, the evidence. We begin an examination of the record, keeping in mind the familiar rule that, if a substantial conflict in the evidence is disclosed, the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal. Also, that the testimony of a witness need not be accepted as true, merely because there is no direct evidence to contradict it. It may within itself bear the earmarks of falsity, or other facts brought out during the trial may justify inferences or presumptions which may be sufficient to establish that conflict which will result in sustaining the judgment appealed from upon the ground now under consideration. This, we think, is such a case.

[3, 4] The theory of the plaintiff was that the notes had been lost. On direct examination he testified that, subsequently to the death of Helene D. Henrich, search was made, and the instruments could not be found. Having thus laid a foundation, evidence was admissible to prove the contents of the instruments and the execution and delivery of them, as alleged in the complaint. The plaintiff failed to produce such testimony, at least of the character which would warrant this court in saying that the trial judge was compelled as a matter of law to believe and accept it. One witness, William Kittner, called by the plaintiff, did not recall having seen any notes signed by Mrs. Henrich. Another witness, Humphreys, had seen notes bearing a signature purporting to be that of Helene D. Henrich, but he did not pretend to know her signature or to say that those appended to the notes concerning which he testified were signed by her.

Only one witness claimed to know the signature of the deceased. This was E. C. Jennings. Having qualified as to his familiarity with her signature, he said that the plaintiff had shown him four notes, each bearing the signature of Helene D. Henrich. He gave some detail of the contents of the notes, but not sufficient to remove reasonable doubts which may well have been entertained by the trial judge that these were the same notes described and relied upon by the plaintiff in his complaint.

The allegations of paragraph II of the first count are:

"That on or about the 19th day of March, 1921, at the city of San Diego, in said county and state, the said Helene D. Henrich, for a valuable consideration, made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiff her certain promissory note in writing, by the terms of which the said Helene D. Henrich thereby agreed to pay to plaintiff, at his place of business at No. 851 Seventh street, in said city of San Diego, the sum of $5,000, at the rate of $100 per month, together with interest on the principal at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable monthly, said installments of principal and interest being payable upon the 19th day of each and every month thereafter, until the whole of said principal and interest should be fully paid, and providing further that, in case said payments of principal and interest or any of them should not be paid when due and payable according to the terms and tenor of said promissory note, then, the whole of said principal and interest should become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of said note, and said promissory note further provided that, in case suit should be commenced or an attorney employed to enforce the payment thereof, then, in that event, the said Helene D. Henrich agreed to pay to plaintiff an additional sum of 10 per cent. on said principal and accrued interest as attorneys fees in such suit."

[5, 6] The witness Jennings, upon whose testimony plaintiff must rely, described no such instrument as among those which he saw in possession of the plaintiff in May, 1922, the date upon which he testified that he saw certain notes. It is true that it is an unquestioned requirement that in proving a lost instrument evidence of the contents should be sufficient to show without reasonable doubt its substantial parts. Counsel for plaintiff argue that the parts not shown are not material, and hence that the proof was sufficient. But, in addition to the need for evidence to prove the substantial parts of the document lost, in order that certainty may exist as to its terms, the further and equally important purpose is to identify the instrument as being the one upon which suit has been brought, for it would not do to sue on one cause of action and prove another, regardless of the certainty of the proof upon the material parts of that other. As to the $5,000 notes, the witness Jennings merely remembered that one was typewritten, and that the other was on a stationer's form. In one answer he said that the typewritten note was "for $10,000 or $5,000"; that it was a "promise to pay Daniel A. Deacon"; and was signed "Helene D. Henrich." We need not employ time and space to point out that this description is wholly inadequate as an identification of the note set forth in the first count. Not only is the identification insufficient, but material terms stipulating place, time, and manner of payment of the note, are unmentioned by the witness. It is true that he said this note was the same as a certain printed form, which form was, over objection of the defendant, introduced as Plaintiff's Exhibit A. But an inspection of this exhibit reveals that it conflicts with the note set up in the first count as to manner of payment, and, of course, the form supplies no information as to the time or place of payment.

[7] We proceed to consider the cause of action alleged in the second count. Paragraph II thereof reads:

"That on or about the 12th day of August, 1921, at the city of San Diego, and state of California, the said Helene D. Henrich, for a valuable consideration, made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiff her certain promissory note in writing, by the terms of which she promised and agreed to pay to plaintiff at his place of business at No. 851 Seventh street, San Diego, Cal., on or before the 12th day of August, 1922, the sum of $5,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from said date until paid, said note further providing that, in case suit should be commenced, or an attorney employed to enforce the payment thereof, then the said Helene D. Henrich agreed to pay an additional sum of 10 per cent. on said principal and interest as attorneys' fees in said suit."

As to the $5,000 notes, the witness Jennings, in addition to his testimony above quoted, stated, referring to the one on the printed form, "It was for $5,000," and that the maker promised to pay Daniel A. Deacon $5,000, and that it was in the usual legal form. Again, he said this note was in the same form as Exhibit A, and that he recognized the sameness, because he had signed notes on this identical form. But, as customary, the form in question leaves many elements blank, and concerning all such items the mind of the witness was also blank. He could not remember the date of any of these notes; nor when they became due; nor whether Helene D. Henrich's name was the only one appearing on the front of the notes. He had no recollection as to the rate of interest, if any, provided, or whether there was a provision for compounding interest if not paid when due; or whether or not the notes contained an acceleration clause, or provision for attorneys' fees in case of suit brought to collect; nor did the witness remember where the notes were made payable. If, as Jennings testified, the notes were upon a form identical with Exhibit A, they were payable "to the order of" Deacon, but the allegation of count II of the complaint is that the note therein sued upon was payable "to the plaintiff."

[8] With such incompleteness in the proof of the execution of the particular note described in the second count, and such dissimilarity between the contents of the note which the evidence tended to establish as having existed (and which both sides during the trial and in the briefs on appeal assume was the same note as that declared on in the second count if it was any one of those sued upon), the trial court would have been entirely justified in concluding that the note thus proved was the one alleged in said count. Such a conclusion is consistent with the court's findings. The question involved is one of fact, and there is substantial evidence to support the finding. Under these circumstances the case presented does not require a determination as to whether or not certain of the parts of a note are material—a question much discussed in the briefs. It is easily conceivable that a conflict upon a matter immaterial to the validity of a note might fully justify the conclusion that two descriptions of notes do not identify the same instrument. For example, suppose it were alleged in the complaint that the lost note was on a form printed only by a certain publisher, and a witness shown a printed blank put out by another publisher had identified it as the one employed for the note which he had seen. Here, if the trial court should hold that the proof was insufficient to show the note described in the complaint to have ever existed, it is clear that its decision would be upheld, although the evidence may have shown that a note was executed and may have proven every material part thereof. The evidence would have indicated a different note from that sued upon. This question of identity must always be one of fact. It is one which clearly arose in the decision of the issues presented on the second count in this case and in weighing the evidence offered in plaintiff's attempt to establish it.

[9] It is quite clear that the evidence failed to prove the existence of the note sued on in the third count. Without pointing out other deficiencies in that regard, it is sufficient to mention that the note described in the pleading is alleged to be one for $966. No witness testified to having seen a note for even approximately that sum; the nearest approach being that the witness Jennings thought the principal of one of the notes which he claimed to have seen was something over $600.

[10] It is urged that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to the plaintiff's testifying to certain events and conversations which took place prior to the death of Helene D. Henrich. Plaintiff concedes that, under section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure, ordinarily these rulings would have been required. However, he insists that the defendant waived the objection allowed by this section. It appears that, during the cross-examination of Deacon, counsel for defendant asked a number of questions having to do with the loss of the notes the answers to which necessarily concerned incidents happening before the demise of the maker. The questions and answers are as follows:

"Q. When did you make your last search for the alleged notes in question? A. About three weeks ago.

"Q. When did you make your first search for them? A. After the deceased—do you want me to answer, before the deceased died?

"Q. Well, I say, when did you make the first search for the notes? A. The first search I made was—let me see—May 31, 1922.

"Q. Where did you make the search? A. In my office.

"Q. Did you have a safe? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you look in the safe for them? A. I did.

"Q. Did you make a thorough search at that time to see if you could find them? A. I did.

"Q. How long before that had you missed them? A. I don't remember.

"Q. Well, approximately how long? A. Oh, not more than a couple of hours.

"Q. The same day? A. The same day.

"Q. The search was made at your office? A. Yes.

"Q. Had you been keeping them in the safe? A. I had up to the time I took them to the apartment house.

"Q. That was the 31st of May, 1922? A. The last—yes, a year ago."

Helene D. Henrich died on November 30, 1922.

The provisions of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable here read as follows:

"The following persons cannot be witnesses:
* * * Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim, or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person."

It cannot be doubted that the incompetency of the plaintiff may be waived by an executor. Kinley v. Largent, 187 Cal. 71, 200 P. 937. That such a waiver results when the representative of the estate of the deceased interrogates a plaintiff concerning what took place before the death of the deceased has also been decided in McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 206 P. 454.

However, the defendant contends that anything which the plaintiff may have testified on cross-examination concerning the loss of the notes did not make him a competent witness as to any transaction occurring before the death of the deceased and concerning the making, existence, or delivery of the notes, and it is pointed out that the matters upon which the plaintiff was cross-examined had to do only with the circumstances surrounding their alleged loss. Bagley v. Eaton, 10 Cal. 126, is cited as authority for the position thus taken, and as holding that, where the testimony adduced relates to matters merely preliminary and incidental, the provision of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply. At the time of the decision rendered in Bagley v. Eaton, said section had not been enacted. The common-law inhibition as to any party to an action testifying was then the rule, but, since that section became the law, a number of decisions have indicated the views of the Supreme Court upon the question here presented. We think the net result of these is to establish the rule that the language of the section is to be applied literally; that the parties prohibited from being witnesses cannot be witnesses—that is, cannot testify at all "as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person," whether incidental, preliminary, or otherwise. To this effect are Blood v. Fairbanks, 50 Cal. 420, and Moore v. Schofield, 96 Cal. 486, 31 P. 532. It is true that there is some apparent conflict in our authorities. In Roche v. Ware, 71 Cal. 375, 12 P. 284, 60 Am. Rep. 539; Colburn v. Parrett, 27 Cal. App. 541, 150 P. 786, and Tipps v. Landers, 182 Cal. 771, 190 P. 173, the right of a plaintiff to identify books kept during the lifetime of the decedent is upheld, but these decisions are limited by the holding in Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 P. 142, and Colburn v. Parrett, supra, that the party can go no further than to identify his books, and is not permitted to testify as to their correctness.

We conclude that, in cross-examining Deacon as to incidents occurring before the death of the deceased, the defendant waived the incompetency of the witness under the provision of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence that the subsequent rulings of the trial court sustaining objections to questions on redirect examination having to do with other material issues and incidents occurring before the death of Helene D. Henrich were prejudicially erroneous.

[11] As we have stated, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff on the fourth count. This is the one alleging a note in the principal sum of $3,000. It cannot be disputed that the amount of a note is one of the parts which are material. Here we have the situation that the witness Jennings did not testify that either of those which were shown him by the plaintiff was $3,000. In this respect his testimony was as uncertain as it was concerning the note set up in the third cause of action. On the other hand, although the witness Humphreys stated that one of the notes exhibited to him was in the amount of $3,000, this witness could not say that any of these notes bore the signature of Helene D. Henrich. He did not profess to know her signature, and hence it must be conceded that his testimony cannot be accepted alone as proof of a material and necessary part of the note. Although the court found that the deceased executed a note for $3,000 as alleged, the record presents not a conflict of evidence as to this count, but an entire lack of competent evidence to sustain the finding.

[12] No error was committed by the ruling permitting the witness Jennings to testify that the notes which he saw in possession of the plaintiff were in the same form as Plaintiff's Exhibit A. In answering this question the witness was not testifying to his conclusion any more than every statement of a fact is in one sense a witness' conclusion. The question thus presented is not distinguished from that of Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 43, 73 P. 803, where it was held proper to permit a witness to state that a blank form of deed exhibited to him was the same as he had used in making the conveyance in question.

There are other points presented by the appellants, but, in view of our decision upon those herein discussed, it will be unnecessary to consider them.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial upon all four counts.

We concur: THOMPSON, J.; VALENTINE, Justice pro tem.

STARR v. LEE et al. (Civ. 5944.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 14, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 12, 1928.

1. Damages ⇨79(4)—Actual damages by delay in commencing drilling of oil well held so uncertain or speculative as to require that sum stipulated be held liquidated damages (Civ. Code, § 1671).

Evidence in action on contract, providing for payment of sum sued for on failure to commence drilling oil well within certain time, held to show actual damages to be so uncertain or speculative as to require that such provision be held one for liquidated damages under Civ. Code, § 1671.

2. Damages ⇨79(1)—Sum agreed to be paid on breach of contract generally will be held liquidated damages, where actual damages are uncertain or purely speculative (Civ. Code, § 1671).

If actual damages by breach of contract are uncertain or purely speculative, and contract furnishes no data for their ascertainment, provision for payment of stated sum in case of breach will generally be held one for liquidated damages, rather than a penalty, under Civ. Code, § 1671.

3. Damages ⇨76—Whether contract calls for liquidated damages or penalty must be determined from circumstances when made (Civ. Code, § 1671).

Whether contract is to be construed as calling for liquidated damages under Civ. Code, § 1671, or a penalty, must be determined according to circumstances at time contract was made, and fact that conditions at time of breach were so changed that it would then be practicable and not difficult to fix actual damages does not affect character of contract.

4. Damages ⇨163(3)—Substantial damage by breach of contract need not be shown in action for liquidated damages (Civ. Code, § 1671).

In action for liquidated damages, under Civ. Code, § 1671, for breach of contract, it is unnecessary to show that substantial damage resulted from breach.

5. Appeal and error ⇨882(11)—Defendant, on whose objection plaintiff's evidence of damage was excluded, cannot complain of judgment for liquidated damages for want of evidence of any damage (Civ. Code, § 1671).

Defendant, on whose objection plaintiff's evidence of damage sustained by breach of contract was excluded as immaterial and irrelevant, cannot say that judgment for liquidated damages under Civ. Code, § 1671, should be reversed for want of evidence that any damage resulted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by E. G. Starr against M. E. Lee, K. Lundeen, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Lundeen appeals. Affirmed.

George M. Pierson and D. H. Laubersheimer, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles W. Fournl, of Los Angeles, and Harry G. Sodicoff, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued upon a contract whereby the defendants agreed to pay him the sum of $5,000 if they failed to commence the drilling of an oil well before a fixed day. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant Lundeen alone has appealed on a type-written transcript under section 953 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure.

At the time of the execution of the undertaking, plaintiff held a lease from the title owners of a lot of land 30x130 feet located in the Signal Hill oil field in the county of Los Angeles. This lease called upon plaintiff to "spud in and commence the actual drilling of a well" within 40 days after delivery to him of a certificate showing title to the premises vested in the lessors, to continue drilling with reasonable diligence until oil was found in paying quantities, or until the well should reach a depth of 3,500 feet, and to pay the lessors as royalties 16½ per cent. of the proceeds received from the sale of all oil, gas, or other hydrocarbon substances extracted. On December 9, 1922, plaintiff and defendants Lundeen and Lee executed an "oil and gas contract" whereby these defendants agreed to commence the drilling of a well upon the premises and to perform all the provisions of plaintiff's lease which were to be performed by him and to pay plaintiff 30 per cent. royalty, out of which he was to pay the royalties stipulated to the original lessors. The undertaking upon which the suit is based was executed the same day, and, as a part of the same transaction, the plaintiff gave to the defendants certain writings wherein he specified the time for the commencement of work as 30 days after "I show you clear title" and also an easement to the 30x60 feet west of the lot described. This date was left blank at the time of signing the oil and gas contract and also in the undertaking, but the date "25th of January, 1923," was later inserted by agreement; that date being 30 days after certificate of title and easement were shown to defendants. The defendants actually commenced to "spud in" on February 7, 1923, 13 days after the time called for in their contract, and, in order to protect himself from a forfeiture of the lease, plaintiff procured from the owners of the land an extension of time for performance under his lease.

At the beginning of the trial, plaintiff amended his complaint by adding the allegation that at the time of entering into the undertaking "it was impracticable or extremely difficult to estimate the amount of damages which would accrue to plaintiff by reason of the default or failure of defendants Lee and Lundeen to spud in an oil well on said property as required, * * * for the reason that there was not then, nor at any other time or now, any method or means by which it may be ascertained as to the amount of oil that would be lost to plaintiff by reason of the delay" and for the further reason that plaintiff's lease with the owners of the property would expire on February 3, 1923, unless said work had been commenced. The issue was thus drawn whether the undertaking came within the provisions of section 1471 of the Civil Code permitting the parties to a contract to liquidate the damages for its breach when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damages. The trial court found that the allegations of the complaint touching this issue were true, and gave judgment for plaintiff on the theory that the damages had been liquidated in a proper case.

[1] On the appeal from the judgment, the appellant states his grounds to be that the findings are not supported by the evidence and that the findings do not support the judgment. He does not specify any particular finding which he claims to be unsupported and does not state wherein the findings as a whole fail to support the judgment. The respondent has taken up the burden of printing the evidence tending to show that the contract came within the rule of section 1671, Civil Code. It was shown that the time within which appellant and his associate were to commence drilling was but 10 days prior to the time when respondent was required to commence drilling under his lease with the owners; that respondent had executed, and deposited in escrow, a quitclaim deed conveying to the owners all his interest in the lease if he failed to commence drilling by the date fixed in the lease; that the land was located in a newly discovered oil field where drilling operations were proceeding at a feverish pace, many wells being located within 40 or 50 feet of each other on small town lots, four or five being within a radius of 200 feet of the property covered by the contract in suit; that two wells within 250 feet of this property were producing 2,000 barrels of oil a day; and that in operations of this kind the well first reaching the oil strata often drained the oil from that level, and this made it necessary to drill later wells to a greater depth at an increased expense. On the direct issue of the feasibility of estimating damages for delay in drilling an expert witness testified that there was no method by which such damage could be estimated, because wells in close proximity often drain each other and the one first completed has the advantage in that it opens up certain channels and starts a flow in its direction, but that this is not always true; that "there is no way of telling exactly, or anywhere near exactly, how much of one well's oil another well takes." The appellant has not cited any evidence in conflict with this, and merely rests on the statement that this finding is not supported.

[2] The case comes within the rule that, if the actual damages are uncertain, or are of a purely speculative character, and the contract furnishes no data for their ascertainment, the provision will, as a rule, be held to be one for liquidated damages. 8 R. C. L. p. 569; Escondido Oil, etc., Co. v. Glaser, 144 Cal. 494, 500, 77 P. 1040; Huggins v. Daley (C. C. A.) 99 F. 606, 609, 48 L. R. A. 320. In the latter case the court, speaking of the peculiar character of a contract for boring an oil well, said:

"There is, perhaps, no other business in which prompt performance is so essential to the rights of the parties, or delays so likely to prove injurious—no other class of contracts in which time is so much of the essence. There is no other branch of mining where greater damage is done by delay. Coal and precious metals lie either in horizontal veins or in pockets. They remain where they are until removed. Oil and gas are the most uncertain, fluctuating, volatile, and fugitive of all mining properties. They lie far below the surface, beyond the control of human will, and beyond the reach of any legal process, whence they may flow unrestrained if the owner of adjoining land bores a well down to the strata which holds them; and there is no law which can provide adequate, or indeed any, compensation for such results. This is a matter of common knowledge, and 'courts will generally take notice of whatever ought to be generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction.' Greenl. Ev. § 6."

[3-5] The character of the contract, whether it is to be construed as calling for liquidated damages or a penalty, is to be determined according to the circumstances existing at the time the contract was made, and the fact that at the time of the breach conditions have so changed that it would then be practicable and not difficult to fix the actual damage does not affect the character of the contract. Hanlon Drydock, etc., Co. v. McNear, 70 Cal. App. 204, 210, 232 P. 1002. It is also unnecessary, in a case of this kind, to show that substantial damage resulted from the breach. 8 R. C. L. p. 578; Rispin v. Midnight Oil Co. (C. C. A.) 291 F. 481, 34 A. L. R. 1331; Davidson v. Hughes, 76 Kan. 247, 91 P. 913, 914. We find authorities holding that recovery cannot be had when the evidence shows that no damage at all resulted from the breach, but the rule is not available to the appellant because, when respondent attempted to prove damage, he was foreclosed by appellant's objection that it was immaterial and irrelevant. Appellant cannot now say that the judgment should be reversed because this evidence was not admitted. Harp v. Harp, 136 Cal. 421, 424, 69 P. 28.

In his reply brief, the appellant has advanced new grounds upon which he insists that the judgment must be reversed. Without exception the arguments are based upon false premises unsupported by evidence from the record. They are all to the same effect—that because such and so is the case the contract is not one coming within the purview of section 1671 of the Civil Code permitting the liquidation of damages. We have discussed the rules of law applicable to the facts as they appear from the evidence which has been brought to our attention and these require an affirmance of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. CARLSTON. (Civ. 6049.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 7, 1928. As Modified Jan. 24, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court March 5, 1928.

1. Contracts ⇨147(3)—Interpretation of contract depends upon intent, ascertained from entire contract and subject-matter.

In interpreting contracts, function of court is to ascertain mutual intention of parties from writing, if possible, and intention is determined by giving force and effect to entire contract with reference to subject-matter of contract.

2. Contracts ⇨143—Language expressing incidental matters is restricted to main purpose of agreement.

Words in contract which express incidental matters will be restricted to main purpose of contract, as courts only have power to construe contract of parties and no power to make new contract.

3. Corporations ⇨123(14)—Maker who had not paid notes held not entitled to recover agreed value of collateral sold, notwithstanding payee's agreement to return security or pay for it.

Contract consisting of promissory notes, with recital of deposit of collateral security which maker empowered payee to sell and of separate agreement relative to renewal of notes, which provided payee would make payment to maker for shares of stock assigned as collateral at specified rate per share if they were sold or not returned to her, held contract for loan of money secured by deposit of collateral security, under which maker was not entitled to recover agreed value of shares of stock assigned as collateral and sold where notes had not yet been paid.

4. Corporations ⇨123(14)—Contract consisting of notes and agreement for payment or return to maker of collateral held not severable, so as to permit recovery of value of stock sold.

Contract consisting of notes with deposit of stock as collateral security, which payee was authorized to sell, and of agreement that payee should pay over to maker so much of stock assigned as collateral as was sold or not returned to her at specified rate, held not severable so as to permit maker's recovery of value of shares of stock sold without proof of payment of notes.

5. Corporations ⇨123(17)—Court must assume payee complied with contract by returning collateral, where complaint to recover agreed value of collateral did not deny it.

In action by maker of original and renewal notes to recover agreed value of stock pledged as collateral, court was required to assume that additional shares of stock pledged were returned to maker not later than the due date of the original notes, where contract provided for return at such time and complaint contained no allegation to the contrary.

6. Corporations ⇨123(22)—Payee delivering up collateral was not bound by contract to pay for or return collateral, on taking repledge thereof to secure renewal notes.

Where contract in connection with giving of notes and pledging of stock as security provided for return of additional shares before due date of original notes, return of such shares under contract discharged payee from liability to pay agreed value thereof under another covenant of contract, when shares were subsequently re-deposited as security for renewal notes.

7. Corporations ⇨123(17)—Complaint of maker of notes seeking recovery of price of collateral sold held subject to special demurrer for failure to show whether collateral was pledged before contract sued on was discharged.

Complaint of maker of notes in action to recover value of collateral security sold, under contract requiring its return or payment of agreed price, held subject to special demurrer for failure to show whether sale occurred by reason of pledge given to secure original notes or by reason of pledge given to secure renewal notes at time when defendant's liability under contract was discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by Evelyn Ellis Smith against J. F. Carlston. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James F. Peck and John H. McDaniels, both of San Francisco, and W. B. Bunker, of Oakland (C. M. Peck, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover a judgment for money. Thereafter the plaintiff filed an amended complaint. The defendant pleaded thereto by filing a general and special demurrer. The demurrer was sustained, with leave to amend. The plaintiff having failed to amend within the time allowed, a judgment was entered against her, and she has appealed, bringing up the judgment roll.

As stated by the plaintiff, the question presented on the appeal involves the construction of certain writings. On January 17, 1922, the plaintiff executed and delivered documents which she calls Exhibits A, C, and D. Exhibit A was as follows:

"Exhibit A.

"$8,487.00 Oakland, Calif., Jan. 12, 1922.

"On or before one year from date, without grace, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of J. F. Carlston, at my office in the city, the sum of eighty-eight thousand four hundred and eighty-seven and no/100 dollars, payable in United States gold coin, with interest in like gold coin, from date until paid at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum, payable June 30th and December 31st; and if not so paid to compound and become a part of the principal, and bear interest thereafter at the same rate.

"Evelyn Ellis Smith.

"And as collateral security for the payment of the above note, and the interest to grow due thereon, I have deposited with J. F. Carlston the following property, to wit: Cert. 79 for 50,000 shares West End Cons. Mining Co. stock; Cert. 225 for 25,000 shares West End Cons. Mining Co. stock; Cert. 8366 for 25,000 shares West End Chemical Co. stock.

"And should said note or any part thereof, or the interest to grow due thereon, remain due and unpaid after the same should have been paid, according to the tenor of said note, I hereby irrevocably authorize and empower said J. F. Carlston, or his assigns, to sell and dispose of the above described property, or any part thereof, at public or private sale, with or without previous notice to me of any such sale, and from the proceeds arising therefrom, to pay the principal, interest, charges, and the cost of sale, and the balance, if any, to pay over to me or my representatives, upon demand. In case of deterioration of any of the above securities, or fall in the market value of the same, I hereby promise and agree to reduce the amount of said note, or to increase the security in proportion to such deterioration or decrease of value in default of which this note shall be considered due under the above stipulation. On the payment of the above note, interest and charges, according to the terms thereof, this agreement shall be void, and the above described securities returned to me. Evelyn Ellis Smith."

Exhibit D is a promissory note in exactly the same form and words except it is for the principal sum of $75,000. It purports to be secured by the same securities.

Exhibit C is as follows:

"Exhibit C.

"1. This agreement, made and entered into by and between J. F. Carlston of the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, party of the first part, and Evelyn Ellis Smith, of the same city, county and state, party of the second part, witnesseth:

"2. That the said Evelyn Ellis Smith has been requested by the said J. F. Carlston to execute two promissory notes; one in the amount of seventy-five thousand dollars ($75,000), payable on or before one year after date, dated January 12, 1922; one for eighty-eight thousand, four hundred eighty-seven dollars ($88,487), payable on or before one year after date, dated January 12, 1922, as a renewal of three notes heretofore given by Evelyn Ellis Smith to the said J. F. Carlston, as follows:

"3. One for fifty-five thousand, eight hundred and 84/100 dollars ($55,800.84), payable on demand, dated February 25, 1921; two for fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) each, payable on demand dated February 25, 1921. Said last three notes are secured, first by a promissory note of the F. M. Smith Securities Company, dated February 28, 1918, for the amount of one hundred thirty-four thousand, five hundred eighty-six and 62/100 dollars ($134,586.62), which said Securities Company note is itself secured by 1,980 shares of stock of the Realty Syndicate; 100 shares of preferred stock of Oakland Traction Company; second by 100,000 shares stock of West End Consolidated Mining Company; and

"4. Whereas the said J. F. Carlston has requested that the above two notes to be given as a renewal of the said three notes now outstanding, be secured by additional shares of stock, to be divided as follows: Fifty thousand (50,000) shares West End Consolidated Mining Company and fifty thousand (50,000) shares West End Chemical Company stock, which last named one hundred thousand shares of stock are hereinafter referred to as '100,000 additional shares.'

"5. Now, therefore, it is hereby agreed by and between the parties hereto, that in consideration of said Evelyn Ellis Smith granting the request of J. F. Carlston, the said J. F. Carlston will on or before the due date of the said two renewal notes to be executed as above, accomplish a renewal of the said two notes for a further similar period of one year, making the last named expiration date two years from the date hereof; and it is further agreed by the said J. F. Carlston, that in addition to extending the time as hereinbefore stated, he will, and hereby does guarantee and agree to release from the pledge so securing said notes and return to said Evelyn Ellis Smith the 100,000 additional shares of stock at such time as the said notes shall be paid by said Evelyn Ellis Smith, or at such time as said notes shall be returned to said J. F. Carlston, and under any circumstances said 100,000 additional shares shall be released and returned to Evelyn Ellis Smith not later than the due date of the said notes executed herewith.

"6. That said J. F. Carlston further, in consideration of the premises, agrees and guarantees that should the said 100,000 additional shares, or any thereof, be sold under the said pledge thereof by any person whomsoever, that the said J. F. Carlston will account to and pay to the said Evelyn Ellis Smith for such of the said 100,000 additional shares as are so sold or as are not returned to her as herein agreed, at the rate of three dollars ($3.00) per share for each share of said 100,000 additional shares of stock which may be so sold or which may not be returned to her, as aforesaid.

"7. The said J. F. Carlston further agrees to immediately deliver to said Evelyn Ellis Smith upon the execution of said two notes herewith the above-mentioned note of the F. M. Smith Securities Company and the collateral securing it.

"Executed in duplicate.

"In witness whereof, the said parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals this 17th day of January, 1922.

"[Signed] J. F. Carlston. [Seal.]

"[Signed] Evelyn Ellis Smith. [Seal.]"

On December 31, 1922, the plaintiff executed and delivered two promissory notes, Exhibits B and E. Those notes are in exactly the same form as Exhibits A and D, but are dated December 31, 1922, and each is payable on demand. Each purports to be secured by the same security as Exhibits A and D. The complaint recites that Exhibits A and D were surrendered on December 31, 1922, and Exhibits B and E were thereupon executed and delivered. (The italics and the number to paragraphs are ours.)

In her complaint the plaintiff alleged that the defendant "never returned to plaintiff the said 100,000 shares of stock. * * *" In her brief she makes the contention that the promise of the defendant "was one for alternative performance, i. e., to return the shares or to pay $3 per share." Thereupon she argues that she was entitled to judgment in the sum of $300,000.

[1] The statement quoted from the brief is not sustained by the record. It is but the conclusion of the plaintiff, drawn from the recitals contained in the written instruments which have been hereinabove set forth.

[2] In so far as a sale is concerned, the statement contained in paragraph 6 of Exhibit C, "that the said J. F. Carlston will pay * * * $3 per share," stands alone and it is in no way fortified as showing or tending to show a sale as of any date. The function of interpretation is at all times to ascertain the mutual intention of the parties. That intention will be ascertained from the writing, if possible. To accomplish that result the court will endeavor to give force and effect to every part of the contract. However broad may be the terms of a contract, it extends only to those things concerning which it appears that the parties intended to contract. Where there are several provisions or particulars, such a construction is, if possible, to be adopted as to give effect to all. The rules forbid the seizure upon some isolated provision in order to compel a certain result. 6 Cal. Jur. 258, § 165. The incident follows the principal, and not the principal the incident. Looking back at the instruments which we have set forth, it is at once apparent that the parties were attempting to form an agreement regarding the borrowing of money on promissory notes secured by collateral. Although as an incident the instrument contained a covenant by the defendant that under certain circumstances he "will pay," those words will be restricted to the main purpose of the contract. As courts have power to construe, but have no power to make, contracts for the parties, the passage relied on may not be construed into a sale of any kind. In the case of Westcott v. Thompson, 18 N. Y. 363, the facts were that a brewer sold 67 barrels of ale to a retailer, upon an agreement that the barrels should be returned after the ale should be drawn from them, but if any were not returned, the retailer should pay $2 apiece for them. The court held that the property in the barrels remained in the brewer, and that the agreement to pay $2 apiece for them if not returned was intended to fix the damages for the loss of such as the retailer should be unable to return. In the case of Wilmington Trans. Co. v. O'Neil, 98 Cal. 1, 32 P. 705, the Wilmington Company rented to O'Neil a lighter at $50 per month. Among other things, it was provided that if the lighter should be "lost or damaged to the extent that it cannot be put in the same good condition as when received, the party of the second part, to pay the party of the first part, the sum of $3,500 for said lighter Wilmington." There, as here, it was contended that the contract provided for a sale. Regarding such a contention, at page 7 (32 P. 707) the court remarked:

"I therefore think the sum of $3,500 was not intended as a penalty, but was intended as stipulated damages, unless the agreement may be construed to be a sale of the lighter on the condition that it should be lost, which seems absurd. * * * If the property in the lighter remained in the plaintiff until it 'was lost and destroyed,' how could it pass to the defendant after the lighter was totally lost—sunk to the bottom of the ocean, or totally consumed by fire? If it could pass under such circumstances, I think the agreement fails to express an intention to that effect."

The court cited with approval Westcott v. Thompson, supra.

In the case of D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Joselyn, 92 Minn. 266, 99 N. W. 890, the Supreme Court of Minnesota was considering a contract which, among other things, contained this covenant:

"The party of the first part (plaintiff) sells and the party of the second part (defendants) buys the Osborne Columbia corn harvesters listed," etc. (Italics ours.)

After considering the terms of the entire contract, "taking it up by its four corners, * * *" the court reached the conclusion that the instrument created the relation of principal and agent and was not a contract to buy and sell.

In cases involving loans, secured by collateral deposits, similar questions have been presented. In nearly every one of the cases the facts disclosed that there were detached statements which, if they stood alone, would indicate a sale. However, the courts have repeatedly held that the contract must be construed as a whole and from that we must ascertain the main purpose of the contract and not rest our determination on one or two detached statements. In re Grand Union Co. (C. C. A.) 219 F. 353; Western Underwriting & Mortgage Co. v. Valley Bank (C. C. A.) 237 F. 45, 50; Mitchell v. Cramp (C. C. A.) 8 F.(2d) 481; Shelley v. Byers, 73 Cal. App.

44, 60, 61, 238 P. 177; Hughes v. Harlam, 166 N. Y. 427, 60 N. E. 22, 24; Continental Credit Co. v. Ely, 91 Conn. 553, 100 A. 434, 437; Barker Piano Co. v. Commercial Security Co., 93 Conn. 129, 105 A. 328, 330; American Lumber Co. v. Quiett Mfg. Co., 162 N. C. 395, 78 S. E. 284.

That the parties, in the action which we are considering, might have created an alternative contract if they had used appropriate language to that effect, will not be disputed. Some contracts of that kind are cited by the plaintiff. Stevens v. Hertzler, 109 Ala. 423, 19 So. 838; Pearson v. Williams, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 244; Baker v. Wentworth, 17 Me. 347; Austin v. Seligman (C. C.) 18 F. 519; Bianchi v. Nash, 1 M. & W. 545; Tennessee River Transp. Co. v. Kavanaugh, 93 Ala. 324, 9 So. 395; Haskins v. Dern, 19 Utah, 89, 56 P. 953; Guss v. Nelson, 200 U. S. 298, 26 S. Ct. 260, 50 L. Ed. 489. In each and all of the cases just cited it will be found that the contract of the parties contained appropriate language of sale or conveyance, which language led the court to the conclusion that, among other things, one of the purposes of the contract was to sell or convey.

The plaintiff says the stock was mining stock and subject to great fluctuation. That fact is of no help in deciding the case. If the stock was worth not to exceed $3 when Exhibit C was written, and if it was worth $30 when "the due date of the said notes executed herewith" (paragraph 5) arrived, it would scarcely be argued that then and under those circumstances the defendant would be entitled to demand that the plaintiff pay her notes, principal, and interest, and that she accept $300,000 for stock which at that time would be worth ten times that amount. Nevertheless, such arguments have been made. In the case of Taylor v. Burns, 8 Ariz. 463, 76 P. 623, the court was considering a written instrument. The facts in favor of the appellant were stronger than the facts in this case. In that case the writing, among other things, contained the covenant "that the said party of the first part * * * sells to the said party of the second part. * * *" At page 624 (8 Ariz. 467), it is said:

"The only question involved is the construction to be given the agreement between Taylor and Burns. The contention of the appellant is that the agreement amounted to a sale to him of the mines for a given and valid consideration expressed in the instrument. The contention of counsel for the appellees is that, from the instrument as a whole, it clearly amounts to nothing more than a power of attorney authorizing Taylor to negotiate the sale of the claims upon the terms stated in the agreement, revocable at will. Upon the latter contention, it was admitted by the appellant that, if the instrument was revocable at the will of Burns, such revocation was made by Burns on February 27, 1903.

"It is a settled rule of construction of instruments of this character that the intention of the parties must govern, as this intention is evidenced by a consideration of the entire instrument. Williams v. Paine, 169 U. S. 76, 18 S. Ct. 279, 42 L. Ed. 658. 'The elementary canon of interpretation is not that particular words may be isolatedly considered, but that the whole contract must be brought into view and interpreted with reference to the nature of the obligations between the parties, and the intention which they have manifested in forming them.' O'Brien v. Miller, 168 U. S. 287, 18 S. Ct. 140, 42 L. Ed. 469. Tested by this rule, the agreement cannot be construed as a conveyance."

Later the case was appealed to the United States Supreme Court. 203 U. S. 120, 27 S. Ct. 40, 51 L. Ed. 116. Mr. Justice Brewer, writing the opinion, at page 125 (27 S. Ct. 41), said:

"Nowhere in the instrument does the party of the second part assume any obligations, except the general one in the third paragraph, by which both parties mutually agree to aid each other in the negotiation and sale of the mining claims. The instrument does not in terms grant or convey. The nearest approach to a word of conveyance is 'sells.' This is more apt in describing the passing of the title of personal than of real property. Not that this is decisive, for not infrequently it is held to manifest an intent to convey the title to the property named, whether real or personal. But when the purpose of the transaction is stated the word will ordinarily have no more effect upon the title than is necessary to accomplish the purpose." (Italics ours.)

The plaintiff disclaims any attempt to plead a cause of action as for damages. All such theories therefore may be passed without further discussion. No claim is made that the plaintiff was attempting to plead a cause of action sounding in equity. If it were made, the opinion written by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in Western Underwriting & Mortgage Co. v. Valley Bank, supra, would be a complete answer. In that case, after holding that the contract was not one of sale but was one of deposit for security, the court continued, and at page 50 the court said:

"* * * and, under any theory of this case, the complainant cannot recover assets remaining in the Valley Bank until it has first repaid to that bank the amount due as a deficiency on account of the debts of the Union Bank & Trust Company paid by the Valley Bank."

[3] Finally, we will assume that plaintiff was attempting to plead a cause of action based on a covenant. Taking the documents which were executed January 17, 1922, together, and looking at them as a whole, it is clear that the contract was one for the loan of money secured by the deposit of collateral as security for the repayment of the money so loaned, and that, until the money was repaid, neither the collateral nor the proceeds would be returned to the plaintiff. The repayment of the money loaned was clearly a condition. However, the plaintiff does not allege that she has paid the notes or any part thereof, nor does she allege that she has duly performed all the conditions on her part. This omission on her part was fatal. L. A. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Amal. Oil Co., 156 Cal. 776, 778, 106 P. 55. We are aware that it is her contention that she claims that she was relying on paragraph 6 of Exhibit C. In so doing she assumes the contract was severable. Whether it was, or was not, is a question of interpretation.

[4] The intent of the parties is to be ascertained from a consideration of the language employed and the subject-matter of the contract. L. A. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Amal. Oil Co., supra. We have no hesitancy in saying that the contract before us was not severable in the respect in which the plaintiff contends. By the expressed language of each note the defendant was authorized to receive and hold, and, under certain circumstances, to sell, the collateral. Wherein paragraph 6 provides that, not later than the due date of the notes executed herewith, "the defendant will pay," the language is no stronger than had it been "the defendant will return." Neither covenant changed the expressed covenants of the notes that the defendant took and held the collateral as security and that he had the power to sell.

Whether looked upon as an action for damages, or in equity, or an action on the contract, the complaint did not state facts sufficient and the demurrer was properly sustained.

[5-7] The defendant earnestly contends that each and every ground stated in his special demurrer was sound. We think it is not necessary to consider each attack. However, the defendant calls to our attention the fact that notes Exhibits B and E have been executed in place and stead of notes Exhibits A and D. He then argues that there has been a novation. The plaintiff replies that the notes first mentioned are the renewal notes provided for in paragraph 5 of Exhibit C. Conceding such to be the facts, we will pass to a consideration of at least one of the attacks made by the special demurrer. The last attack was:

"It does not appear and cannot be ascertained therefrom whether it is meant to allege that the sale referred to in paragraph V thereof was made by persons to whom defendant had pledged the stock referred to in said paragraph, or whether it is meant to allege that said sale was made by persons to whom said defendant had assigned one of the notes executed to him, and if so, which one of said notes."

If we read with care all of the papers hereinabove set forth, it is apparent that Exhibit C provides that the "additional shares" will be returned "not later than the due date of the said notes executed herewith" (that is, Exhibits A and D). Nothing to the contrary being alleged, we must assume that they were so returned. Furthermore, on the face of the papers it would appear that the "additional shares" were returned and thereafter that they were redeposited as security on the later notes, Exhibits B and E. But the return of the "additional shares" at the time Exhibits B and E were executed, would wholly discharge the defendant under his covenants contained in Exhibit C. It was therefore material to the defendant to know whether the sale referred to in paragraph 5 of the complaint occurred by reason of the pledge given to secure the earlier notes, Exhibits A and D, or Exhibits B and E. The demurrer was interposed for the purpose of bringing forth that information. It follows that the ruling on the demurrer was properly made for the additional reason just stated.

The judgment is affirmed.

HERZ v. HEREFORD. (Civ. 4635.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 10, 1928.

1. Judgment $\S$ 393—Court could not, on motion to vacate judgment, change findings of fact no matter by whom they were prepared (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 663, 663a).

Where, in action to quiet title, findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment for plaintiff were signed by trial judge, he exceeded his jurisdiction in motion under Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 663, 663a, to set aside judgment as not supported by findings, by changing findings, no matter by whom findings were prepared.

2. Pleading $\S$ 245(6) — After findings were signed, trial court could not grant time to plaintiff to amend complaint.

In action to quiet title, where findings of fact, conclusions of law and judgment for plaintiff were signed by judge and filed, judge was not empowered, after findings were signed, to grant time to plaintiff to amend complaint, and order therefor was void.

3. Quieting title $\S$ 10(1) — Defendant was entitled to judgment, where neither complaint nor findings showed plaintiff's ownership or right to possession or use of land.

In action to quiet title, defendant was entitled to judgment, where there was no allegation in complaint, nor any finding that plaintiff owned land or had right to possession, nor was there finding of nonpayment of rental or reasonable value of use and occupation.

Action by George Herz against C. D. Hereford. Defendant's motion to set aside judgment for plaintiff was denied, and he appeals. Order reversed with instructions.

H. E. Gleason, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jas. W. Glassford, of El Centro, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment for plaintiff were signed by the trial judge in this case and duly filed. Thereafter defendant, appellant herein, moved the court to set aside the judgment entered and to enter in its stead judgment for defendant on the ground that the judgment was not supported by the findings. Sections 663, 663a, Code Civ. Proc. At the conclusion of the presentation of this motion, and on the 15th day of June, 1923, the court made the following order:

"The motion of the defendant to vacate the judgment herein coming on to be heard, and it appearing to the court that the findings and judgment herein were prepared and submitted by the attorney for defendant, and that the defects in the complaint therein were never called to the attention of the court by the defendant's attorney until after the entry of judgment herein, and that the complaint herein should have been amended before entry of judgment to conform to the facts proved, and that defendant's demurrer to the third cause of action of plaintiff's complaint should have been sustained, now, therefore, the plaintiff, in open court consenting, it is ordered that the findings of fact, conclusions of law and judgment herein are hereby vacated, and the demurrer to plaintiff's complaint is sustained and plaintiff is given ten days to amend the same."

That the trial court was in error when it stated in its order that the defects of the complaint had never been called to its attention is established. A demurrer to the effect that neither alleged cause of action attempted to be stated in the complaint contained allegations of fact sufficient to state a cause of action was interposed, and, by statement of counsel for each party in their briefs, was argued to the court but before another judge.

[1, 2] While the order does not specifically deny the motion presented, it is inconsistent therewith and is in effect a denial thereof. The defendant appeals from the parts of said order which refuse to enter judgment in his favor on the findings of fact and which purport to set aside the findings of fact and to allow plaintiff ten days to amend his complaint.

The court exceeded its jurisdiction in making said order. It could not set aside or change its findings, no matter by whom they were prepared, and it follows, of course, that it had no power after findings were signed to grant time to plaintiff to amend his complaint, and such order as to these two points was void. Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 635, 209 P. 576; Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 325, 107 P. 616; Hole v. Takekawa, 165 Cal.

372, 375, 132 P. 445; Stanton v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 253 P. 973.

[3] There is no allegation in the complaint, nor is there any finding, that plaintiff owned the land or had any right to its possession, nor is there any finding as to nonpayment of the rental or reasonable value of use and occupation of the land. Richmond Wharf & Dock Co. v. Blake, 181 Cal. 454-457, 185 P. 184; Imperial Valley L. Co. v. Globe G. & M. Co., 187 Cal. 352, 354, 202 P. 129; Stringer v. Davis, 30 Cal. 318, 321.

That part of the order appealed from is reversed, and the lower court is instructed to make and enter conclusions of law that the defendant is entitled to a judgment for his costs, and to enter a judgment accordingly.

Action by E. J. Clinton against H. N. Yates and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. M. Estcourt, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Arthur Joel, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Presiding Justice pro tem. [1] This action is based upon a promissory note. Appellants admit the due execution and delivery of said note, but claim it was given without consideration. The undisputed evidence shows that in April, 1925, the respondent leased to the appellants for a term of two years a house; that in the house were certain household goods such as carpets, draperies, chairs, tables, etc.; that the respondent and appellants inventoried said goods and placed a separate value on each article, the total value being $642; that the appellants purchased said personal property, giving therefor the promissory note here sued upon. It further appears without conflict that said goods were of the reasonable value of said sum. Mrs. Yates, one of the appellants, testified that there was a further agreement which was a part of the consideration of said note, said agreement being that respondent was to give appellants a lease of said premises for five years, but respondent has failed and refused to do so. This testimony was contradicted by the respondent and his witnesses, and the trial court resolved the conflict in favor of the respondent. The rule, that the finding of the trial court under such circumstances will not be disturbed, is so well settled that it seems unnecessary to cite authority; however, Moss v. Smith, 181 Cal. 519, 185 P. 385, and Estate of Johnson, 182 Cal. 642, 189 P. 280, are among the later cases so holding.

[2] Appellants also refer to certain alleged errors in sustaining objections to questions which were propounded to a witness. There is no attempt made by counsel to point out wherein the rulings were prejudicial, but we have examined each assignment and find no error. Nearly all of the questions to which the objections were sustained called for the conclusion of the witness, and the objections thereto were properly sustained. Appellants were afforded every opportunity to present their case, and were not precluded from introducing any fact material to the issues.

[3, 4] Appellants contend that, because of the alleged illness or nervousness of Mrs. Yates, she was unable to testify coherently, and the court should have granted a continuance of the trial. The record does not disclose that a motion for a continuance was made, but, even if such a motion had been seasonably and properly made, its decision would have rested in the sound discretion of the court, and could only be disturbed by this court upon a showing of an abuse in the exercise of such discretion.

No reason has been shown why the judgment should be disturbed. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

TP., KERN COUNTY, et al. (L. A. 5211.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1926.

On petition for rehearing.

For former opinion, see 77 Cal. App. 95, 246 P. 82.

PER CURIAM. It is contended by petitioner that this court erred in holding that an appeal lies from an order of the justice's court made after judgment. We did not intend to so decide. In referring to "an appeal heard on a statement of the case," under the provisions of section 980, Code of Civil Procedure, we meant, of course an appeal from the judgment. The opinion is amended by striking from the first paragraph thereof the words "(respondent herein)."

The petition for rehearing is denied.

On application under Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3, for change of venue for convenience of witnesses testifying in support of defendant's title to property sued for by abandonment or failure to remove fixtures within time allowed by agreement between plaintiff's and defendant's transferors, plaintiff's counter affidavit, averring that its transferors would testify as to such agreement and sale of property to plaintiff and denying materiality and relevancy of testimony of defendant's witnesses, held not to warrant retention of case in county of venue for convenience of plaintiff's witnesses.

3. Venue ⚡52(1)—Denial of change of venue for convenience of witnesses residing in another county held abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3).

Where affidavits in support of, and opposition to, change of venue for convenience of witnesses, under Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3, showed that all material witnesses for defendant resided in another county, wherein transaction arose and plaintiff corporation, demanding jury trial, had its principal place of business, and counter affidavit did not aver that plaintiff's witnesses resided without such county or would be inconvenienced by trial in county wherein suit was brought, denial of motion was abuse of discretion, though depositions of defendant's witnesses could be taken.

BARTHOLOMAE OIL CORPORATION v. ASSOCIATED OIL CO. (S. F. 12054.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1928.

1. Venue ⚡68—Testimony that plaintiff failed to remove property sued for within time agreed held material on application to change venue for witnesses' convenience (Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3).

Testimony of witnesses, familiar with property alleged to have been converted by defendant and premises on which located, in support of allegations of answer that such property was affixed to premises, and became property of defendant's vendors on plaintiff's failure to remove it within time agreed held material on application for change of venue to county of such witnesses' residence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3, as tending to negative plaintiff's claim of ownership and establish defendant's title, whether on theory of abandonment or failure to remove fixtures.

SEAWELL, J. Defendant, Associated Oil Company, a corporation having its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, appeals from an order of the court below denying its motion for a change of venue to the county of Los Angeles in an action brought against it in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco by the Bartholomae Oil Company, a corporation having its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles. The motion was made after issue had been joined by the filing of an answer and after plaintiff had demanded a jury trial, and was based upon an affidavit whereby defendant sought to show that the convenience of material witnesses would be served by the change. Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3.

[1] The complaint alleges the conversion by defendant of a certain oil derrick and pipe and fittings, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $6,050. Defendant in its answer set up ownership in itself, and in "three separate and affirmative defenses" set forth certain facts upon which it relied to establish its title. The property alleged to have been converted was located upon property known as the "Whittier sewer farm," situate in the city of Whittier, county of Los Angeles, and, according to the allegations of the answer, was property affixed to and permanently resting upon the premises which became the property of the individuals from whom defendant purchased it upon the failure of plaintiff to remove it from said real property within the 90-day period allowed by the terms of "an agreement and partial assignment" entered into between defendant's transferors and the persons through whom plaintiff derived title, although all other property upon said premises was removed within the time allowed.

Defendant in its affidavit for a change of venue offered to prove the facts concerning the failure of plaintiff to remove the property here sued for, upon which it relies to establish its title, by witnesses therein named who reside in the county of Los Angeles, and who, it is averred, are professional and business men who would be greatly inconvenienced by coming to San Francisco for trial. According to the averments of the affidavit, the witness Goodell was assistant superintendent of the Whittier sewer farm on which the property sued for was located and observed the premises every day; the witness Thomas is superintendent of the Santa Fé Springs Division of the defendant and inspected the property on the premises in April, 1924, on which date all other property had been removed; the witness Ainsley is head rig builder for defendant and also inspected the property in April, 1924, and will testify to its value being less than the amount named in the complaint; the witness Kemmerer, a city trustee of Whittier and chairman of the sewer farm committee, visited the premises and inspected them frequently; the witness Hanawalt, as general foreman in charge of construction of a city sewer system on the property, resided on the premises and worked there daily between June 4, 1923, and April 8, 1924; the witness Smullin, in the business of drilling oil wells, the witness Crossen, a well driller and rig builder, and the witness Kohler, formerly general superintendent of the La Habra Midway Oil Company, all of whom are familiar with the property here sued for, will testify to its reasonable value.

By these witnesses defendant desires to prove the allegations of its answer. The evidence is clearly material, since it would tend to negative plaintiff's claim of ownership and establish defendant's title, whether defendant's defense be regarded as founded upon the theory that the property was of the kind designated as fixtures, to which plaintiff lost title by a failure to remove it from the premises within the 90-day period, or as based on the proposition that, irrespective of the principles of the law relating to fixtures the property became vested in defendant's transferors by virtue of an abandonment.

[2] Respondent in its counter affidavit avers that A. C. Harvey and W. H. Braun, its transferors, are material witnesses on its behalf, and that said witnesses reside in the county of Alameda, and hence are more conveniently situated with reference to San Francisco than Los Angeles. However, the facts which plaintiff avers that it expects to prove by said witnesses would not in any wise defeat or affect a title acquired by defendant in the manner set forth in the answer. By said witnesses plaintiff avers that it expects to prove a certain agreement between Harvey and Braun, its transferors, and defendant's transferors and the sale to it of the property here sued for. Defendant itself in its answer alleges the execution and recordation of the agreement between Harvey and Braun, on the one hand, and its transferors on the other, and it could well admit the sale to plaintiff without weakening its proposed defense. The convenience of said witnesses cannot therefore serve as a reason for retaining the case in San Francisco. The counter affidavit consists largely in a denial of the materiality and relevancy of the testimony concerning the failure to remove the property herein sued for, but this testimony we deem pertinent to the most important issue in the case, to wit, plaintiff's loss of title by a failure to remove the property. Plaintiff states no theory of the facts in rebuttal of defendant's defense which would render immaterial the facts defendant expects to prove. Neither does it claim that defendant can prove the facts concerning the failure to remove the property by other witnesses than those named, who reside in the county of Los Angeles, nor offer to prove by witnesses of its own, for whom San Francisco would be a more convenient place of trial than Los Angeles, the falsity of the facts concerning which defendant avers its witnesses will testify.

[3] From the showing made by the parties in their affidavits and from the record, upon which alone the motion was made and denied, it appears that all witnesses upon behalf of defendant who will be required to testify to material facts reside in the county of Los Angeles. Plaintiff has failed to aver that witnesses who will testify to facts aiding its case reside without the county of Los Angeles or would be inconvenienced if San Francisco, rather than Los Angeles, were the place of trial. The transaction arose entirely within the county of Los Angeles, and it is plaintiff, with its principal place of business in Los Angeles and the party demanding a jury trial, which is resisting the transfer. We are of the view that under the circumstances the denial of the motion for a change of the place of trial from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Los Angeles constituted an abuse of discretion, and that the order should be reversed. See Carr v. Stern, 17 Cal. App. 397, 120 P. 35, and Thompson v. Brandt, 98 Cal. 155, 32 P. 890. "It is true, of course, that, should the trial be had in San Francisco, their depositions [that of nonresident witnesses] could be taken, if their personal attendance could not be secured, still it is manifestly always more satisfactory and desirable, in jury cases in particular, to present the testimony first hand to those who must determine the questions of fact than to submit the same through depositions. * * *" Carr v. Stern, supra.

The order appealed from is reversed.

OLSON v. WHITTHORNE & SWAN.
(S. F. 12145.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1928.

1. Negligence ⇨121(2)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine is inapplicable unless instrumentality was under defendant's control and nature of injury points to negligence as probable cause.

Res ipsa loquitur doctrine is not applicable unless the instrumentality causing the injury was under defendant's control and the injury was of such a nature that it probably would not have occurred but for defendant's negligence.

2. Negligence ⇨121(2)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine is inapplicable to unexplained accident which might have been due to causes for which defendant was not responsible.

Res ipsa loquitur doctrine does not apply where an unexplained accident might have been caused by plaintiff's negligence or have been due to one of several causes, for some of which the defendant was not responsible.

3. Negligence ⇨121(3)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held inapplicable where store patron was struck by one swinging door while holding other open for another.

Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held inapplicable where plaintiff was struck by the rebound of one swinging door of defendant's store while she was holding the other open for a lady following immediately behind her.

4. Negligence ⇨67—Patrons of stores having swinging doors are chargeable with exercise of ordinary care.

Customers and patrons of stores having swinging doors are chargeable with the exercise of ordinary care in their use.

5. Negligence ⇨66(2)—Plaintiff struck by one swinging door of store while holding other open for another held contributorily negligent.

Where plaintiff was struck by the rebound of one swinging door of defendant's store while holding the other open for a lady who was following immediately after her, trial court held justified in concluding that, on any theory of defendant's responsibility, plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

6. Negligence ⇨80—Where plaintiff struck by swinging door of store was contributorily negligent, she could not recover, regardless of defendant's negligence.

Where plaintiff struck by swinging door of defendant's store was contributorily negligent, she could not recover whether or not defendant was also negligent, and regardless of whether res ipsa loquitur doctrine was applicable.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Mary J. Olson against Whitthorne & Swan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Tolan and Ben F. Woolner, both of Oakland, for appellant.

Snook & Brown and Thomas J. Ledwich, all of Oakland, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action for damages for personal injuries. The defendant conducts a retail dry goods store in a building bounded by Washington, Tenth, and Eleventh streets, in the city of Oakland. On the Tenth street side of the store there are two swinging doors, used for the purposes of entrance and exit by the patrons of the store. These doors are about 7 feet back from the property or building line, and leading thereto from the sidewalk is a cement passageway. On each side of this passageway are show windows. Each of the swinging doors is 2 inches thick, 3 feet wide, and 7 feet high. They are made of wood with an oak veneer, have heavy plate glass panels and weigh from 120 to 130 pounds each. They are admittedly of standard construction and are equipped with Rixon spring checking devices. Each door swings out and in for the accommodation of customers, and may be swung open to a position of 90 degrees or at right angles to the threshold line.

On Saturday, the 13th day of June, 1925, the plaintiff had made some purchases at the store and was proceeding to pass out of the Tenth street entrance through the right-hand door. Instead of continuing to pass through and beyond this door she paused to hold the door open for a lady following immediately behind her. In doing so the plaintiff stepped into the swing area of the left-hand door, through which a third lady was hastily proceeding. The rebound of the left-hand door struck plaintiff, and she thereby received the injuries complained of.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff consisted of her own testimony and that of a city building inspector. The plaintiff testified that she had used these swinging doors on many occasions and was familiar with their operation. The building inspector testified as to certain experiments made by him a few days before the commencement of the trial. From these experiments he stated that the doors, when opened, had a tendency to come back on their own rebound and "break" from 4 to 6 inches from the center line. That is to say, the opened doors swung back across the center line from 4 to 6 inches and then stopped "dead still." He further testified that the rebound was the same when the doors were pushed back to the full 90 degrees. It seems to be the theory of the plaintiff that the spring was not adjusted at the proper tension on the day of the accident. It was stipulated that the doors at the time of the accident were generally in the same condition as at the time of the experiments nearly a year later, but there was no evidence as to the tension of the adjustable door springs and their rebound on the day in question. There was no proof of negligence on the part of the defendant in the installation, maintenance, operation, or supervision of the doors, nor of any defect in anything connected therewith at the time of the accident.

[1-4] The plaintiff contended in the trial court, and now contends, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur should apply to the situation presented on her behalf. We think this is a case to which the doctrine is not applicable. To render the doctrine applicable "it must be shown that the instrumentality causing the injury was under the control of the defendant, and that the injury was caused by some act incident to that control," and the injury "must be of such a nature that it ordinarily would not have occurred but for the defendant's negligence." 19 Cal. Jur. 708, 710. It does not apply "where an unexplained accident might have been caused by plaintiff's negligence, or been due to one of several causes, for some of which the defendant is not responsible." 19 Cal. Jur. 710, 711. Swinging doors in buildings and stores are installed and maintained for the accommodation of those who have occasion to enter such buildings. The operation of such doors is not within the exclusive control of the owner of the building or proprietor of the store. Customers and patrons take a very distinct part in their operation and are chargeable with the exercise of ordinary care in their use. Injury may occur in their operation from a lack of such care on the part of the persons who use them, and for whose negligence the owner or proprietor would be in no wise responsible. In the present case the injury to the plaintiff may have been caused by the negligent operation of the left-hand door shown by the evidence to have been hurriedly used by the third lady when it rebounded and struck the plaintiff (Smith v. Johnson, 219 Mass. 142, 106 N. E. 604, L. R. A. 1915F, 572, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1234; Pardington v. Abraham, 93 App. Div. 359, 87 N. Y. S. 670, affirmed in 183 N. Y. 553, 76 N. E. 1102), or it may have been caused by the plaintiff's own negligent use of the right-hand door.

[5, 6] The trial court on the motion for a nonsuit ruled against the contention of plaintiff that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied, and further held not only that no negligence was proved as against the defendant, but that if such negligence might be inferred from any of the evidence the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. We think the court was justified in concluding that on any theory of defendant's responsibility in the matter the plaintiff was so guilty of contributory negligence. She testified that she was familiar with the operation of these particular swinging doors, had used them many times prior to the accident, and knew of their rebound. Notwithstanding this familiarity and knowledge, she placed herself in a position of danger for reasons which were entirely personal to herself. Assuming, however, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur might justify an inference of negligence on the part of the defendant, and assuming further that the plaintiff had affirmatively proved negligence on the part of the defendant, still, if the plaintiff be, as here, properly found guilty of contributory negligence, such contributory negligence would defeat a recovery. The evidence fails to disclose the breach of any legal duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff.

We therefore find no error in the order granting the motion for a nonsuit. The judgment is affirmed.

2. Brokers $\S$ 42—That corporation has authorized director to sell realty does not make director immune from act requiring broker's license (St. 1919, p. 1252).

The fact that a corporation has authorized one of its directors to sell real estate of the corporation does not make such director immune from the provisions of St. 1919, p. 1252, requiring real estate brokers to have licenses.

3. Brokers $\S$ 42—Director is not "owner" of corporation's realty within purview of brokers' licensing act so as to be exempt from necessity of procuring license to sell real estate (St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, $\S$ 2, 20).

The director of a corporation is not an owner of the corporation's real estate within the meaning of St. 1919, pp. 1252, 1259, $\S$ 2, 20, so as to preclude the necessity for his obtaining a broker's license in order to be permitted to sell the corporation's real estate on commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Richard Phelan against Hilda Gravel Mining Company, to recover commissions for securing a purchaser for a mine property. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Witter, of Oakland, for appellant.
Frederic Appelman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. The defendant was, during the year 1924, a mining corporation organized under the laws of this state, with its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, for the purpose of extracting gold from gold-bearing gravel. The mine is situate in the county of Sierra. Appellant, with others, had long been an owner of stock and a director of said corporation, which apparently had not proved remunerative to its stockholders. Its sale seems to have been under serious consideration by the stockholders and officers, and plaintiff, who was a strong advocate of disposing of said mine, and who also was well acquainted with the past operation thereof, submitted to the board of directors, of which he was a member, on August 2, 1924, a proposed plan or proposition of sale. His suggestion was that the corporation "bond the property for $94,655, being $1 a share for all the outstanding stock"; require a cash payment for the value of all movable equipment on the property; demand a payment of $1,000 at the end of six months from date of contract; demand the sum of $2,500 every six months thereafter, together with 25 per cent. of the gross output of the mine until the sum of $94,655 was paid. It was further suggested that a commission of 12½ per cent. be allowed to any one who should make a sale on the terms above outlined. In his communication he expressed the hope of making a sale on the terms above set forth, if provided with a sketch showing the latest developments and improvements and the results of the operation of the mine and if privileged to send prospective purchasers to see the gold that had been extracted from the mine.

The communication was read at a regular meeting of the board of directors at which all members were present, except Director Richard Phelan. A motion was made and unanimously carried by which the secretary was "authorized to advise Mr. Phelan in writing of the acceptance of his suggestion." Two days thereafter, to wit, August 4, 1924, the secretary of said corporation wrote to Mr. Phelan as follows:

"As secretary, I am instructed to advise that, with the exception of the 12½ per cent. commission figure, your suggestion was approved and the bonding terms as set forth are acceptable should you or anyone else be able to secure someone who would agree to those terms. As to the commission, it is decided that the amount of 10 per cent. would be paid any one consummating a sale on that basis."

Plaintiff immediately began negotiations for the sale of said mine with C. E. Shillingford, who testified that he was, or had been, a real estate agent and broker, and about a year preceding the transaction under consideration had turned his attention to the sale and development of mining properties. His testimony showed that he had not the financial ability to finance the purchase, but that he was dependent upon negotiations with others for financial aid. In a letter written to Shillingford, September 1, 1924, Mr. Phelan said:

"The price of the mine is $95,000, payable as follows: $1,000 after inspection, if accepted; $1,000 six months thereafter, and $1,000 twelve months after signing papers; then $2,500 every six months thereafter, together with 25 per cent. of the gross output from the mine, the same to apply on the purchase price of $95,000 until the full sum is paid."

On the following day Shillingford, according to his testimony, affixed to the Phelan letter the following reply:

"I accept the terms as above mentioned and am ready to deposit $1,000 in any bank you desire, the money to be turned over to you when your company delivers to said bank an agreement conforming to the terms mentioned herein properly signed and executed by the president and secretary of your company."

Shillingford testified that he had had some prior conversations with Mrs. Clara F. Pixley touching the proposition of the bonding of said mine. Mrs. Pixley, upon whom Shillingford relied, was not shown to the satisfaction of the court to have been financially able to comply with the terms of the proposed contract of sale. Shillingford seemed to know but little as to her business calling, although he testified that she was his partner, or was to become a partner with him in the operation of the mine. The agreement between Shillingford and Mrs. Pixley, as told by him, was that Mrs. Pixley was to put up the first $2,500 payment, and she was to own a one-fourth interest in the mine, and Shillingford was to retain a one-fourth interest for himself, and the one-half remaining interest was to be the fulcrum with which the money necessary to "finance the property" was to be raised. He was also to become the superintendent of the mine. He made no effort to show that he had the financial ability to meet the payments as provided by the contract, but relied upon Mrs. Pixley to whom he wrote a letter on September 2d, in which he repeated the terms set forth in the Phelan letter to Shillingford. In his letter he requested Mrs. Pixley to send him her check for $1,000 and to place $1,500 in a bank subject to his order. He further wrote that he would place the check with Mr. Phelan, and requested her to accompany him to the mine at her earliest convenience so the deal might be closed, as the gravel had recently showed stronger in gold than it had ever showed before. On September 4th Mrs. Pixley replied:

"Your letter of September 2d received. I was glad to hear that you had been able to get a proposition from Mr. Phelan. I am inclosing my check for a thousand dollars, and I will arrange to give you the other $1,500 as you need it. I will try to have my affairs in shape so that we can go up and look at the property next Sunday."

Mrs. Pixley inclosed with said letter a check drawn on the Mercantile Trust Company of California, dated September 4th, and payable to the order of C. E. Shillingford in the sum of $1,000. The directors in the meantime had decided that $95,000, in view of recent reports to the effect that the gravel was yielding a much heavier output of gold, was too low a price for the mine. On the 4th day of September Phelan resigned as a director. On September 5th the board met and offered to make a contract with Phelan for a commission on the basis of a $150,000 sale of the mine. The right of a director of the corporation to collect a commission on the sale of the corporation property had for some time past been a matter of doubt in the minds of all the directors, including Phelan. His resignation removed what was believed to be a legal obstacle to his right to collect a commission. The offer to enter into a new contract with Phelan was refused, and in a spirit of disappointment and disgust he said that he wanted to get out of the corporation, and offered his stock for sale, which was immediately purchased by one of the directors. The check of Mrs. Pixley had been given to him, but neither he nor Shillingford had ever offered it to the board of directors. Some time after this transaction the instant action was commenced. Mrs. Pixley was asked if she had sufficient money on deposit to meet the $1,000 check, and replied that she did not know, but she could have had it in 20 minutes. She finally admitted that she did not have that sum in a checking account, but said that she had it in the bank. No officer of the bank on which the check was drawn was produced to show the financial ability of Mrs. Pixley to meet the checks or to comply with the terms of the contract. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show that Shillingford was able by himself or through financial connections to perform his part of the contract. Counsel argues that all that was required of Phelan in order to earn said commission, provided he was not disqualified by virtue of his office as director or the fact that he was not a licensed real estate broker, was to obtain some one who would agree to the terms of the contract, irrespective of said person's ability to perform the same.

[1-3] Such a contention is wholly fallacious, and requires no argument to combat it. To earn a commission on the sale of real estate, the agent is required in all cases to produce a purchaser who is able to perform. The court found that the plaintiff failed to introduce said C. E. Shillingford or any other prospective purchaser to defendant corporation or to any of its officers, and, further, that the plaintiff was not, and never had been, a licensed real estate broker or salesman, as provided by the act defining real estate brokers and salesmen and providing for the licensing of the same. Stats. 1919, p. 1252. The court's conclusion from the facts found was that the plaintiff failed to secure a bona fide purchaser for the real property of defendant. We are of the opinion that Phelan was not qualified under the said act regulating real estate agents and brokers to demand a commission as the agent of the corporation. That he may have been clothed with authority to contract for the sale of the corporation's property as its representative or attorney in fact may be conceded, but a delegation of that authority would not immune him from the provisions of an act which was designed to operate uniformly upon all persons who engage themselves to act as real estate agents or salesmen for compensation. He was not the owner of the corporation real property by virtue of his office as a director. Neither his office nor his contract converted him into an owner of the corporation's real property within the meaning and intent of the clause of section 2 of said act, which exempts the owner of real property from a compliance with the provisions of said act in cases of sales made by him. A director, who as an individual contracts for the payment of commissions on the sale of the corporation's real property, would not be relieved of any burden that the law imposes upon all persons who engage in a similar service. Appellant was at no time a licensed real estate broker. He cannot therefore maintain the action. Stats. 1919, p. 1252, § 20.

Another objection raised by respondent in resisting the payment of appellant's demands is that a director of a corporation is the representative of all the stockholders, and the interests of the stockholders forbid that he should place himself in a position where his personal interests would conflict with the duty he owes to those whom he officially represents. This case puts to a test the soundness of a policy which would permit a director of a corporation to enter into a contract whereby his personal interests, greatly outweighing his interests as a stockholder, would likely influence his action to the detriment of the other stockholders. In the instant case, the directors of the corporation came to the view that $95,000 was far below the figure that could and should be obtained for its property. The interest of Phelan was greater as a real estate broker than it would have been as a stockholder. He was a member of the board of directors, and the wisdom of selling the corporation property at the price of $95,000 was one that should have received the unbiased consideration of a full board of directors.

From what we have said, it is unnecessary to consider whether or not the acts and statements of Mr. Phelan at the meeting of the board of directors, held September 5th, amounted to an abandonment of the said contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SHANNON. (Cr. 3026.)★

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 13, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 9, 1928.

1. Homicide ⚡253(1)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for first degree murder.

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for murder in the first degree.

2. Homicide ⚡332(2)—Conviction for murder held conclusive, where supported by evidence.

Conviction for murder in the first degree held conclusive, where there was ample evidence to support it.

3. Criminal law ⚡1035(5)—Where defendant did not challenge jury panel in trial court, he could not raise objection to it on appeal (Pen. Code, § 1060).

Under Pen. Code, § 1060, where defendant in prosecution for murder did not interpose any challenge to jury panel before jury was sworn in trial court, he could not raise an objection to it on appeal.

4. Criminal law ⚡1128(4)—On appeal from murder conviction where defendant claimed error because no women were included in jury panel, unauthenticated affidavit held insufficient to properly present question.

On appeal from conviction for first degree murder where defendant claimed error because no women were included in jury panel, unauthenticated affidavit of county board of supervisors that women were not included in panel for year in which defendant was tried held insufficient to present question for review.

5. Jury ⚡79(3)—Defendant on trial for murder had no constitutional right to have women on jury.

Defendant in prosecution for murder held not to have a constitutional right to trial by jury composed of both men and women.

6. Criminal law ⚡409—Statements of defendant not amounting to confession, although damaging, held admissible, without preliminary proof showing absence of inducements or coercion.

On prosecution for murder, proof of statements of defendant made to sheriff and district attorney not amounting to a confession, although they were of an incriminatory nature, held admissible, without the necessity of preliminary proof showing the absence of promises, inducements, or coercion.

7. Homicide ⚡309(3)—On murder trial, evidence held insufficient to present manslaughter issue, and refusal of instructions submitting that issue was therefore proper.

On prosecution for murder, evidence held to show that defendant was either guilty of murder or not at all, and hence refusal to give instructions defining manslaughter and submitting form of verdict finding defendant guilty of manslaughter was proper.

8. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 822(4)—Instruction on murder trial admonishing jurors as to duty "in trying issues of fact" held proper, construed as a whole.

On prosecution for murder, instruction admonishing jurors as to their duty "in trying the issues of fact that [were] presented by the allegations of the information and the defendant's plea thereto" held proper, when construed as a whole.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Willard C. Shannon was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Pierovich, of Jackson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, C. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and the death penalty was imposed upon him. He has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The evidence amply supports the judgment of conviction. The defendant, Shannon, who had already served two terms in the state prisons for forgery and for passing a fictitious check, assumed the name Walter C. Leslye and, claiming to be the manager of a mine in Alpine county, pretended to be desirous of purchasing an automobile for the purpose of carrying the mine pay roll from the bank, and to use generally. By means of these and other false pretenses, he induced Harold W. Lage, an automobile salesman connected with a Stockton house, to accompany him in a Lincoln automobile to the location of the supposed mine. On that trip, on December 31, 1926, the defendant shot and killed Lage. Assuming the name of the dead man, he registered at the hotel, used Lage's business cards and personal effects, and wrote and passed a number of checks under the name of Lage. He then traveled various roads up and down the state of California, seeking to avoid arrest, during which journey he sent telegrams, using Lage's name, to the latter's wife and to his employer. He was finally apprehended in Salt Lake City about a month after the murder.

It is the contention of the appellant that the prosecution introduced no evidence to show that he was present at the time of the killing of Lage. He has not correctly stated the record. After the defendant's arrest and before trial, and again when on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, the defendant admitted being at the place where Lage was killed. He attempted in each instance to place the actual killing of the salesman on two "pals," whose names he refused to divulge, and who, he claimed, were planning with him to rob the Bank of Amador. In another statement, made to the sheriff and district attorney of the county, the defendant claimed that Lage denounced him and his friends as "a bunch of crooks," and, drawing a pistol, threatened them with arrest; that, in the struggle between Lage and himself for the possession of the pistol, it was discharged twice, shooting Lage through the head and through the neck, whereupon he and his "pals" hid the dead body. They then "beat it." He repudiated this story later when on the witness stand, with the exclamation that he lied when making the statement, and did not expect any one to believe it. The jury rejected defendant's version of the killing, and accepted the evidence supporting the prosecution's theory of the crime. Its estimate of the evidence was approved by the trial court when it denied the motion for a new trial. There being ample evidence to support it, we cannot disturb the finding of the court and jury. People v. Erno, 195 Cal. 272, 283, 232 P. 710.

[3-5] The appellant's first contention is one which we would pass without notice, were it not raised in a case in which the extreme penalty has been imposed. He claims that a constitutional right to "a trial by a jury of men and women" was violated through the action of the board of supervisors of Amador county in failing to include the names of any women in the list of trial jurors selected for the year 1927. He filed in this court, long after his appeal was taken, an affidavit of a member of the board of supervisors of Amador county, from which it appears that, because the courthouse of that county was improperly equipped to serve the wants of jurors of both sexes, the supervisors deemed it unwise and inexpedient at that time to impose jury duty on women. For that reason they were not included in the panel for 1927. For two reasons the point is not properly before us for consideration. It appears that the defendant did not interpose any challenge to the panel before the jury was sworn in the trial court, and it is, therefore, too late to present the objection here. Pen. Code, § 1060; People v. Oliveria, 127 Cal. 376, 380, 59 P. 772. The unauthenticated affidavit presented in this court for the first time does not serve to properly bring the matter to our attention. Assuming, however, that the point is properly before us, there is nothing in the state or Federal Constitutions, or in any statute, which guarantees one accused of a crime a trial by a jury composed of men and women, or of only men, or of only women, or of any definite proportion of either sex. His right is to a fair and impartial jury, and not to a jury composed of any particular individuals. People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 199, 48 P. 75. He cannot complain if he is tried by an impartial jury, and can demand nothing more. Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S. 172, 175, 20 S. Ct. 77, 44 L. Ed. 119.

Appellant has asserted in his brief that the people of Amador county were "highly incensed over the tragedy" that had taken place in their community, and that such "adverse attitude" on the part of the public was shared by members of the jury, and deprived the defendant of a fair trial. No motion for a change of place of trial appears to have been made by the defendant, and the record of the proceedings on impanelment of the jury has not been brought here. We find nothing in the record of the trial of the case which in any way warrants the assertion of the appellant that he was not given a fair and impartial trial by the jury selected to try him.

[6] It is next contended by the appellant that the court committed prejudicial error during the trial of the case by admitting certain statements and confessions purported to have been made to the sheriff and the district attorney by the defendant, the objection being that they were not freely and voluntarily made. The trial court permitted a full and fair examination into the matter before admitting the evidence, from which it appears that sufficient preliminary proof of the voluntary nature of the statements was made. However, had there been any doubt as to that matter, the conversations were properly admitted. While there was much of an incriminatory nature in the statements the defendant made to the officers, in none of the conversations, during which it is claimed the alleged confessions were made, did the defendant admit he was guilty of the murder of the deceased. A statement or an admission which amounts to less than a confession is admissible without the necessity of showing the absence of promises, inducements, or coercion. People v. Le Roy, 65 Cal. 613, 4 P. 649. The defendant, it is true, admitted facts which, while they themselves did not amount to a confession, did, when connected with other facts, tend to prove his guilt. Proof of such admissions is competent without preliminary proof. People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 32, 50 P. 15.

[7] It is urged that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by the defendant defining manslaughter, and in refusing to submit to the jury a form of verdict finding the defendant guilty of the crime of manslaughter. It is the contention of the appellant that the testimony of the sheriff, that in one of the conversations he had with Shannon after his arrest the defendant stated that the shooting of Lage occurred during the struggle for possession of the pistol, was sufficient, if believed, to warrant the jury in returning a verdict of manslaughter. Assuming that the jury did believe that the defendant told the truth in that conversation, he carefully avoided any statement in it from which it would appear that he had the pistol in his possession when it was discharged, or that any act of his actually caused the shooting. Furthermore, when on the stand, he repudiated the story of the alleged accidental shooting. The record discloses no possible theory upon which to rest an argument that the defendant was guilty of manslaughter. Under the evidence, he was guilty of murder, or not at all. The instruction was therefore properly refused. People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 P. 183; People v. Chaves, 122 Cal. 134, 140, 54 P. 596.

[8] Appellant complains of the giving of an instruction in which the trial court admonished the jurors as to their duty "in trying the issues of fact that [were] presented by the allegations of the information filed by the district attorney and the defendant's plea thereto." The giving of the identical instruction as a whole was approved in People v. Wolff, 182 Cal. 728, 739, 190 P. 22.

The judgment of conviction and the order denying the motion for a new trial are and each is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; El. N. Rector, Judge.

Lonnie Johnson was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. McCray and H. K. Landram, both of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SEAWELL, J. [1] Lonnie Johnson was tried and convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, which crime was, by the information filed against him, alleged to have been committed in the county of Merced, this state, on or about March 18, 1927, by unlawfully killing with malice aforethought one May Evelyn Harris, also known as Dolly Johnson. The verdict of the jury, being one of murder in the first degree, without an assessment of the punishment at life imprisonment, carried with it the imposition of the death penalty. The court accordingly rendered judgment upon the verdict and imposed upon the defendant the extreme penalty of the law. A motion for a new trial was made in due time, based upon errors alleged to have been committed by the court at and during the trial in rulings upon the admissibility of certain evidence offered in the case and in giving and refusing to give certain requested instructions, and also upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment. The motion for a new trial being by the court denied, the defendant has appealed to this court from the order denying said motion and from the judgment of conviction.

Appellant presses with much earnestness two alleged errors made by the trial court. The first consists in the giving of an instruction as to the defense of alibi which was phrased in substantially the same language as it has been given by the trial courts of this state for many years past, but the giving of which has been advised against by the more recent decisions of this state. People v. Arnold and Sayer, 199 Cal. 471, 250 P. 168. The second alleged error committed by the court consisted in permitting, over the objection of the defendant's counsel, on the ground that a showing of qualification was not first made, an undertaker and embalmer of human bodies, who was also the deputy coroner of the county of Merced, to express an opinion as to the probable number of hours life had been extinct in the body of May Evelyn Harris, or Dolly Johnson, as she was also known, at the time the body was delivered into his care.

The evidence offered to establish the criminal responsibility of the defendant is without conflict as to many of the main facts. The defendant and Dolly Johnson, as she was commonly known, were colored people and had for some time prior to the homicide been residing together as husband and wife in the colored folk district of the city of Merced. They resided in a small two-room house which had a screened porch annex. The location of the house is described as being between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets. The screened porch abuts on an alleyway, and the front room sits back a few feet from the street. The defendant was the owner of a Ford machine and it was his habit to park it in front of his house or cabin during the night when it was not in use. On the afternoon of Friday, March 18, 1927, the defendant and his wife took Joe Wimberley and his wife, Ida May, colored acquaintances, as guests, on an automobile ride. The party arrived at the Wimberley home some time before 4 o'clock p. m. Defendant and his wife remained at the Wimberley home until 4:30 or 5 o'clock p. m., at which hour they left, ostensibly destined for their home. Their relations appeared to be friendly and cordial. This was the last time the deceased was seen alive by the Wimberleys. A short time after their departure, about 6 o'clock p. m., the defendant, Lonnie Johnson, and one Eddie Robinson, colored, visited the Wimberley home for but a few minutes and departed. They did not see Joe Wimberley, who was in a room of the house, but spoke a few unimportant words to his wife and departed. At a time fixed by the Wimberleys as about 9 o'clock p. m., the defendant went to the Wimberley home, knocked on the door, but not being admitted, inquired from without for Joe Wimberley. Joe Wimberley had retired for the evening, but his wife called to the defendant that her husband had gone out. The defendant then asked if his wife was at the Wimberley home and was informed by Mrs. Wimberley that she had not seen his wife since she left with him earlier in the evening. Upon being informed that his wife was not in the Wimberley home, the defendant replied that he thought it was a "damn lie." His voice indicated anger. The evidence shows that defendant, Johnson, and Charley Griswold, also colored, were at the home of Eddie Robinson, situate within the district in which the domiciles of all the persons heretofore mentioned are located, and that Griswold and Johnson had a slight disagreement as to some matter, whereupon Griswold left. He testified that he saw a revolver protruding from Johnson's right front trouser pocket. Johnson, until apprehended at Tonopah some three weeks thereafter, was last seen by any of his acquaintances, so far as they have spoken, at the hour of 7:30 o'clock p. m., March 18, 1927, when he left the Robinson home.

William Dunlap, who resided within 40 feet of the cabin occupied by Johnson and his wife, was attracted by sounds which he described as a "mumbling noise" issuing from the Johnson cabin at 8 o'clock Friday night, March 18, as he was about to enter his home. Before he entered he heard a shot that sounded in the direction of the Johnson cabin. He went to the rear of his house and looked over in the direction of the Johnson home and observed a faint light in the alley in close proximity to the cabin. He made no further investigation and retired. Between the hours of 1 and 3 o'clock the following morning he was awakened by some one, as he explained it, "in the place where Johnson lived," trying to start a car. After about 20 minutes of trial the car was set in motion and it went up the alley. On the following morning Wimberley, being on his way for a newspaper, stopped at the Johnson home to greet them. He and his wife were to be the guests of Johnson and his wife at dinner on that day. The automobile was not in its accustomed place, and he was unable to arouse any one within. Neither Johnson nor his wife could be located. On that afternoon, at 1:35, the city marshal of Livingston, upon information which he received, discovered the dead body of Dolly Johnson, fully attired, bearing a fatal bullet wound, under the bridge at Livingston where said bridge spans the Merced river. The body had evidently been conveyed by automobile to the approach of said bridge and dragged therefrom to a place under said bridge, where it was left uncovered, a distance of 15 miles from the home of the Johnsons. The impression made upon the sandy soil by which the body was traced began at the edge of the highway and continued to the place where it was discovered early in the afternoon of Saturday, March 19. The officers of the law at once began a state-wide search for Johnson and for his automobile. He had not intimated to any of his acquaintances the possibility of a sudden departure. He was finally located at Tonopah. The Johnson cabin was inspected immediately after the body was identified. The sleeping room in which Dolly Johnson was doubtless killed showed evidence of a struggle between her and her assailant. It contained but a few articles of furniture. The cot was somewhat disarranged, the stove was displaced, if not overturned, and a piece or two of crockery was broken. A pool of blood of considerable extent occupied a place near the cot and others spots or patches of human blood were traceable from the main pool of blood in the bedroom through the front room, down the steps leading outdoors and upon the ground to the place where Johnson habitually parked his car. Blood-stained shoe prints were observable upon the floor. Dirt had been thrown over the main pool of blood by the person who committed the crime.

Johnson when last seen on the afternoon and evening of March 18th wore khaki trousers with puttees or leathern leggings, tan shoes of the Nettleton brand, a shirt of a blue cast, and a cap. He also owned a vest which was found with his effects at the time of his arrest. The chemist and biologist who made an examination of the articles of wearing apparel above described testified that upon each, as well as upon his shoe laces, he discovered spots or stains made by blood that was biologically human. The vest identified as belonging to Johnson contained a number of spots which reacted positively to the biological tests. The trousers and puttees also contained a number of blood spots, as did the soles of the defendant's shoes. Blood was found to have entered the crease or crevice made by the fastening of the sole of the shoe to the upper portion and these particles of blood, which had become dry, were well preserved. The shirt worn by the defendant on the night of March 18th had been washed and while it showed some faint evidence of blood stains, the expert was not willing to testify absolutely that the discolorations upon that garment were made by human blood. All of the above-described garments were inclosed in a handbag taken from the defendant's possession. He told the officer that he left his gun at Merced, and that his wife packed the handbag, and that there were things in it he knew nothing about.

The bullet that killed Dolly Johnson entered her chest near the median line, ranged slightly downward and to the left, pierced both auricles of the heart, and made its exit at a point near the spinal column. The autopsy physician testified that death occurred practically instantaneously with the infliction of the wound. Upon an examination of the premises a bullet hole about $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 feet above the floor was observed in the wooden partition that separated the bedroom from the screened porch. The bullet which made said hole evidently spent its force and was found in the sink where it had apparently dropped. This unquestionably was the bullet that had also passed through the body of Dolly Johnson. In measurement it appeared to correspond in size to what is known as a 32-caliber. The defendant, Johnson, owned such a revolver before the homicide and took it with him to Reno, where he pawned it at a pawnshop. The officer recovered it, and it was received in evidence at the trial. It was 32 in caliber and resembled in general appearance the revolver which he had exhibited to Joe Wimberley, who had been his hunting companion on one or two occasions before the homicide. The bullet was evidently copper-jacketed. A fragment of the copper jacket covering dropped from Dolly Johnson's clothing at the time they were taken from her body. Defendant was also the owner of a rifle.

[2] Defendant offered in evidence a stipulation entered into by him and the district attorney whereby it was stipulated that J. A. Dieves, conductor of passenger train No. 87 of the Southern Pacific Company, who was confined to the hospital by reason of injuries at the time of trial, if called as a witness would testify that on the morning of March 19, 1927, he was in charge of said train No. 87, which ran from Merced to Oakland; that said train was about 1 hour and 25 minutes late on said morning, it being due to leave Merced at 1:55 o'clock a. m., but it did not leave on this particular day until 3:23 o'clock a. m.; that because of delayed departure the circumstance is remembered; that a colored man got on said train at Merced and went into the smoker; that said J. A. Dieves would identify the defendant as the colored man that got on said train at 3:23 a. m., March 19th; that he wore a dark blue or black cap; that he left the train at Lathrop. The conductor's statement does not harmonize with the statements made by the defendant as to the time he left Merced, nor as to his point of destination, nor with the records as to the tickets sold at the Merced office. The brakeman, who was in the smoking car the greater portion of the way from Merced to Lathrop, testified that he had no recollection of seeing a colored man board the train at Merced, nor seeing him in the smoking car at any time on the run in question. Conceding, against the great weight of the evidence to the contrary, that the conductor was right as to the defendant having boarded his train at 3:23 a. m., the defendant would have had something like $7\frac{1}{2}$ hours in which to drive to the Livingston bridge, a distance of 15 miles from the house in which Dolly Johnson was doubtless killed, and return to Merced. This circumstance would not even tend to establish an alibi. At the preliminary hearing the defendant testified that he left Merced on train No. 87 at 2 o'clock Saturday morning. The only train he could have boarded after midnight was No. 87, which was 1 hour and 28 minutes late. The defendant seemed to have lost sight of the delayed departure of said train if he even knew the regular hour of departure. He claimed that he arrived at the Merced station but a few minutes before the time of departure. Further, he testified that he went straight through to Sacramento without changing cars. As a matter of fact, no train left Merced for Sacramento at the hour or anywhere near the hour defendant claims to have taken a train for Sacramento.

At Tonopah he replied to a statement made to him by the deputy sheriff of Merced county that he had seen him (Johnson) at Merced, that he had never been in Merced. Later he admitted his identity. In the early portion of his conversation with the deputy sheriff he said that he left Merced at 10 o'clock or 11 o'clock Friday night, March 18, for Oakland. Upon being told that no train departed for Oakland at either of those hours, but a train was scheduled to leave regularly at 2 o'clock a. m., he adopted 2 o'clock as his hour of departure. He further stated that he went from Oakland to Reno and thence to Tonopah. The only tickets sold at the Merced station to be used on train No. 87 was one to Oakland, one to San Francisco and return, and one to Santa Barbara and return. No Sacramento ticket was sold. The jury very likely believed that the defendant did not leave Merced by train, but in the Ford that has not since been located, but if, as a matter of fact, he did leave by train he could not have left before 3:23 o'clock Saturday morning, March 19th, and that method of flight did not weaken in the slightest degree the case made against him. What the thought of the defendant was or what his mission or purpose may have been at the time he returned to the home of his friend Wimberley at the hour of 9 o'clock and made inquiries as to his whereabouts and was informed that he was not at home, and what prompted his inquiry later as to whether his wife was within, have not been explained. This was 1 hour after a near neighbor testified to hearing a strange noise at the Johnson home which was followed by the sound of a shot, as testified to by witness William Dunlap.

At Reno and Tonopah the defendant represented himself as Jackson, and in accounting for his immediate need of funds he made several statements. He told one of his newly made acquaintances that he had a car in Salt Lake City out of which he had torn the rear end and that he was short of money for the reason that he and his wife had separated and she had gone back East to purchase a rooming house. To a former acquaintance whom he chanced to meet at Reno he stated that he had had "a lot of hard luck"; that he lost his wife back East and buried her, and his car broke down on the way back, and he had put it in a shop. He said he was recently from Salt Lake.

We have substantially covered the evidence upon which the jury returned its verdict against the defendant. There is some testimony in the case tending to show an attempt made by the defendant to wrest himself from the officers' custody while being taken from the preliminary hearing to the jail. The defendant did not take the witness chair in his own behalf. Neither did he offer any evidence of a substantial character. The questions presented to us for consideration are questions of law.

[3] Applying the long approved legal test and which is crystallized into an instruction that was given in the instant case, and which is given in practically every case in which the element of circumstantial evidence constitutes a part, if not the whole, of the case presented. can it be said, as a matter of law, that there is any reasonable hypothesis based upon the evidence upon which the defendant may be innocent of the offense charged, provided the circumstances relied upon for a conviction be true? On this subject the court instructed the jury that if there was any reasonable hypothesis upon which the defendant might be innocent, it was their duty to render a verdict of not guilty. "For," continued the instruction, "it is your duty not to look for some theory upon which you can convict the defendant, but, on the contrary, it is your duty, and the law requires you, if you can consistently do so, to reconcile any and all circumstances and the whole evidence of the case that have been shown, with the innocence of the defendant, and by doing so to acquit him." We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the jury's verdict does not respond to the requirements of the law with respect to the test that there is no rational hypothesis upon which defendant may be innocent and the facts and circumstances as proved be true.

[4] Thirty-nine instructions covering seventeen typewritten pages of the record were given at the request of the defendant, and they are certainly considerate of the defendant's rights. Said instructions constantly kept the rights of the defendant before the jury and emphasized by repetition and elaboration the rules of law that were most favorable to the defense. The instructions covered all possible phases of the homicide, and the jury was even instructed, at the request of the defendant, as to the right of a person to defend himself against persons who violently assail him, although there was no evidence adduced at the trial to show that defendant claimed or pretended to have acted in defense of his person. The instruction on the subject of alibi which was reviewed in People v. Arnold and Sayer, supra, was given in the instant case, notwithstanding the observation we made in the case last cited. We feel that it could not have been harmful for the reason that there is absolutely no evidence in the case tending to show that the defendant was not at the place of the homicide at the time the crime was committed. The undisputed evidence is that the defendant was at the Wimberley home, which is in close proximity to the Johnson home, 1 hour after the shot was heard by Dunlap. According to his own statement, he did not leave Merced earlier than 2 o'clock or 3:23 o'clock a. m., March 19th. He offered no evidence tending to establish an alibi, and there was none brought into the case to show that he was at a place other than the place where the crime was committed. The defense relied upon the theory that a case had not been proved against the defendant and not upon the defense of an alibi as it is distinctly known to the law. An instruction, however, was given upon the request of the defendant which informed the jury that in cases where a defendant relies upon the defense of alibi he is not required to prove it beyond a reasonable doubt nor by a preponderance of evidence, "but to such a degree of certainty as will, when the whole evidence is considered, create and leave in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused." We feel satisfied that the defendant's case was in no way prejudiced by the instruction of which he now complains. It is substantially the same instruction that was given in the Arnold Case and a long list of cases preceding it.

[5] Error is predicated upon testimony given by Dr. F. E. Twining as to caliber of the bullet found in the sink. The objections of the defendant to this line of testimony on the ground that the witness was not qualified to testify on the subject came after a number of questions as to the caliber of said bullet had been asked and answered without objection. The witness, at best, merely gave it as his opinion that the bullet was fired from a .32-20 cartridge. The bullet, however, was submitted to the inspection of the jury and whether it fitted the pistol of the defendant, which was also in evidence, was a matter which the jurors most likely determined for themselves. Besides, the witness showed some expert knowledge as to the weight and measurement of pistol bullets.

[6] Appellant makes further complaint that the court committed prejudicial error in permitting the deputy coroner of Merced county, who was an embalmer of human bodies of some eight years' experience, to give an opinion as to the length of time the body of Dolly Johnson had been lifeless at the time he examined it on the afternoon of the day following her disappearance. The witness testified that he had had war experience with dead bodies, and that he had embalmed at least 1,000 bodies. He testified that when he examined the body it was in a state of rigidity. His description of its condition indicates that it was in a marked stage of dissolution. In his opinion life became extinct 12 or 15 hours before he examined it. No error was committed by the ruling.

[7, 8] As to the argument that no malice on the part of the defendant, which is a necessary element or ingredient of murder of the first degree, was shown by the case presented and, therefore, the penalty fixed by the jury cannot stand, it is sufficient to say that the duty of affixing the penalty in murder cases of the first degree is, by section 190, Penal Code, committed to the sound discretion of the jury trying the case. Malice, as defined by section 188, Penal Code, may be express or implied. It is implied when no considerable provocation appears, or when the circumstances attending the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart. Again these are questions which it is the province of the jury to determine. The ruthless disposition of the body of the deceased, following the killing, certainly is some evidence as to an abandoned or malignant heart upon the part of the slayer. However this may be, section 1105, Penal Code, provides that:

"The commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

The defendant offered no proof to meet the burden which the law casts upon him, and, as there was no claim of justification or excuse offered for the killing of decedent or pretense that the proof tended to show that the crime committed only amounted to manslaughter, the crime was murder of the first degree.

[9] Appellant has raised the point that certain statements purporting to have been made by the defendant as to his conduct and movements since the homicide were not freely and voluntarily obtained. The evidence is to the contrary. It is only where a confession is offered in evidence that it devolves upon the prosecution to first show that the confession was freely and voluntarily made. This rule does not apply to statements, however harmful they may prove to be. People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 P. 15; People v. Shannon, Crim. 3026 (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 522.

[10, 11] The observations of the trial court made at the time he denied defendant's motion for a new trial and pronounced judgment are set out in the clerk's transcript in full. Appellant commends them to our attention. They are not properly a part of the record. While the trial court may have experienced some personal qualms in performing the unpleasant duty of denying the motion and pronouncing a judgment of death, we cannot here do what the trial court judicially refused to do. He judicially approved the verdict of the jury by denying defendant's motion for a new trial and pronounced the judgment which is before us for review. We find no reversible error in the record.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

BUTLER v. SOLANO LAND CO.
(S. F. 11932.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1928.

Brokers ⇨65(4)—Vendor's broker might not recover commission, where brokerage contract specified minimum, not absolute price, and broker received secret commission from purchaser.

Vendor's broker held not entitled to recover commission, where brokerage contract specified price as "not less than $30 per acre," and broker actively negotiated sale at $30 per acre and received secret commission from purchaser.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action to recover broker's commission on sale of real property by Harold W. Butler against the Solano Land Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

C. W. Durbrow, Frank B. Austin, and Albert Michelson, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the defendant's favor in an action brought by the plaintiff for the recovery of a commission claimed by plaintiff to be due him upon a contract of employment between himself and the defendant, by which he was employed in the capacity of a broker to procure a purchaser for certain real estate owned by the defendant, and for which he was to be paid a commission of 5 per cent. upon the purchase price. Plaintiff alleged that he procured such purchaser and had thereby earned the stipulated commission. The main defense which the defendant urged in its answer and upon the trial of the action was that the plaintiff, while assuming to act as the defendant's agent in the premises, had also, and without defendant's knowledge, agreed with the purchaser to receive, and that he did receive from him, a commission upon the sale of the premises in question. The trial court found in favor of the defendant upon its said plea and contention, and upon such finding rendered its judgment in the defendant's favor. The assault which the plaintiff and appellant makes upon said finding and upon the judgment based thereon is predicated upon the proposition that under the terms of the agreement between himself and the defendant he was invested with no discretion as to the amount of the purchase price which the purchaser found by him was to pay for said property, and that, this being so, he was exempted from the rule which he otherwise concedes to be correct and which would have forbidden him, without the knowledge of his employer, from receiving a commission from the other party to the transaction. The difficulty with the appellant's contention in this regard is that it sufficiently appears from the evidence in the case and from the findings of the trial court that the plaintiff's agreement contained the provision that he was to procure a purchaser for the defendant's property at a price "not less than $30.00 per acre," and that in procuring such purchaser the plaintiff actively engaged in the negotiation between the owner and such purchaser with a view to the transfer of the property to the latter at said minimum price, without revealing to his said employer the fact of his secret agreement with the purchaser for a double commission, and that as a result thereof the land was sold for such price. Such being the state of the evidence and the findings, it follows that the judgment of the trial court was, as a matter of law, correct in denying the plaintiff a right to recovery herein.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCATENA v. BANK OF ITALY et al.

(S. F. 11694.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Bills and notes ⇨496(1)—Assignee of note cannot maintain action thereon without proof of assignment.

In action on promissory note brought by assignee, plaintiff must prove assignment to him of right to sue thereon.

2. Pleading ⇨350(3)—Allegations of answer are deemed true on plaintiff's motion for judgment on pleadings.

On motion by plaintiff for judgment on pleadings, every allegation affirmatively set up in answer must be deemed true.

3. Pleading ⇨345(2)—In assignee's action on note, answer denying that plaintiff had any interest in note held sufficient as against general demurrer and to preclude judgment on pleadings.

In action on note brought by assignee, answer denying that plaintiff had any interest in note and denying that plaintiff had capacity to sue on such note held to set up good defense so as to be sufficient as against general demurrer and preclude judgment on pleadings.

4. Pleading ⇨122—In assignee's action on note, denial of plaintiff's interest in note may be made on information and belief.

In action on note brought by assignee, denial in answer of plaintiff's interest in note sued on may be made on information and belief.

5. Set-off and counterclaim $\S$ 44(1)—In assignee's action on several obligation of note, defendant cannot set up counterclaim in which others were interested, based on assignor's handling of money deposited to discharge note.

In action on several obligation of note, defendant may not set up as counterclaim demand or debt in which others than defendant are beneficially interested, such as claim that plaintiff's assignor to whom note was made had, contrary to instructions, permitted withdrawal of sum deposited with it which was to have been used only in discharge of note sued on.

6. Set-off and counterclaim $\S$ 24—Test whether set-off is proper is whether defendant could maintain independent action on demand (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 438).

Test as to whether set-off is proper is whether defendant could have maintained independent action on demand attempted to be set off, since if he could not maintain such action it cannot be said to constitute counterclaim existing in favor of defendant and against plaintiff between whom several judgment might be had in action, as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 438.

7. Pleading $\S$ 147—In assignee's action on note, defendant's allegations as to assignor's handling of money deposited to discharge note held not proper "cross-complaint," within statute (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 442).

In action by assignee on several obligation of note, defendant's allegations as to assignor's handling of money deposited to discharge such note held not to constitute proper cross-complaint, within Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 442, since action does not grow out of nor is it connected with action declared on in complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Cross-Complaint.]

8. Set-off and counterclaim $\S$ 34(1)—In assignee's action on note, defendant's allegations as to assignor's handling of money deposited to discharge note held insufficient as counterclaim, not growing out of transaction alleged in complaint (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 438, subds. 1, 2).

In action by assignee on several obligation of note, defendant's allegations as to assignor's handling of money deposited to discharge such note held insufficient as counterclaim, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 438, subds. 1, 2, prior to amendment of 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1620), since it does not grow out of transaction set forth in complaint, nor is it action on contract or for breach of contract.

9. Set-off and counterclaim $\S$ 59—Assignee of note cannot be subjected to personal judgment under counterclaim against assignor.

Assignee of promissory note cannot be subjected to personal judgment by way of counterclaim against assignor of note.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by Clarence P. Cuneo against W. H. Lawson and others, in which defendant S. Scatena filed a cross-complaint against the Bank of Italy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and for cross-defendant Bank of Italy, defendant and cross-complainant appeal. Reversed.

John L. McNab, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Ferrari, and J. J. Posner, both of San Francisco, for cross-defendant and respondent Bank of Italy.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer and Edwin V. McKenzie, all of San Francisco, for other cross-defendants and respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this cause judgment was had on the pleadings in favor of plaintiff and against defendant S. Scatena, which defendant has appealed. The complaint declares for the balance due from defendants upon a promissory note dated May 26, 1921, and due August 6, 1921, for the principal sum of $30,000, with interest at 7 per cent., payable to the Bank of Italy, together with appropriate allegations of assignment for a valuable consideration by the Bank of Italy of said note to the plaintiff.

The defendants Lawson and Perelli-Minetti demurred to said complaint, but the record shows no action upon the demurrer and no mention is made of these defendants in the further proceedings in the cause. The defendant S. Scatena answered said complaint, denying or attempting, at least, to deny only the assignment by the Bank of Italy to the plaintiff of said promissory note; also set up an alleged counterclaim and alleged cross-complaint, which said cross-complaint undertook to make the Bank of Italy a party cross-defendant in the action. Thereupon plaintiff filed a general demurrer to the cross-complaint and a general demurrer to the counterclaim set up in the answer, and the Bank of Italy filed a general demurrer to the cross-complaint, but plaintiff filed no demurrer of any kind to the answer proper. Later and on June 5, 1925, the court made a minute order sustaining the demurrers without leave to amend, and as a part of the same minute order directed that plaintiff's motion theretofore filed for judgment on the pleadings be granted. This action by the court was followed on the same day by a judgment which decreed that the "demurrers and each of them to said amended answer, counterclaim and cross-complaint be and the same are hereby sustained without leave to amend," and then provided for judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against said defendant Scatena on said promissory note for the sum of $6,223.59, plus $496.15 interest, and judgment in favor of the Bank of Italy as cross-defendant and against said defendant for costs in the sum of $2.

[1-3] On this appeal defendant and appellant Scatena asserts that the judgment on the pleadings against him was improper and for that reason it must be reversed. We agree with said appellant in this contention. In fact, the sole answer to it made by respondents is that the denials in the answer of the assignment of the cause of action to the plaintiff are in themselves insufficient. The answer in this connection contains three paragraphs, as follows:

"Avers that he has no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer the allegations contained in paragraph V of plaintiff's complaint, and basing his denial on said ground he denies that prior to the commencement of this action, or at any time, the said Bank of Italy, for a valuable or any consideration whatever, duly or otherwise, either assigned, transferred or delivered the said note to the plaintiff.

"Denies that the plaintiff is now the owner or holder of said promissory note, and on said ground denies that said note has ever been endorsed or assigned to the plaintiff.

"Denies that said plaintiff has any interest whatsoever in said promissory note or in the cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and defendant alleges that plaintiff has not the capacity to sue in said action and is not the proper party plaintiff therein."

It requires no citation of authority to declare that the above-mentioned denials put in issue the assignment to the plaintiff of the promissory note and cause of action sued upon. The pleader denies the right of plaintiff from any standpoint to bring this suit. Any mere ambiguity in the pleadings is without significance in the situation before us. Plaintiff cannot maintain the suit without proof of the assignment to him of the right to sue upon the note. It is elementary that on a motion for judgment on the pleadings every allegation affirmatively set up in the answer must be deemed true. Hill v. Moore, 47 Cal. App. 353, 190 P. 651; McGowan v. Ford, 107 Cal. 177, 40 P. 231; Bradford Investment Co. v. Joost, 117 Cal. 211, 48 P. 1083.

As the answer sets up a good defense and denies material allegations of the complaint, it was sufficient as against a general demurrer, and the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment on the pleadings. Neale v. Morrow, 174 Cal. 49, 54, 161 P. 1165.

In the case of Casci v. Ozalli, 158 Cal. 282, 283, 284, 110 P. 932, 933, it is said:

"The allegation that the plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the interest in the mining claim described was an allegation of facts material to the cause of action of the plaintiff. Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 243; McCarthy v. Yale, 39 Cal. 586; Johnson v. Vance, 86 Cal. 130, 24 P. 863. It was necessary for the plaintiff to establish ownership or possession, either by proof or admission, in order to entitle him to recover. The denial in the answer that he was either the owner or in possession of this, or of any, interest in the mining claim, put these facts directly in issue and made it necessary for the plaintiff to introduce evidence thereof before he could become entitled to judgment. In this condition of the pleadings it was error to grant a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 47; Prost v. More, 40 Cal. 347; Amador Co. v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 17, 27 P. 942, 49 Am. Rep. 679; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 333, 7 P. 753; Martin v. Porter, 84 Cal. 479, 24 P. 109; Derby v. Jackman, 89 Cal. 3, 26 P. 610; Norris v. Lilly, 147 Cal. 757, 82 P. 425, 109 Am. St. Rep. 188. Because of this error it is necessary that the part of the judgment involved in the appeal be reversed."

[4] In the case of Cass v. Rochester, 174 Cal. 358, 362, 163 P. 212, 213, a situation similar to the one before us was under consideration, and there this court said:

"There is still a further ground of objection to the granting of judgment on the pleadings. Defendant denied the transfer and assignment of the automobile by the Motor Company to the plaintiff. An assignment by the Motor Company of its interest in the automobile was not a matter that was presumably within the knowledge of the defendant. A denial for want of information or belief was, therefore, sufficient to raise an issue. Jensen v. Dorr, 159 Cal. 742, 747, 116 P. 553. The fact that in the counterclaim the defendant may have made admissions inconsistent with this denial does not impair its effect. A defendant has the right to plead inconsistent defenses, and if one of them denies material allegations of the complaint, judgment cannot be rendered on the pleadings, even though the matter thus denied may be admitted in another defense. Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 39; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 P. 753."

It will be noted that in the case quoted next above is found express authority for the proposition that denials of this character may be made upon information and belief. See, also, Norris v. Lilly, 147 Cal. 754, 757, 82 P. 425, 109 Am. St. Rep. 188.

For the benefit of the court below, to whom this action must go for further proceedings, it is necessary to allude to the contention of respondents that neither the counterclaim urged nor the cross-complaint filed states a cause of action either as a counterclaim or as a cross-complaint. Giving the combined counterclaim and cross-complaint the construction most favorable to defendant, it is in substance that the Bank of Italy, to whom the promissory note declared upon was owing, was served with a notice by said defendant that certain money, the owner of which is not stated, would be placed on deposit to the joint account of the three defendants herein named, and when so deposited it should be used only in the payment of the balance due upon and in the discharge of said promissory note, and that said Bank of Italy, in disregard of this notice, permitted the other two defendants jointly interested in said deposit to abstract a portion thereof, to wit, $10,000, and that had it been applied as directed the promissory note in suit would have been paid and discharged; that the plaintiff in this action is the agent of the Bank of Italy, which bank has in reality never parted with title, legal or equitable, to said note; that by reason of the permitting of the withdrawal of said sum of $10,000 appellant has had to carry on with the other two defendants expensive litigation (without mentioning the amount of such expense) in an attempt to obtain an accounting between himself and his said codefendants respecting said $10,000. This litigation is apparently still pending and undetermined, and we are not even given a prognosis of the result thereof. The counterclaim concludes with a prayer for $10,000 as against the plaintiff, and the cross-complainant prays that the Bank of Italy be brought in as a party cross-defendant to the litigation, and that it be decreed that the bank was the real plaintiff in the action, and that the regular plaintiff had no interest therein, and that defendant and cross-complainant have judgment against the Bank of Italy for the sum of $10,000 and for general relief.

[5-9] In our opinion, the demurrers to the counterclaim and cross-complaint were properly sustained without leave to amend. The attempted set-off was not available in this action to the defendant for the following reasons: (1) In an action upon a several obligation, the defendant may not set up as a counterclaim a demand or debt in which others than the defendant are beneficially interested. Wood v. Brush, 72 Cal. 224, 226, 13 P. 627; Corwin v. Ward, 35 Cal. 195, 198, 95 Am. Dec. 93; Howard v. Shores, 20 Cal. 278, 282; Flynn v. Seale, 2 Cal. App. 665, 670, 84 P. 263; 23 Cal. Jur. 260, § 34. The test is whether the defendant could have maintained an independent action on the demand attempted to be set off. Roberts v. Donovan, 70 Cal. 108, 112, 9 P. 180, 11 P. 599. If not, then it cannot be said to constitute a counterclaim "existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action," as required by the provisions of section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (2) As a cross-complaint the action does not grow out of nor is it in any wise connected with the action declared upon in the complaint and fails to meet the requirements of section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As a counterclaim it does not grow out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, nor is it an action upon a contract or for the breach of a contract, and hence it is insufficient under either subdivision 1 or 2 of section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure as that section stood prior to the amendment of 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1620).

Also it is self-evident that the assignee of a promissory note cannot be subjected to a personal judgment by way of a counterclaim against the assignor of the note.

The judgment is reversed.

PRESTON and LANGDON, JJ., being disqualified, do not participate in the foregoing opinion.

Action on a promissory note by Alvin R. Fouratt against A. I. Goodman, individually, etc., with cross-action by defendant. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Philip S. Ehrlich, of San Francisco (Albert A. Axelrod, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Wallace & Ames, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action on a promissory note for $300. In his answer the defendant alleged certain false and fraudulent representations on the part of the plaintiff in procuring the contract which was the basis of and consideration for the note. By way of cross-complaint the defendant set forth more particularly the fraud alleged in the answer and prayed that said promissory note be canceled and that the defendant receive from the plaintiff the sum of $7,200 on said cross-complaint.

The defendant was transacting business under the fictitious name of Goodman's International Importing & Exporting Company. On April 15, 1921, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a contract whereby the plaintiff engaged to assume a qualified management of the defendant's business and was to receive as compensation therefor a graduated percentage of the gross sales of the company. He served in that capacity until May, 1925. Shortly prior to February 16, 1925, a dispute arose between the parties with reference to the amount of money due the plaintiff under the contract of April 15, 1921, and the sales that had been made by the company. In an endeavor to compromise the controversy a conference was had between the plaintiff and the defendant in the office and under the direction of the defendant's attorney. A settlement was then and there agreed upon, under which the defendant acknowledged his indebtedness to the plaintiff in the sum of $748.56, and the plaintiff agreed to accept as full settlement the sum of $148.56 in cash and two promissory notes for $300 each, one of which is the note sued on herein. Under date of February 16, 1925, a written contract was signed by the parties confirming the settlement shortly theretofore agreed upon, the same to constitute a full acquittance, the one against the other. In May, 1925, the plaintiff was injured in an automobile accident and the defendant had occasion to assume management of the affairs of the company. Upon an examination of the books of the concern he concluded that the plaintiff had been computing his commissions on an erroneous basis and had been retaining excessive amounts therefor. The plaintiff apparently did not return to the service of the defendant after his injury, and this action was commenced in August, 1925.

The trial court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, and further found on the issues raised by the answer and cross-complaint that the plaintiff had not practiced any fraud upon or misled the defendant in the procurement of the settlement agreement of February 16, 1925. It is the contention of the defendant that the findings are not supported by the evidence. It is insisted that the note here in suit was given by the defendant under the mistaken belief that he was still indebted to the plaintiff for compensation, and that he would not have executed the same if he had known the facts. This phase of the controversy hinges largely on the correct method of the computation of commissions on sales under the original contract. If the computation were made according to plaintiff's contention, he would have been entitled to $3,700 more than he received. If computations were made as contended for by the defendant, the plaintiff was overpaid. It was in evidence that, at the time the compromise negotiations were pending, the attorney for the defendant conceded that the original contract was ambiguous and could be construed in accordance with the contentions of either party. Whatever may have been the correct construction of the original contract, the parties entered into negotiations for a settlement with full knowledge of the points in dispute. The compromise agreement was not rescinded or impeached by the evidence and as such operated as a bar to the reopening of the controversy under the original contract. 5 Cal. Jur. 401. The judgment is affirmed.

FIGLIETTI v. FRICK et al. (S. F. 11945.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1928.

1. Action $\Leftrightarrow$ 48(1)—Action for negligent operation on minor, resulting in death, held properly united with one for operation without parents' consent (Code Civ. Proc. § 427).

Cause of action for alleged wrongful and negligent operation upon plaintiff's minor son, resulting in his death, and one based on same operation, alleged to have been without knowledge or consent of parents or guardian of such minor, were susceptible of being properly united in one complaint, under Code Civ. Proc. § 427.

2. Action $\Leftrightarrow$ 48(1)—Two inconsistent causes of action arising out of same transaction may be tried together, where proof and remedies are substantially the same.

A plaintiff may plead and proceed to trial on two inconsistent causes of action when each arises out of same transaction, and proof and remedies available in each are substantially the same.

3. Election of remedies $\Leftrightarrow$ 3(1)—Cause of action for unskillful operation on minor held not so inconsistent with one based on operation without consent so as to require election.

Cause of action for alleged negligent operation on plaintiff's minor son resulting in his death held not so far inconsistent with one based on same operation alleging that it was without knowledge or consent of minor's parents or guardian so as to justify compelling plaintiff to elect, since plaintiff in both cases must show that death was proximately caused by unskillfulness in performing operation, and defense in each cause of action would be substantially the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Maria Figlietti against E. B. Frick and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ernest M. Torchia, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for respondents Frick, Yocom, and Larson.

Hartley F. Peart and Charles V. Barfield, both of San Francisco, for respondent Fowler.

Louis Ferrari and Joseph J. Posner, both of San Francisco, for respondent Jeffry.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff from a judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco in the defendants' favor after the court had granted a motion for nonsuit at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case. The action was one instituted by the plaintiff for the recovery of damages for the death of her minor son, which occurred on or about May 4, 1922, while the latter was an inmate of the city and county hospital of San Francisco, and which death was alleged to have occurred after the performance of an operation upon said inmate by or under the direction of the defendants herein, who were the physicians, surgeons, assistants, and employees in charge of said hospital at said time. The plaintiff's fourth amended complaint was in two counts, in the first of which she alleged that the operation upon her deceased son, a minor, was performed by and under the direction of said defendants, and that the same was performed wrongfully, unlawfully, carelessly, unskillfully, and negligently, and that the same resulted in the death of her said minor son as the direct result of said operation. In the second count of her said complaint the plaintiff, after repeating by adoption the first eight paragraphs of the first count of her said complaint, but omitting those later paragraphs wherein the negligent performance of said operation was averred, proceeded to aver that the operation thus alleged to have been performed upon the person of her said minor son was performed "wrongfully and unlawfully and without the knowledge or consent of the parents or guardian of said minor," and that by reason of said operation the said minor, on or about May 4, 1922, died. The defendants answered severally with denials of the gravamen of both counts of said complaint, and the cause proceeded to trial before a jury.

At the beginning of the trial counsel for the defendants joined in a motion to compel the plaintiff to an election upon which count of her said complaint she would proceed to trial. The trial court, over the objection of the plaintiff, granted said motion, and thereupon the plaintiff, still insisting upon her objection, elected to proceed to trial upon the second count of her said complaint, viz., that averring that the death of her said minor son occurred through the performance upon him by said defendants of said operation without the parents' or guardian's consent. During the progress of the trial the court from time to time sustained objections urged by defendants' counsel to the introduction of any evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the defendants, or any of them, in the performance of said operation, thereby confining the plaintiff's evidence strictly to the issue of consent. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case several motions for nonsuit were made on behalf of one or more of said defendants severally, all of which were granted by the trial court, the result being that each and all of said defendants were absolved from liability and the general judgment in their favor followed as of course.

[1, 2] The plaintiff makes two points upon this appeal: First, that the trial court was in error in making its order at the beginning of the trial compelling the plaintiff to an election as to which of the two counts in her said complaint she would proceed to trial; second, that the trial court was in error in granting the defendants' motion for nonsuit. As to the first of these alleged grounds of error an examination of the plaintiff's said complaints discloses that the two counts or causes of action set forth therein arose out of the same transaction, viz., out of an operation performed upon the minor son of the plaintiff while he was an inmate of the hospital of which the defendants in various capacities were in charge. Both causes of action were grounded in alleged injuries to the person of the plaintiff's minor son, followed by his death. Both of these causes of action were actions ex delicto, the one being an injury alleged to have been committed upon the person of the decedent and which was in the nature of an assault or trespass upon his person because committed without the consent of his parents or guardian; the other being for the negligent performance upon the decedent's person of an operation which resulted in his death. Harding v. Liberty Hospital Co., 177 Cal. 520, 171 P. 98, and cases cited. These two causes of action were thus susceptible of being properly united in the said complaint, under the provisions of section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Whether, being thus properly united in the plaintiff's said complaint up to the time of the commencement of the trial of said action, they were so inconsistent as to the proofs to be offered in support of each, or as to the remedy to be accorded for the breach of one or both of them, is the real issue before us upon this, the plaintiff's first alleged ground of error. We are unable to discover any such inconsistency in these two causes of action as would serve to justify the action of the trial court in compelling the plaintiff's election as to which of them she would rest her right of recovery upon. It may be concluded that, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Lennon in the case of Tognazzini v. Freeman, 18 Cal. App. 468, 123 P. 540, there exists an inconsistency between a cause of action for willful injuries and a cause of action for injuries arising from negligence. But it is not such an inconsistency as would either have prevented the uniting of the two causes of action in the same complaint originally or the reliance upon both by the plaintiff at the trial. The error of the trial court in the above-cited case did not consist in permitting the plaintiff to go to trial upon two inconsistent causes of action, but in so instructing the jury as to permit the plaintiff to recover upon a cause of action not averred in the complaint.

[3] The law is well settled in this state that a plaintiff may plead and proceed to trial upon inconsistent causes of action (Stockton, etc., v. Glens, etc., I. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 171, 53 P. 565; Froeming v. Stockton, etc., Co., 171 Cal. 401, 404, 153 P. 712, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 408), when each arises out of the same transaction and when the proofs as to which and the remedies available in each are substantially the same. The other cases upon which the respondents herein rely afford little comfort to their contention. In the case of Wood v. Wyeth, 106 App. Div. 21, 94 N. Y. S. 360, it was held that "the cause of action set out therein [the complaint] was clearly a cause of action for negligence, and nothing else," and hence that the order of the trial court in confining the plaintiff's proofs to that single cause of action was without substantial error. In the case of Staloch v. Holm, 100 Minn. 276, 111 N. W. 264, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 712, the court held that the action was one for negligence, in which the question as to whether the operation was with or without consent did not arise. The case of Van Meter v. Crews, 149 Ky. 335, 148 S. W. 40, to which we are cited by appellant, presents to our minds the better reasoning as to why the two causes of action, which were the same in that case as in this, were not so far inconsistent as to prevent their trial together. The similarity between that case and the instant case is striking. The patient in each case was under the care of the physicians who performed the operation out of which the plaintiff's cause or causes of action arose. If the operation was performed upon either patient while that relation existed, it was equally a breach of duty if performed without the consent on the part of the patient, or, in the case of a minor, of those capable of giving consent, or if, with consent, it was done unskillfully. In such circumstances, as the Supreme Court of Kentucky well said:

"If the plaintiff is to recover at all she must recover all her damages in one action, for manifestly, she cannot bring one action alleging that the operation was performed without her consent and another alleging that it was performed unskillfully. If she cannot present her whole case in one action therefore she will be denied remedy. Her whole case arises from the defendant's breach of duty as a physician and she may in one action set up as many breaches of duty as exist. The court, therefore, properly refused to require the plaintiff to elect between the two grounds of recovery sued on."

The error of the trial court in compelling the plaintiff to an election as to which cause of action she would rely upon would seem to be manifest when considered from another point of view. The gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint under either cause of action is the injury she has sustained. The injury upon which the amount of her recovery must be predicated under either of these counts consists in the death of her minor son, and in order to recover damages for that injury she must have been able to show that the operation upon the patient, whether performed with or without consent, was the proximate cause of his death. In the absence of such showing, only nominal damages would have been recoverable, even though her consent to the operation had not previously been obtained. In either event, therefore, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff, in order to the recovery of substantial damages, to show unskillfulness in the performance of the operation upon her son; and if such unskillfulness were proved, and if the death of her son had been shown to be the proximate consequence thereof, the amount of her recoverable damages would be the same under either cause of action. It may be further said that under either cause of action the defense of the defendants, and each of them, would be substantially the same, since whether the plaintiff did or did not consent to the operation they would be compelled to meet the issue as to whether or not the patient's death had been proximately caused by unskillfulness in its performance. It follows that both in respect to the proofs and also of the remedies there was no such inconsistency between these two pleaded causes of action as would suffice to justify the order of the trial court compelling the plaintiff to elect as to which she would go to trial upon. This initial error on the part of the trial court was persisted in throughout the trial to the extent of exclusion upon the defendants' insistence of all evidence tending to prove negligence in the performance of the operation. This initial error of the trial court thus persisted in compels a reversal of this case; and this being necessitated, it becomes needless to consider whether the trial court was also in error in granting the defendants' several motions for nonsuit. On another hearing upon the whole issue presented by the plaintiff's complaint and the defendants' answers thereto, it may be found that as to some of the defendants herein a cause of action upon either count cannot be stated, but until that is shown we think the status quo of the parties to the action should be maintained.

The judgment is reversed.

KAHRIMAN v. JONES, Sheriff, et al.
(S. F. 12197.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1928.

1. Chattel mortgages ⇨3—Provisions of Civil Code relating to chattel mortgages should be strictly construed (Civ. Code, § 2956 et seq.).

Provisions of Civil Code relating to chattel mortgages (section 2956 et seq.) should be strictly construed, for they give a special right to a lien independent of possession, a situation unknown to common law with relation to personal property.

2. Chattel mortgages ⇨52—Chattel mortgage on automobile given to secure payment of notes, failing to show due date of notes, held insufficient (Civ. Code, § 2956).

Chattel mortgage on automobile which merely recited that it was given as security for payment of certain promissory notes, there being nothing on its face which would give notice to third persons as to due date of debt secured by it, did not meet requirements of Civ. Code, § 2956, and hence was insufficient to give notice to third persons.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by A. K. Kahrman against W. F. Jones, Sheriff of the County of Fresno, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Solinsky, Edw. R. Solinsky, and Edward Schary, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Roy Fitzpatrick, of Fresno, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him, after defendants' motion for a nonsuit had been granted, in an action in which plaintiff sought to recover from the defendants damages for alleged conversion of an automobile upon the theory that at the time of its seizure the plaintiff was the holder of a valid and subsisting chattel mortgage upon said property. The purported chattel mortgage was offered in evidence, and the only question presented upon the appeal is its sufficiency to meet the requirements of section 2956, Civil Code. It is admitted that the instrument was accompanied by the proper affidavit and acknowledged and recorded in like manner as a grant of real property, as required by section 2957, Civil Code.

[1, 2] Section 2956, Civil Code, prescribes the form of a mortgage of personal property in this state, and this form includes a description of the property mortgaged and a description of the debt for which the mortgage is given, specifying the amount of said debt, the date due, the amount of interest payable thereon; and, in the event the mortgage is given to secure the payment of a note, the form is to contain a description of said note. In the instant case the mortgage merely recited that it was given "as security for the payment of four promissory notes totaling $5,329.14, and also the repayment of all advances by the mortgagee or assigns to the mortgagor not exceeding the sum of $100," etc. This mortgage was dated March, 1920, and the notes which were introduced in evidence and asserted to be those secured by the mortgage were dated December, 1923, and recited that they were renewals of notes given during the years 1918 and 1919.

It thus appears that the mortgage on its face would give no notice to third persons as to the due date of the debt secured thereby.

The provisions of the Civil Code relating to chattel mortgages have been strictly construed by the courts, as, indeed, they should be, for those sections give a special right to a lien independent of possession, a situation unknown to the common law with relation to personal property. It was said in Cardenas v. Miller, 108 Cal. 250, 41 P. 472, 49 Am. St. Rep. 84:

"The latter [subsequent purchasers] are protected against the prior unrecorded mortgage only when they take their conveyances 'in good faith and for value'; and, of course, they do not take them in good faith if they have actual notice of the prior mortgage. But not so as to creditors. As to them good faith is not made a condition, but such a mortgage is declared void without qualification. * * * The plain import of the statute is that nothing but a compliance with its terms will protect a mortgage of chattels against creditors."

To the same effect are the cases of Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 290, 53 P. 911, 59 P. 827, 46 L. R. A. 371. In Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 P. 104, 53 Am. St. Rep. 201, it is said:

"It is sufficient, for the purposes of this case, to say, that, as against a subsequent mortgagee in good faith, a mortgage upon a growing crop must be executed with the formalities prescribed in the Civil Code, otherwise it is void as against him."

To the same effect are the cases of Bell v. Sage, 60 Cal. App. 149, 212 P. 404, and Hopper v. Keys, 152 Cal. 493, 92 P. 1017. In the latter case it was said:

"It must be conceded that the authority for the creation of chattel mortgages in this state derives its force from the statutory provisions relating to the subject, and that all rights accruing by virtue of such mortgages can be protected and preserved only by fully meeting the requirements of the statute and strictly observing its provisions."

The appellant relies solely upon the case of Harms v. Silva, 91 Cal. 636, 27 P. 1088. That case presents a contest between two mortgagees, and the question decided was as to whether a subsequent mortgagee, with notice of the rights of a prior incumbrancer, is an "incumbrancer in good faith." The court states:

"Section 2956 provides a form with which such mortgage must substantially comply. Keating's mortgage does substantially comply with the prescribed form."

The Keating mortgage was not set forth in the opinion, either in whole or in part, but appellant has printed a copy of it, obtained from the transcript in that case. From this it appears that in describing the debt secured by the mortgage the due date was omitted, as in the instant case. The date of the promissory note was given, however, and the rate of interest it bore, which details were not given in the instant case. It is clear that there was a closer compliance with the statute in the case of Harms v. Silva, supra, than there was in the instant case and we do not feel that the rule of strict compliance, announced by the authorities herein cited, should be further relaxed. That rule has the advantage of certainty in its application, and we think it is necessary to effect the purpose of the statute.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WEBB v. JONES et al. (Civ. 5180.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 27, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 20, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨76(3)—Lessor's consent to assignment discharges covenant against assignment, and subsequent assignments may be made without consent unless lease provides otherwise.

Where lease contains covenant against assignment without consent, such consent once given by lessor discharges covenant, and subsequent assignments may be made without such consent, unless there is appropriate language in lease making covenant binding upon subsequent assignees.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨208(2)—Assignees of lessees are liable to lessors for rents accruing during time assignees are in possession.

Assignees of lessees are liable to lessors for rents accruing during time assignees are in possession of demised premises.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨79(1)—Where assignees of lease did not assign whole estate and created new causes of forfeiture, parties taking possession were sublessees, not assignees.

Where assignees of lease executed conditional sales contract to W., reserving title to lease and furniture and appointments, and W.

assumed assignees' obligations, and it was provided that assignees should have right to retake possession on W.'s default, and W. later assigned conditional sales contract to J., W. and J. were not assignees of lease, but each held only as sublessee, since whole estate of assignees of lease was not assigned and new causes of forfeiture were created.

4. Appeal and error ⇨882(3)—Plaintiff was bound on appeal by theory of case she followed in lower court.

Plaintiff lessor was bound in appellate court by theory of rights of parties resulting from subleasing which she followed in lower court.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨80(3)—Subtenant is not liable to lessor on covenants of lease nor on covenants of sublease.

There is no privity of contract or estate between an original lessor and a subtenant, and subtenant is not liable to lessor on covenants of lease nor on covenants of sublease.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(5)—Sublessees were proper parties defendant in unlawful detainer action by lessor (Code Civ. Proc. § 1164).

In unlawful detainer action by lessor, sublessees were proper parties defendant under Code Civ. Proc. § 1164, in order that whatever claims they had to demised premises might be determined, although action could have proceeded without them.

7. Landlord and tenant ⇨112(1)—Lessor, by trying unlawful detainer action on theory that sublessees were liable for rents, waived forfeiture of lease because of subleasing.

Lessor, trying unlawful detainer action against lessee and sublessees and taking judgment on theory that by reason of contractual relations existing between lessee and sublessees both sublessees were liable for rents and damages, waived forfeiture of lease because of subleasing, where lease prohibited subleasing.

8. Tender ⇨18—Where lessor refused sublessee's checks for rent and sublessee did not deposit amount to lessor's credit and give notice as required by statute, debt was not extinguished by tenders (Civ. Code, § 1500).

Where sublessee tendered rents to lessor which were refused by her, but sublessee did not attempt to extinguish obligation by depositing amount thereof to lessor's credit and by giving of notice of deposits as provided in Civ. Code, § 1500, debt was not extinguished by tenders.

9. Landlord and tenant ⇨290(2)—Where lessor refused rents tendered by sublessee and sublessee used money for other purposes and was unable to pay back rents after June 14, 1924, lessor had cause of action in unlawful detainer on June 25, 1924, because of nonpayment of rent.

Where lessor refused payments of rent tendered by sublessee and sublessee thereafter used money for other purposes and was unable to pay back rents on or after June 14, 1924, and lessor commenced action June 25, 1924, she had just cause of action in unlawful detainer because of nonpayment of rent.

10. Landlord and tenant $\hookrightarrow$ 291(14)—Lessor could not recover interest on unpaid rents in unlawful detainer action where rents were tendered and refused, though tenders were not kept good (Civ. Code, § 1504).

Lessor was not entitled to interest on amount of rents found unpaid in unlawful detainer action, where sublessee, one of defendants, had tendered rent to lessor and she had refused same, since tenders and their refusals, although tenders were not kept good, stop running of interest on the obligation under Civ. Code, § 1504.

11. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 129(2)—Defendants' admitted lessor's allegation in complaint in unlawful detainer that termination notices stated amount of rent unpaid by failure to deny allegations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 462, 1161).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, defendant assignee of lease and sublessees admitted lessor's allegations in unlawful detainer action that termination notice and notice to quit stated amount of rents unpaid as provided in section 1161 by their failure to deny allegations in answer.

12. Landlord and tenant $\hookrightarrow$ 291(3)—Defendants waived objections to lessor's termination notices by failure to specially demur by admitting allegations in answer, and by presenting objections on appeal for first time (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161).

Defendants waived objections in unlawful detainer action to lessor's termination notices as not complying with Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, by failure to reach point by special demurrer to amended complaint, by admitting in their answer truth of allegations of amended complaint in relation to contents of notices, and by presenting their objections on appeal for first time.

On Petition for Rehearing.

13. Landlord and tenant $\hookrightarrow$ 290(2)—Where breaches of lease were shown, and proper notices of forfeiture given, court could cancel lease and grant other relief prayed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 3).

Where breaches of covenants of lease regarding keeping demised premises in good order and condition, and making alterations and keeping premises furnished, were shown in unlawful detainer action, and proper notices of forfeiture were given, court was authorized to terminate lease, restore premises to plaintiff, and award damages, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 3.

14. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1071(5)—Finding that defendants failed to keep premises in repair, if erroneous, because notices of forfeiture did not mention such default, held harmless where judgment was otherwise sustained.

In unlawful detainer action, finding to effect that defendants failed to keep premises in repair, if erroneous, for reason that notices of forfeiture made no mention of such default, held not prejudicial, where failure to fulfill other covenants sustained judgment terminating lease.

15. Landlord and tenant $\hookrightarrow$ 291(17)—Defendant's failure to fulfill covenants of lease regarding altering premises and keeping premises furnished sustained judgment terminating lease, without right of reinstatement (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 3; § 1174).

Failure of defendants in unlawful detainer action to fulfill covenants of lease not to alter premises without consent and to keep premises furnished were sufficient to sustain judgment terminating lease, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 3, with no right of reinstatement under section 1174, on payment of unpaid rents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by Lillie T. Webb against A. M. Jones, Walter J. Lewis, and Annie Lewis and others. From the judgment, Walter J. Lewis and Annie Lewis appeal. Affirmed as modified.

William C. Jensen, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph Musgrove, J. Karl Lobdell, and Fred O. McGirr, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, the respondent herein, brought this action in unlawful detainer to recover possession of demised premises, consisting of an apartment house property, for damages on account of unpaid rents and unlawful detention, and for attorney's fees. Plaintiff's predecessors in interest, by written lease, demised to defendant Maude Bryant Johnson for eight years, beginning August 1, 1920, at the rental of $450 per month during the first three years and $500 per month during the remainder of the term, payable monthly in advance, and the lessee agreed therein as follows: That she should keep the premises and appurtenances in the same good order and condition as when delivered to her, reasonable use excepted; that no alterations or changes in the premises should be made without the written consent of the lessors; that she should keep the premises as fully and well furnished as at the execution of the lease, and should make all necessary restorations and replacements to keep them so furnished. The lease contains the following provisions regarding assignment and for subletting:

"Permission is granted to the original lessee to assign and transfer this lease to an individual person or persons, providing such assignee or assignees shall assume and agree to perform each and all of the covenants herein contained to be performed by the lessee. Save as aforesaid, it is agreed that this lease shall not be assigned or transferred except by and with the written consent of the lessors. The said premises shall not be sublet or underlet except the customary underletting of apartments in conducting an apartment house. * * *

The lease also provides that, should any of the rent be unpaid or should the lessee be in default in any other covenant or condition of the lease, the lessors might, at their option, and upon ten days' written notice to the lessee, re-enter, take possession, and remove all persons from the premises, and upon so electing they might at their option terminate the lease and recover from the lessee all damages caused by any such breach, including costs and reasonable attorney's fees incurred by the lessors; also that the lessors should have a first lien upon all the furniture and furnishings to secure payment of the rents and performance of the lessee's other agreements. The lessee executed her chattel mortgage in conformity with the foregoing.

Defendant Johnson sold the furniture and furnishings and assigned the lease to appellants and put appellants into possession, and about August 1, 1922, appellants procured the written consent of the lessors for an assignment of the lease by appellants to defendant Tillie J. Wentling. About August 10, 1922, appellants entered into a conditional sales contract denominated "Lease Contract," whereby they agreed to sell the lease and the "furniture and appointments" of the apartment house for $40,000 to defendant Wentling, $16,000 of which sum was then paid and the balance Wentling agreed to pay in installments of $300 per month, appellants reserving the title to the lease and furniture and appointments until full payment, and Wentling assuming all the lessee's obligations under the lease. It was further stipulated therein that the contract should be subject to all the terms of the lease, and that, in the event of any default on the part of Wentling, under the contract, all payments thereunder which remained unpaid should become immediately payable, and upon her failure to pay appellants should have the right to retake possession. Thereafter appellants put Wentling into possession of the premises and contents under the contract.

On January 1, 1923, lessors conveyed the premises and assigned the lease to plaintiff. About January 15, 1924, Wentling assigned the conditional sales contract to defendant A. M. Jones, who assumed all of the obligations thereof, and Jones went into possession of the premises and contents under the contract. No consent was obtained from plaintiff to any assignment of the lease to Jones or to any subletting to Wentling or Jones or to the possession by Jones. Jones paid the rent for February, 1924, and tendered to plaintiff the rents for March to December, inclusive, in 1924, at $500 per month, which tenders were refused by plaintiff, but Jones failed to keep his tenders good by depositing the amount and serving the notice as provided in section 1500 of the Civil Code, and those rents and all rents subsequently falling due remained unpaid. Plaintiff or her predecessors in interest had no knowledge of the execution or existence of the conditional sales contract or that Wentling was in possession under it, or that it had been assigned to Jones, or of the possession by Jones under that contract, until after this action was commenced, but plaintiff was informed by Jones that he was in charge of the premises as manager for Wentling. The foregoing facts are not in dispute, and the following are established by the weight of evidence: During the term of the lease defendants made or permitted to exist material alterations in the demised premises and omissions from the contents thereof without replacements, without the consent of plaintiff or her predecessors in interest.

On or about May 1, 1924, plaintiff served a written demand upon each of the defendants, including appellants Wentling and Jones, reciting that appellants and Wentling, without the consent of lessors or plaintiff, "assigned, transferred and/or sublet said lease or premises to said A. M. Jones," failed to keep the premises furnished as required in the lease and made said alterations, and that the rent for the months of March and April, 1924, has not been paid, and that, by reason thereof, plaintiff elected to terminate the lease and to re-enter the premises at the expiration of ten days and to recover all damages caused by said breaches, including reasonable attorney's fees and costs; and that defendants are required to surrender possession upon the expiration of said ten days unless said breaches are remedied. The rents were not paid and none of the other matters complained of were remedied, and on or about June 19, 1924, plaintiff served upon each of the defendants a three-day notice and demand referring to the ten days' demand, reciting the asserted defaults and that plaintiff had elected to and did terminate the lease and to re-enter the premises, that further defaults had been made in that the rentals for the months of May and June, 1924, were not paid, and that defendants were required, within three days after the service of this notice, to remedy the defaults or to deliver up possession of the premises or plaintiff will institute proceedings to recover the same, together with damages for detention thereof.

This action was commenced on June 25, 1924, and the trial court found the foregoing facts, and the following: That appellants sublet the premises to Wentling and her husband and that Wentling and her husband sublet to Jones, each of whom assumed the obligations of the lease binding on the lessee; that neither of the sublettings was known or consented to by plaintiff or the lessors and that each subletting was a violation of the terms of the lease; that the unpaid rents of $500 per month from March 1, 1924, to March 2, 1925, aggregated $6,000, and the interest accrued thereon $192.-

70 and that $1,000 is a reasonable attorney's fee to be allowed plaintiff. The court concluded upon the facts that plaintiff was entitled to have the lease terminated, to restitution of the premises and to recover from the defendants "for rental for said premises" $6,000, and $192.70 interest thereon. Judgment was entered for such termination and restitution and for $6,192.70 against all of the defendants, but the judgment does not recite whether the sum or any part of it was for rent or damages.

The amended complaint alleged that the rents subsequent to March 1, 1924, were unpaid, the service of the demands for the rents at $500 per month, and that plaintiff was damaged $3,000 by unlawful possession by defendants, and prayed for cancellation of the lease, possession, and damages for unlawful possession, for rents and attorney's fees.

1. The complaint, findings, conclusions, and judgment indicate that money recovery in the judgment covers only the unpaid rents that accrued prior to the notice of forfeiture, and the damages suffered by the unlawful detention after the forfeiture, as found and determined by the court, and attorney's fees. Pfizer v. Candeias, 53 Cal. App. 737, 200 P. 839.

Appellants made a number of assignments of error. In order to determine the rights of the parties, consideration is given to the following points presented by them: The lease was assigned, not sublet to Wentling and Jones. The covenant not to assign or sublet was not violated. The agreement to pay rent was not broken. The covenant not to alter the premises was not broken. The covenants to keep the premises in good condition and repair and fully furnished were performed. The ten-day termination notice and the three-day notice were insufficient as a matter of law. Forfeiture was waived.

2. Although the lessors gave their written consent to an assignment of the lease by appellants to Wentling, appellants executed to Wentling only the conditional sales contract of the lease and contents of the apartment house, and appellants reserved the right of re-entry upon any breach of the terms of the contract. Jones held as assignee of the rights of Wentling under the conditional sales contract.

[1] The first question to be determined in this connection is whether Wentling and Jones were assignees of the lease or sublessees. In relation to assignments by lessees under a lease containing a covenant against assignment without consent such as found in the lease under consideration, our courts have held that the covenant is personal, binding only upon the lessee, and does not run with the land. Such consent once given by a lessor discharges the covenant, and subsequent assignments may be made without such consent unless there is appropriate language in the lease making the covenant binding upon the subsequent assignees. Miller v. Reidy (Cal. App.) 260 P. 358, and cases cited therein. See, also, Ericksen v. Rhee, 181 Cal. 562, 185 P. 847; Rothrock v. Sanborn, 178 Cal. 693, 174 P. 314.

[2] Assuming that Wentling and Jones were assignees as contended by appellants, the assignment to Wentling by consent of appellants discharged the covenant contained in the lease against assignment without consent of the lessors, and no consent to the subsequent assignment to Jones was necessary. Therefore, as the courts have uniformly held that assignees of lessees are liable to the lessors for rents accruing during the time the assignees are in possession of demised premises (Baker v. J. Maier & Zobelein Brewery, 140 Cal. 530, 74 P. 22; Realty & Rebuilding Co. v. Rea, 184 Cal. 565 at page 569, 194 P. 1024; Jordan v. Scott, 38 Cal. App. 739, 177 P. 504), plaintiff was within her rights in pursuing Wentling and Jones for the unpaid rents and for damages for unlawful detention.

[3] On the other hand, plaintiff contends that Wentling and Jones were sublessees. If they were, we are faced by a different situation, unless by her acts in this action plaintiff has waived her right to deny that they were assignees or that they acquired some rights in the demised premises which she recognized.

The rules of law, governing such a situation are clearly defined in Barkhaus v. Producers' Fruit Co., 192 Cal. 200, at pages 205, 206, 219 P. 435, 437, as follows:

"It is elementary that a sublease, in order to operate as an assignment, must transfer to the sublessee the entire term of the original lessee, in the whole or some part of the demised premises. * * * The term thus referred to is not measured alone by the length of time for which it runs, but is measured as well by the extent of the premises which it covers and the nature and extent of the estate or interest therein which it embodies. The term * * * may be regarded as having three dimensions analogous to the special dimensions of length, breadth, and thickness. *The term to be transferred to his assignee by such a tenant * * * must include all of the estate and interest in said premises possessed by the lessee under the original lease.* 'To constitute an assignment of a leasehold interest, the assignee must take precisely the same estate in the whole or in a part' of the leased premises which his assignor had therein. * * * For in the language of Blackstone, * * * 'if by the terms of the conveyance, be it in the form of a lease or an assignment, new conditions with the right of entry, or new causes of forfeiture are created, then the tenant holds by different tenure, and a new leasehold interest arises, which cannot be treated as an assignment or a continuation to him of the original term.' Dunlap v. Bullard, 131 Mass. 161, 162. See, also, United States v. Hickey, 17

Wall, (84 U. S.) 9, 21 L. Ed. 559. See, also, Rose's U. S. Notes; Davis v. Vidal, 105 Tex. 444, 151 S. W. 290, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1084; 1 Taylor on Landlord and Tenant (9th Ed.) § 16." (Italics ours.)

As the whole estate held by appellants under the lease was not assigned to Wentling or Jones, and as in the conditional sales contract new causes of forfeiture were created and appellants expressly reserved the right to re-enter the demised premises and terminate the contract upon any breach thereof by Wentling, it appears that neither Wentling nor Jones held as assignee of the lease, but that each held only as sublessee. The lease prohibited any such subleasing and provided that the lessors might at their election re-enter the demised premises and terminate the lease upon any such subleasing.

[4] 3. In determining the rights of the parties resulting from the subleasing, full consideration must be given to the theory on which the case was tried in the lower court. Plaintiff is bound here by the theory she followed there. Lugiani v. Landau Economic Syphon Co., 38 Cal. App. 146, 175 P. 648; Lamberson v. Bashore, 178 Cal. 321, 173 P. 401; 2 Cal. Jur. 237 and 801. Plaintiff pursued Wentling and Jones in this action, and, after she was advised that they were sublessees only, she took judgment against them as well as against appellants for the unpaid rents which accrued prior to the forfeiture and for the damages she suffered thereafter by the unlawful detention as found by the court.

[5] There is no privity of contract or estate between an original lessor and a subtenant, and the subtenant is not liable to the lessor on the covenants of the lease nor on the covenants of the sublease. Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, § 162; Bekins v. Smith, 37 Cal. App. 222, 174 P. 96; Richmond v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 9 Cal. App. 62, 98 P. 57; Francis v. West Virginia Oil Co., 174 Cal. 168, 162 P. 394; Steinback v. Krone, 36 Cal. 303. However, it was held by the Supreme Court of Arkansas that, where a defendant agreed to take the place of the tenant under a lease, whether as assignee, or sublessee, and pay the rent to the lessor, the agreement inured to the benefit of the lessor and the lessor could sue the defendant for the rent. Foucar v. Holberg, 58 Ark. 59, 107 S. W. 172; but see Ericksen v. Rhee, 181 Cal. 562, at page 566, 185 P. 847; 18 Cal. Jur. p. 41, § 364, and cases cited.

[6] In the conditional sales contract Wentling assumed "all and every obligation of sellers" (appellants) under the lease, and in the assignment of that contract Jones assumed and agreed to "fulfill all the terms and conditions as set out in said contract." As sublessees, Wentling and Jones were proper parties defendant in this action in order that whatever claims they had to the demised premises might be determined (section 1164, Code Civ. Proc.; Pardee v. Gray, 66 Cal. 524, 6 P. 389), but this action could have proceeded without them (Tujague v. Superior Court of City & County of San Francisco, 69 Cal. App. 35, 230 P. 198).

The theory upon which this case was tried and judgment taken was that, by reason of the contractual relations existing between appellants and Wentling and Jones, both Wentling and Jones were liable for said rents and damages. Wentling and Jones did not appeal.

It was held in Randol v. Tatum, 98 Cal. 390, 33 P. 433, which was an action for rent and against sureties on a bond to secure the rent, that forfeiture of a lease for breach of a condition against assignment without consent of the lessor was waived by acceptance of rent, eo nomine, from any one after knowledge by the lessor of the assignment. See, also, Goodwin v. Grosse, 56 Cal. App. 615, 206 P. 138.

[7] The conclusion necessarily follows that plaintiff, by her acts, waived forfeiture of the lease because of the subleasing. This conclusion, however, is not decisive of this appeal. The matters hereinafter discussed determine the rights of the parties herein involved.

[8, 9] 4. Jones tendered the rents for the months of March to December, 1922, at $500 per month by means of checks mailed to plaintiff, which were refused by her, but he did not attempt to extinguish the obligation by depositing the amount thereof to the credit of plaintiff and by giving the notice of the deposits as provided in section 1500 of the Civil Code. Therefore the debt was not extinguished by the tenders. Segno v. Segno, 175 Cal. 743, 167 P. 285; 24 Cal. Jur. 526. Continuous readiness to pay after the tender was not shown. In fact, Jones testified that after he made the tenders he used the money for other purposes and was not able to pay the back rents on or after June 14, 1924. This action was commenced on June 25, 1924. Therefore plaintiff had a just cause of action in unlawful detainer because of the nonpayment of the rent. Occidental Real Estate Co. v. Gantner & Matern, 7 Cal. App. 727, 95 P. 1042.

[10] In the ordinary action of unlawful detainer for nonpayment of rent, it is proper for the court to allow 7 per cent. interest on the installments of rent. Chambers v. Security Commercial & Savings Bank, 46 Cal. App. 32, 188 P. 818. The lower court erred in this case, however, in allowing interest upon the amount of rents found unpaid. The tenders and their refusals, although the tenders were not kept good, "stop the running of interest on the obligation." Section 1504, Civ. Code; Lockhart v. J. H. McDou- gall Co., 190 Cal. 308, at page 312, 212 P. 1, and cases therein cited.

5. The court found, and the findings are supported by substantial evidence, that the defendants were guilty of other violations of the covenants or conditions of the lease consisting of material alterations in the demised premises and material omissions from the contents thereof without replacements, and that the consent or approval of plaintiff or her predecessors in interest therefor was not obtained. As the judgment appealed from was based substantially upon the defaults in payment of rents, and such defaults are sufficient to sustain the judgment, no further consideration will be given to the question whether the violations were in themselves sufficient to base this action upon.

[11] 6. Appellants contend that the termination notice and the notice to quit were fatally defective, in that neither notice stated the amount of rents unpaid, as provided in section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and they also cite Hill Co. v. Pinque, 179 Cal. 759, 178 P. 952, 3 A. L. R. 669; Id., 56 Cal. App. 245, 204 P. 1097. This point was not raised by appellants in the lower court, and no objection as to the sufficiency of the evidence in relation to the notices was made there by them. Each of the notices named the months for which the rents were unpaid, but failed to state the amount of the rents. The lease required the payment of $500 per month rent in each of those months. The amended complaint alleged that the termination notice served on the defendants named the months and stated the amount of rent unpaid, and that the notice to quit also named the months and likewise stated the amount of rent unpaid. A copy of each of the notices was attached to the amended complaint and was referred to and made a part of it. Appellants did not demur to this pleading. The answer of appellants admits those allegations by failure to deny them. "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true. * * *" Section 462, Code Civ. Proc.; Welch v. Alcott, 185 Cal. 731, at page 754, 198 P. 626, and cases cited.

In the case of Mendocino County v. Morris, 32 Cal. 145, the complaint alleged that the official bond sued on was signed by all the defendants. The name of the principal did not appear on the copy of the bond attached to the complaint. Demurrer was interposed to the complaint, but the demurrer did not raise the question of uncertainty or ambiguity. "The direct averment of the execution of the bond in the body of the complaint must prevail, as against the omission of the signature in the copy. * * * The most that can be said is that the complaint is ambiguous in this respect. * * * The objection is raised for the first time in this court."

In the case of Blasingame v. Home Ins. Co., 75 Cal. 633, at page 637, 17 P. 925, brought on a policy of fire insurance, it appeared that the complaint alleged that by the policy, a copy of which was attached to and made a part of the complaint, the loss, if any, was made payable to plaintiff, but the attached copy contained nothing to show that the loss was made payable to plaintiff. It was held that the complaint was good as against a general demurrer.

It was held in Silvers v. Grossman, 183 Cal. 696, at page 702, 192 P. 534, that such a defect is merely one of uncertainty or ambiguity, and can be reached only by special demurrer.

It was held in Panter v. National Surety Co., 36 Cal. App. 44, at pages 46 and 47, 171 P. 803, 804, that:

"Whatever is an essential element of a cause of action must be presented by a distinct averment and cannot be left to an inference to be drawn from the construction of a document attached to the complaint [citing cases]. The converse of this rule must be that, in the absence of a special demurrer for uncertainty, direct and essential allegations in a complaint will not be modified, controlled, or defeated by the recitals of an instrument attached to the complaint" (citing cases).

To the same effect, see Kennard v. Binney, 62 Cal. App. 732, 217 P. 808; and Linz v. McIver & Becker, 29 Cal. App. 470, 156 P. 1000; Estate of Cook, 137 Cal. 184, 69 P. 968.

It was held in Treanor v. Houghton, 103 Cal. 53, 36 P. 1081, that, where there is no objection to the pleadings or the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, which are full and explicit upon all the material issues, all errors and omissions are cured by verdict, and waived, and cannot be urged upon appeal for the first time.

It was held in Doble Co. v. Keystone Consol. Min. Co., 145 Cal. 490, at page 495, 78 P. 1050, 1052, that:

"It is unfair for a party to withhold an objection founded upon a defect which, if pointed out in time, might be remedied, until it is too late to correct the defect, thereby inducing an opponent to rely upon his pleading as sufficient in order that he may have a fatal objection. Such a course is a fraud upon justice and prevents a fair trial. It is therefore not tolerated" (citing cases).

[12] The objections to the notices were waived by failure of appellants to reach the point by special demurrer to the amended complaint, by admitting in their answer the truth of the allegations of the amended complaint in relation to the contents of the notices, and by presenting their objections on appeal for the first time.

The judgment is modified by disallowing and striking out the amount of $192.70 interest, reducing the amount of plaintiff's judgment to $6,000, and the attorney's fees, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In their petition for a rehearing herein, defendants (appellants) Walter J. Lewis and Annie Lewis complain that the opinion of this court is based substantially upon defaults of defendants in the payments of rents, thus leaving room for the operation of section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, giving them five days after judgment within which to pay the unpaid rents and reinstate the lease. Defendants also contend that the findings and judgment of the trial court in terminating the lease for violation of its covenants binding defendants to keep the demised premises in good order and condition, reasonable use excepted, to make no alterations or changes therein without the written consent of the lessors, to keep the premises as fully and well furnished as when leased, to make the necessary restorations and replacements, and to keep it so furnished, constituted prejudicial error.

In regard to those findings, and the facts upon which they were based, this court said: "The findings are supported by substantial evidence." The lease provides that the lessors shall have a first lien on the furnishings to secure the rents and certain other covenants of the lease, and that, "should any of the rents herein provided for be due and unpaid, * * * or should the lessee be in default in any other condition or covenant of this lease, the lessors may at their option and upon ten (10) days' written notice * * * re-enter and take possession of the premises and remove all persons therefrom, * * * and * * * terminate this lease."

The testimony quoted in the briefs of the parties, and reported in the transcript of the evidence, satisfactorily shows that each of the covenants herein mentioned was violated by the defendants, and that each of the findings relating to those matters had substantial support. The notice to terminate the tenancy recited that certain alterations had been made by defendants in the leased premises without the consent of the lessors, that the premises had not been kept as fully and well furnished as at the date of the lease, and other defaults which need not be mentioned here, and demanded that each of the defaults be remedied within 10 days, or the lease would be forfeited and possession of the premises retaken by plaintiff. The three days' notice to quit referred to the ten days' notice, recited the defaults mentioned in that notice, and that none of them had been cured, and demanded that they be cured within three days, or possession be given, or legal proceedings would be instituted for possession.

[13] One who seeks the summary remedy allowed by the statute must bring himself clearly within its terms (Harris v. Bissell, 54 Cal. App. 307, 313, 204 P. 453; Opera House Ass'n v. Bert, 52 Cal. 471; Iburg v. Fitch, 57 Cal. 192); but where, as in this case, the breaches are shown and proper notices of forfeiture given, the court is authorized to grant the relief prayed for (section 1161, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc.; Pfizer v. Candelas, 53 Cal. App. 737, 200 Pac. 839).

[14, 15] The finding of the lower court to the effect that defendants failed to keep the premises in repair, if erroneous, for the reason that the notices made no mention of such default, was not prejudicial to the rights of defendants. The failure of defendants to fulfill the other covenants, not to alter the premises without consent and to keep the premises furnished, are sufficient to sustain the judgment terminating the lease with no right of reinstatement.

Petition for rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. BROCK. (Cr. 1004.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 14, 1928.

Criminal law ⇨ 1133—That testimony showed stolen property taken from another, instead of from defendant as record showed, held not to warrant reversal on rehearing.

Where evidence showed beyond any reasonable doubt that defendant was participant in robbery and properly convicted, fact that certain witness testified that stolen beads were taken from another participating in robbery, instead of from defendant as record originally showed, is not ground for reversal on rehearing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied, and former opinion modified.

For former opinion, see 262 P. 369.

Arthur C. Huston, Jr., and Percy Napton, both of Woodland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Appellant, upon petition for rehearing, calls attention to a stipulation by counsel purporting to correct the official record in this case, certified to by the trial court as being correct. The stipulation of counsel is to the effect, that the witness Grove, called for the prosecution, actually testified that a certain string of pearl beads was taken from the clothing of one of the defendants accused of participation in the Lillard robbery, named Franks, whereas the record certified to by the trial court makes this witness testify that beads were taken off of the person of the defendant Brock, and bases his petition for a rehearing thereon. While this manner of correcting a record does not appear to be provided for in any of the Codes, we will, nevertheless, accept the stipulation as showing the true facts, and for that purpose it is hereby ordered that that portion of the testimony in the opinion which, as filed, reads as follows:

"The pearl beads were taken off the person of the defendant Brock. The testimony in this particular shows that the defendant Brock, who was seriously wounded, was taken to the Woodland Sanitarium, and the testimony as to the pearl beads is as follows: 'Q. Here are some pearl beads; do you know anything about these? A. Yes; those beads were taken off Mr. Brock in the Sanitarium, at the Woodland Sanitarium—out of his pocket,'"

—be corrected to read as follows:

"The pearl beads were taken off of the person of the defendant Franks. The testimony in this particular shows that the defendant Franks, as well as the defendant Brock, were taken to the Woodland Sanitarium, and there the pearl beads were found, the testimony being as follows: 'Q. Here are some pearl beads; do you know anything about these? A. Yes; those were taken off Mr. Franks in the Sanitarium, at the Woodland Sanitarium—out of his pocket.'"

It is also further ordered that that portion of the opinion reading as follows:

"This objection is based upon the erroneous allegation that none of the stolen property was found upon the person of the defendant Brock. The incident of the pearl beads appears to have been entirely forgotten,"

—be corrected as follows:

"This objection is based upon the allegation that none of the stolen property was found upon the person of the defendant Brock; that the evidence which we have referred to shows concerted action and proper to be submitted to the jury, establishing conspiracy, and hence, that the possession of one would be the possession of all, is overlooked."

The ruling of this court in the case of People v. Haack (Cal. App.) 260 P. 913, on an instruction relative to the recent possession of stolen property, is also relied upon by the petitioner herein. A comparison of the instruction condemned in the Haack Case with the instruction given by the court in this case shows that the instructions are readily distinguishable. The syllabus in the Haack Case does not fully show the vice of the instruction referred to, and has probably misled counsel in citing the Haack Case in support of appellant's contentions.

After a careful review of this case, we do not find that the error in the transcript nor the corrections made by stipulation, and here accepted for the purposes of this opinion, affect in any way the substantial rights of the parties to this cause. We think the evidence shows beyond any reasonable doubt whatever that the defendant was one of the participants in the robbery, and that he was properly convicted.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Code, § 2969, notwithstanding evidence son was the legal owner in possession, and that the automobile was registered in his name, in compliance with Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191).

7. Chattel mortgages ☞170(2) — Constable who sold automobile under execution before execution creditor furnished statutory bond held liable to mortgagee for conversion (Civ. Code, § 2969).

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Action by D. T. Winne against J. W. Ford. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Iener W. Nielsen, of Fresno, for appellant.
Ernest Klette, of Fresno, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action in conversion brought by the mortgagee of an automobile against a constable by whom the automobile was levied upon and sold under an execution.

The complaint, among other averments, alleged the execution of the mortgage by the owner of the car, one S. M. Eksoozian, and that the mortgage was unpaid; that the defendant failed to tender or deposit the amount of the mortgage debt; and that no verified statement or bond, as required by section 2969 of the Civil Code, was presented or furnished before the levy and sale. With the exception of the allegations of a failure to tender or deposit the amount of the debt, the above allegations were denied, as were certain allegations of facts which the plaintiff contends should estop the defendant from asserting a want of title in the mortgagor.

The court found for the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered the defendant appeals.

As stated by the latter in his brief, the only grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment are that certain conclusions of the trial court are unsupported, namely, that there was a failure to comply with the provisions of the Code section; that the mortgagor was the owner of the automobile; that the plaintiff acquired a lien thereon; and that the facts alleged and found were sufficient to estop the defendant from asserting want of title in the mortgagor.

The Code section provides for a tender of the mortgage debt and interest or a deposit of the amount with the county clerk or treasurer, payable to the order of the mortgagee before the property is taken by the officer, and it is not claimed that this requirement was met. It further provides that, when an attachment or execution creditor presents to the officer a verified statement that the mortgage is void or invalid for reasons therein specified, and delivers to the officer a good and sufficient indemnity bond in double the value of the mortgaged property, which shall be made both to the officer and the mortgagee, indemnifying each of them for the taking of the property against loss, liability, damages, costs, and counsel fees, then the officer shall take the property, and, in the case of an execution, sell it in the manner provided by law. Further provision is made for exceptions to the sufficiency of the sureties and their justification in the same manner as upon an undertaking on attachment.

[1-3] The execution was issued in an action brought by H. W. Nielsen against the mortgagor, and the sale was made, according to the stipulation of counsel, on March 26, 1923. The court found that no verified statement or bond, as required by the Code section, was presented or furnished before the sale was made. It appears from the testimony that a verified statement and two bonds were presented and furnished to the defendant, each being dated March 7, 1923; but it was testified by the latter that several days elapsed between the dates when the several bonds were furnished, and that the first failed to comply with the requirements of the statute. The bonds were identified by the defendant and introduced in evidence. The first was made to the officer, who alone was indemnified against loss or damage. This bond, however, contained certain recitals and provisions which tended to show that both were furnished after the sale had been made. After reciting a previous demand by the mortgagee for the release of the automobile, the bond further recited that, pursuant to the writ of execution, the automobile had previously been sold to the plaintiff in the action, and provided that the sureties would indemnify the officer against loss or liability by reason of the levy and sale, in the event it should be determined that the lien claimed by the mortgagee was valid. The second bond complied in form with the statute; and, although both bore the same date, the recitals and provisions of the first, together with the testimony of the defendant, which was vague and uncertain as to when the second bond was received, sufficiently supports the finding that no bond which conformed with the statutory requirements was furnished before the sale. The testimony also shows that the automobile was purchased in the year 1920 under a conditional sale contract made by a dealer with one M. Eksoozian, the son of the mortgagor, and until its sale under execution was registered in the name of the latter with the motor vehicle department. It was testified by the son that a part of the purchase price was paid by him, but sufficient appears from his testimony and that of the plaintiff to support the conclusion that the whole consideration was furnished by the mortgagor, for whom the son was acting as agent. Furthermore, it appears from the testimony of the son that the mortgage was executed with his full knowledge and consent, and, according to that of the plaintiff (from which it is apparent that he had no knowledge that the automobile was registered in the name of the son), the mortgagor represented himself to be the owner. It is claimed that, under the provisions of the Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 191) requiring registration, the mortgagor was not the owner of the automobile, and, as a consequence, the mortgage created no lien thereon; and, further, that the mortgage was a transfer within the meaning of the act; and, no notice thereof having been filed, the mortgage was invalid and insufficient for any purpose.

[4, 5] Section 8 of the act required that, upon a transfer of the ownership of any motor vehicle, a notice of such transfer in the form provided should be filed. Subdivision 11 of section 1 of the act provided that the word "owner" as used therein should include any person, firm, association, or corporation having the lawful use or control of the vehicle under a lease or otherwise for a period of ten or more consecutive days; the legal owner being defined by subdivision 11a of the same section as the "owner of the legal title." The act contained no provision requiring notice or a change of registration in the event of the execution of a mortgage upon a motor vehicle, nor was either required until the adoption of the act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 517), which took effect after the execution of the mortgage in question. Section 17 of the latter act defined a legal owner to be "a person who holds the legal title of a vehicle or a mortgage thereon," and requires such persons to comply with its provisions, but this requirement was inapplicable to a mortgage executed before the act took effect. Davis v. Cline, 184 Cal. 548, 195 P. 42. It is the rule, as contended by defendant, that in actions for conversion the plaintiff must prove ownership with the right to possession or actual possession at the time of the alleged conversion (Green v. Burr, 131 Cal. 236, 63 P. 360; Zaro v. Dakan, 76 Cal. 565, 18 P. 680; Moody v. Goodwin, 53 Cal. App. 693, 694, 200 P. 733; Brinkley-Douglas Fruit Co. v. Silman, 33 Cal. App. 643, 166 P. 371); and the transferee of an automobile who fails to show actual possession or a compliance with the requirement of the Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 191) that the automobile be re-registered in the name of the transferee cannot recover in conversion (General Motors Co. v. Dallas, 198 Cal. 365, 245 P. 184).

[6] But in the present case, while it was not shown that the mortgagor at any time had possession, or that, within the provisions of the act of 1919 he was the owner of the automobile, his son nevertheless was in possession, and had complied with the act, and the mortgage was executed with his consent. Neither the defendant nor the judgment creditor of the mortgagor claimed the property as against the son, the legal owner, and, had more than the oral consent of the latter been necessary to confer authority to mortgage the automobile, so long as the transaction was not questioned by the parties thereto, the defendant, who was not in privity with the owner, could not do so; and as to him the mortgage created a valid lien. Ryan v. Tomlinson, 39 Cal. 639; Nelson v. Colton, 36 Cal. App. 69, 171 P. 701; Lackenbach v. Finn, 26 Cal. App. 482, 147 P. 471.

[7] It is our conclusion that the mortgage was a lien upon the property, and that the defendant, by failing to comply with the provisions of section 2969 of the Civil Code, became liable for its conversion. Phillips v. Byers, 189 Cal. 685, 209 P. 557; Sousa v. Lucas, 156 Cal. 460, 105 P. 413; Irwin v. McDowell, 91 Cal. 119, 27 P. 601; Lackenbach v. Finn, supra.

In view of the foregoing, it will be unnecessary to consider the sufficiency of the facts to estop the defendant from questioning the title of the mortgagor.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DEL CORRO. (Cr. 1411.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 19, 1928.

False pretenses $\S$ 49(1)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for feloniously issuing fictitious check with intent to defraud (Pen. Code, $\S$ 476).

In prosecution for violation of Pen. Code, $\S$ 476, by having willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously issued check drawn on bank signed by fictitious person with intent to defraud, evidence held sufficient to support conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward Henderson, Judge.

Gerard Del Corro was convicted of violating Pen. Code, $\S$ 476, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Gerard Del Corro, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Appellant was charged by information with the violation of section 476 of the Penal Code in having willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously issued to one Ada Wether a check drawn on the Bank of Italy in favor of one J. Severo and signed "D. V. Higgins." That the check was issued with intent to defraud. It is charged that in truth and in fact there was and is no such person as D. V. Higgins, which fact appellant knew and that the check was fictitious. The matter came on for trial May 6, 1927, at which time appellant appeared without counsel and insisted upon conducting his own defense. He was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison at Folsom. He has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial. As grounds for reversal it is claimed that the superior court had no jurisdiction over his person or to try the cause or to determine the same. It is also claimed that the trial court misdirected the jury in matters of law, and erred in the decision of various questions relating to the admission and rejection of evidence. Misconduct is also alleged. Appellant has sent us a communication from the place of his incarceration expressing the wish that we dismiss his appeal and affirm the judgment for the reason that he has no funds to employ counsel to represent him. Under these circumstances, we have deemed it our duty to carefully examine the record to ascertain if there is any merit in the appeal.

The evidence discloses that defendant had been in the employ of the Postal Telegraph Company. On February 19, 1927, he called at one of the branch offices of the company and presented the check in question, which he indorsed as J. Severo, and asked that it be cashed. The cashier knew him as an employee of the company, but did not know his true name. The check called for the sum of $175.37 and there were insufficient funds in the office at that time to cover the amount. Upon ascertaining this fact, defendant placed the check in his pocket and left the premises. The following Monday he again appeared and again presented the check for payment. The lady cashier thereupon paid him the amount the check called for. After he had left, the cashier was advised by an assistant that the check was signed by defendant as "J. Severo" and that his true name was Del Corro. The cashier then telephoned to the bank and later presented the check to it and ascertained that it had at no time such account. The cashier then refunded to her company the amount of the check. The prosecution then proved by other witnesses that defendant was the person who presented, indorsed, and cashed the check, and that there was no account in the bank upon which the check was drawn either in the name of Higgins, Del Corro, or Severo. No testimony was offered on behalf of defendant. The record shows that defendant was fairly tried and convicted, and there is nothing therein contained which in any manner supports his contentions. There is no merit in the appeal. The judgment and order are affirmed.

GOOLD v. KISHAN SINGH et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 14, 1928.

1. Quietting title $\S$ 44(3)—Finding that plaintiff vendor, when extending time of payment, had no actual notice of purchaser's contracts for resales, held sustained by evidence.

In vendor's action to quiet title to land sold under contract permitting resale of portions thereof by purchaser and requiring him to account therefor at named price per acre, finding that, at time vendor extended time of payments, he had no actual notice of purchaser's subcontracts for resales, held sustained by evidence.

2. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 215—Recordation of purchaser's resale contracts held not constructive notice to vendor residing in another county where original contract executed (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1213).

That purchaser's subcontracts for resale of portions of land purchased were recorded in county where land was situated was not, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1213, constructive notice of their execution to vendor residing in another county where original land contract was executed.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚡95(2)—Vendor's acceptance of payment after purchaser's default was not waiver of right to forfeit, where at time he was unaware of resale by purchaser.

Where land was sold under contract permitting purchaser to resell portion thereof and requiring him to account to vendor therefor, vendor's right to declare forfeiture was not waived by acceptance of payments of interest after purchaser failed to pay for land resold by him, where, at time of acceptance, vendor was unaware that resale contracts had been made.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚡95(1)—Waiver of right to declare forfeiture for breach may be implied from vendor's act after breach recognizing validity of contract.

Waiver of right to declare forfeiture for breach of condition may be implied from acts of vendor after breach by which continued validity of contract is recognized.

5. Contracts ⚡316(1)—Acts amounting to "waiver" of breach of contract must be done with full knowledge of right to declare forfeiture.

Since "waiver" is an intentional relinquishment of a known right after knowledge of facts, acts alleged to have effect of waiving breach of contract must have been done with full knowledge of right to declare a forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Waiver.]

6. Appeal and error ⚡996—Whether acts of vendor constitute waiver of breach of contract is question for trial court unless but one inference can be drawn from evidence.

Whether there has been waiver by vendor of right to declare a forfeiture of a land contract for purchaser's breach of contract is a fact question to be determined by trial court, unless but one inference can reasonably be drawn from evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Charles O. Goold, also known as C. O. Goold, against Kishan Singh and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Fenston, Williams & Hansen, of Fresno, for appellants.

Peckinpah & Carter, of Fresno, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An appeal by defendants from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff quieting the title to certain real and personal property.

On March 11, 1920, an agreement for the purchase and sale of the property was entered into between the plaintiff and defendant Kishan Singh. The purchase price was $11,500, which defendant agreed to pay in installments, with interest, as follows: $1,000 upon the execution of the agreement, which payment was acknowledged, $1,500 on or before four years after date, and at least

$1,500 each year thereafter until one-half of the purchase price had been paid, whereupon the plaintiff agreed to convey the property to the vendee upon the execution by the latter of a note for the balance secured by a mortgage on the real property. The vendee further agreed to improve at least 20 acres of the land annually during the first four years by planting vines and trees thereon and to cultivate and maintain the same in accordance with the best custom and practice in the locality. He was given the privilege of selling or contracting for the sale of any portion of the land; it being agreed that, if the portion sold be unimproved, the price should net the plaintiff at least $60 per acre, but, if improved, the price should equal the value of the improvements plus the above price for unimproved land, and that all deferred payments under the subcontracts should bear interest, it being further agreed that the purchasers should deal directly with the plaintiff and pay to him the full amounts of the purchase price with interest, and that payments would be applied on the original contract. The agreement contained further provisions respecting the covenants and conditions to be inserted in the subcontracts, and, in addition to a provision that, if the defendant vendee should fail to keep and perform any agreement therein contained, his rights thereunder should terminate and all sums paid be retained by the vendor for the use of the property; it was stipulated that "time is of the very essence of this agreement and every part thereof."

The answers of the defendants alleged an extension by the plaintiff of the time for the payment of an unpaid balance of the second installment of the purchase price to November 1, 1924, that the agreement had been performed according to its terms, and that Pardhan Singh, Baram Singh, and Nama Singh, by contracts with defendant vendee, had each acquired an interest in portions of the real property described in the agreement.

The court found that the premises described had not been improved as provided by the agreement; that none of the subcontracts for the sale of portions of the property were executed in accordance with its provisions; that defendant vendee had failed to account to plaintiff for all moneys received under the subcontracts; that the agreement for an extension of time for the payment of the balance of the second installment of the purchase price was made as alleged, but that the plaintiff had no notice, actual, or constructive, of the execution of the subcontracts mentioned nor of the fact that defendant vendee had failed to account or of his failure to improve the property.

Defendants contend that the findings are unsupported, and, further, that the plaintiff by the acceptance of certain interest payments waived the right to declare a forfeiture of their rights under the agreement.

The testimony sufficiently shows a failure to plant the land to the extent required by the agreement, and that as to material portions of that planted the care which good farming required was omitted. It also shows that, following the initial payment of $1,000, the only amount paid on the principal of the purchase price was $1,350, and, further that defendant vendee received payments aggregating $2,200 on the subcontracts made by him, and that, with the exception of the above payment of $1,350, which appears to have been derived from the sums so received, no part of these sums was paid to the plaintiff.

[1, 2] Defendants also attack the findings that the plaintiff at the time the extension was granted had no notice, actual or constructive, of the execution of the subcontracts, or that the vendee had failed to account for the sums received thereunder. The property is situated in Fresno county, while the agreement was executed in Monterey county, where the plaintiff resided. According to his testimony, he knew of the intention of the vendee to enter into subcontracts, and had heard that persons other than the vendee were in possession of the property, but was not aware that subcontracts had been executed or that payments thereunder had been received by the vendee. This testimony, in view of the circumstances, sufficiently supports the finding of a want of actual notice; and the fact, as shown, that the subcontracts were recorded in Fresno county by the vendees named therein, was not constructive notice to the plaintiff of their execution or contents (Civ. Code, § 1213).

[3] The action was commenced on February 20, 1924, and it appears from the testimony that the plaintiff accepted payments of interest after the defendant vendee had failed to perform in the above particulars, the last payment received being in the fall of 1923; and it is contended that the continued validity of the contract was thereby recognized and the right to declare a forfeiture waived.

[4-6] The right to declare a forfeiture for the breach of a condition may be waived; and a waiver may be implied from the acts of the vendor after a breach by which the continued validity of the contract is recognized. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 P. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 P. 751; Hermosa Beach, etc., Co. v. Law Credit Co., 175 Cal. 493, 166 P. 22. A waiver, however, being the intentional relinquishment of a known right after knowledge of the facts (Wienke v. Rich, 179 Cal. 220, 176 P. 42), the acts alleged to have had that effect must have been done with full knowledge of the right to declare a forfeiture (German-American, etc., Bank v. Gollmer, 155 Cal. 683, 102 P. 932, 24 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1066; Goodwin v. Grosse, 56 Cal. App. 615, 206 P. 138), and whether there has been a waiver is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court (Kerr v. Reed, 187 Cal. 409, 202 P. 142; Cal., etc., Hotel Co. v. Callender, 94 Cal. 120, 126, 29 P. 859, 28 Am. St. Rep. 99), unless but one inference can reasonably be drawn from the evidence (Lompoc Produce, etc. Co. v. Browne, 41 Cal. App. 607, 183 P. 166). In the present case, while payments of interest were accepted after the vendee had failed to perform, the testimony of the plaintiff shows that he was not then apprised of the breaches of the contract, and sustains the conclusion of the trial court that the right to declare a forfeiture was not waived.

There was sufficient evidence to support the findings, and, no error being shown, the judgment is affirmed.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order transferring the place of trial from the county of Sacramento to the city and county of San Francisco. The complaint alleges that the defendants agreed to purchase a certain quantity of beans from the plaintiffs. The title of the action purports to sue the defendants, not only as individuals, but as doing business under the firm name of Richard J. Murphy. The complaint, however, contains no allegation of the defendants conducting business under that name. The affidavits upon which the place of trial was ordered transferred from the county of Sacramento to the city and county of San Francisco show that the defendant Schumacher was at all times a resident of the county of Sacramento, and that the defendant Murphy was at all times a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. The complaint simply alleges that the defendants agreed to purchase a certain quantity of beans. The affidavits submitted to the trial court upon the motion of the defendants set forth the contract relative to the purchase of the beans in question, which contract is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Recleaned Bean Contract.

"Seller (Executed in triplicate) No. ———.

"Clarksburg, Cal., May 29, 1925.

"In consideration of the price herein specified, it is hereby acknowledged by the seller, Heringer Brothers, that he has this day sold, and that A. C. Schumacher has this day bought for account of Richard J. Murphy, San Francisco, Cal., the beans described as follows:

"Per 100 lbs. net weight
"2400 sacks each, of 100 lbs. net, choice recleaned pink beans at $6.00.

"The first beans threshed on the ranch.

"Same to be delivered on or before the ——— day of ———, 1925, in new regulation bean bags of even weight. Weight and beans to be in accordance with standards set by California Bean Dealers' Association of California for the current season. Weight to be guaranteed by seller at time of shipment. Delivery to be made f. o. b. Sacramento, Cal.

"[Signed] Heringer Bros.,

"By S. F. Heringer, Seller.

"For Account of Richard J. Murphy, Buyer, by A. C. Schumacher, Agent as Authorized."

[1] The affidavits submitted on the motion for change of place of trial contained all the preliminary matters required to be set forth in such affidavits, and then further state that the defendant A. C. Schumacher was improperly joined as a defendant, and was made a defendant solely for the purpose of having the action tried in the county of Sacramento, where said Schumacher was a resident, which fact, if determined in favor of the moving parties, as provided for in section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, would entitle the defendant Richard J. Murphy to the order appealed from in this action. While the complaint upon its face apparently states a good cause of action, as against both the defendants as individuals, the law is well settled that, upon a motion to change the place of trial, where the question as to whether a defendant has been joined improperly for the purpose of having the cause tried in a particular county, the court has a right to look behind the complaint, and see if any defendant has been improperly joined for the purpose of retaining the action in the county where the suit is begun. Karst v. Seller, 45 Cal. App. 623, 188 P. 298; Sourbis v. Rhoads, 50 Cal. App. 98, 194 P. 521; Lachman v. Berry Growers' Ass'n, 58 Cal. App. 748, 209 P. 379; McDonald v. California Timber Co., 151 Cal. 159, 90 P. 548.

[2-6] Only one question is really before us for consideration, and that is whether the contract which is in truth and in fact the basis of this action is the contract of Richard J. Murphy or the contract of Richard J. Murphy and A. C. Schumacher. This involves an interpretation of the contract. It will first be observed that the principal, Richard J. Murphy, is disclosed by the person who purports to act as his agent. The only portion of the contract which gives any possible color to the argument that it is the contract of Schumacher, as well as of Murphy, is contained in these words: "And that A. C. Schumacher has this day bought for account of Richard J. Murphy, San Francisco, California." The contract is signed by Richard J. Murphy as buyer, and designates Murphy as the buyer, signed, however, by Schumacher as his agent. In 2 C. J. p. 812, § 486, we find the following:

"Where an agent acts in behalf of a disclosed principal, his acts and contracts, within the scope of his authority, are generally considered as the acts and contracts of the principal, and in the absence of an agreement otherwise, involve no personal liability, on the part of the agent, to a third person, except in an action for tort."

And further, in section 487 of the same work:

"Whether the agent of a disclosed principal binds himself depends upon the intention of the parties, which must be gathered from the facts and circumstances of each particular case. The presumption in such cases is that it was the agent's intention to bind his principal and not to incur a personal liability; and ordinarily the agent will not be personally bound except upon clear and explicit evidence of an intention to substitute or superadd his personal liability for or to that of the principal. * * * But it is the disclosed intention which governs, not any intention hidden in the mind of the agent, and accordingly the agent may render himself personally liable, although this is contrary to his actual intention if he has in fact bound himself according to the terms of the contract," etc.

While the descriptive words in the beginning of the contract referred to the defendant Schumacher as having bought for account of defendant Murphy, the contract in question is not so signed as to import that Schumacher intended to bind himself as a copurchaser with Murphy. No one but Murphy signs the contract as buyer, and, if Murphy is not bound by the contract as buyer, it would seem that there is no signature to the contract binding any one as purchaser of the beans.

The descriptive words which we have referred to in the contract show that the beans were intended for the defendant Murphy, were bought for his account, and this is followed up by the signature of the defendant Murphy to the contract as buyer. In 1 C. J. p. 823, § 106, appears a statement of the rules of law pertaining to this case:

"To exclude the personal liability of the agent, it is not always necessary that the name of the principal shall be signed, with the statement following 'by [the agent],' although this is no doubt the best form. It is sufficient if an intention to bind the principal, however informally expressed, appears upon the face of the instrument. While mere words descriptive personæ do not relieve the signer from liability, it seems that the addition of such words is significant in connection with other facts. Thus, a note stating that it was executed 'for and on behalf of' a mining company binds the company, although signed by an individual, 'Superintendent of Company'; a bill of exchange, headed with the name of the principal and to be charged to that office, binds the principal only, although signed by the agent in his own name, as agent, and a note signed by one individual, 'Pres't. Pac. Peat Coal Co.,' and by another individual, 'Sec. pro tem.,' binds the company. Obviously a note signed first in the name of a company and then by the name of an individual, 'Agent,' binds the company only."

The text from which we have quoted appears to be amply supported by the authorities cited.

[7] In the case of Hobson v. Hassett, 76 Cal. 203, 18 P. 320, 9 Am. St. Rep. 193, where a similar question was being considered, the court quotes from Story on Promissory Notes as follows:

"When, upon the face of the instrument, the agent signs his own name only, without referring to any principal, then he will be held personally bound, although he is known to be or avowedly acts as agent." * * * But if it can, upon the whole instrument, be collected that the true object and intent of it are to bind the principal, and not to bind the agent, courts of justice will adopt that construction of it, however informally it may be expressed."

And it further quotes from Parsons on Notes:

"And 'one who puts his name on negotiable paper will be liable personally, as we have seen, although he acts as agent, unless he says so, and says also who his principal is; that is, unless he uses some expression equivalent, to use Lord Ellenborough's language, to 'I am the mere scribe.'"

[8] In the contract under consideration, the person for whose account the beans are purchased is stated in unequivocal language, or, to express it in a different form, the principal for which the agent is acting is immediately stated, before any of the particulars relating to the merchandise to be bought or the price therefor is stated, and immediately following the terms and conditions of the contract the name of the buyer is signed as the one executing the contract. In support of what we have stated, we may further cite Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 568, 89 Am. Dec. 64; Williams v. Harris, 198 Ill. 501, 64 N. E. 988.

[9] Further citation of authorities seems to us unnecessary. Nor do we think it necessary to take up and consider cases which hold that parol testimony may be introduced to fix liability upon an undisclosed principal, as the wording of the contract with which we have to do in this case shows who the party to be charged is, and he is the buyer of the beans. Such being the case it is also unnecessary to take up, consider and distinguish cases where the wording of the contract leaves it uncertain as to who the party is who is to be charged.

It satisfactorily appearing to us from the record in this case that the place of trial of this action was properly transferred from the county of Sacramento to the city and county of San Francisco, the order of the trial court is affirmed.

JOHNSON v. WEHNER. (Civ. 6004.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 19, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨706(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that driver of automobile colliding with truck at intersection was not contributorily negligent by reason of speed (Vehicle Act, § 113, subd. [b], par. 2).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding of trial court that automobile driver was not guilty of contributory negligence as against contention that he was driving at unlawful speed, under Vehicle Act, § 113, subd. (b), par. 2 (St. 1923, p. 553), where his automobile struck a truck crossing in front of him on an intersecting street.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Conflicting evidence will sustain trial court's finding as to contributory negligence.

Where evidence is conflicting on issue of contributory negligence, it is sufficient to sustain finding of trial court in that regard.

3. Witnesses ⇨389—Admitting testimony to show truck driver's statement respecting collision, which he denied on cross-examination, held not error.

Admission of testimony to show statement of truck driver to another truck driver respecting collision in suit held not error, where truck driver denied, on cross-examination, that he had conversation with such other truck driver on the day in question, or that he ever made such statement to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by William H. Johnson against F. E. Wehner. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Louis V. Crowley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John W. Sullivan and C. C. Cottrell, both of San Jose, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. As the result of a collision between plaintiff's automobile and defendant's truck which was being driven by one Louis Lunford, plaintiff suffered a compound comminuted fracture of the left lower leg, and this action was commenced to recover damages therefor, plaintiff alleging that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligent operation of said truck. Defendant denied the allegations of negligence and charged plaintiff with contributory negligence. The action was tried without a jury, and the trial court found in plaintiff's favor on both contested issues, and thereupon entered judgment accordingly against defendant for the sum of $4,633, from which judgment defendant appeals.

[1] Defendant makes no contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding as to the negligent operation of the truck, but as grounds for reversal urges that the negative finding upon the issue of contributory negligence is unsupported by and contrary to the evidence.

The accident happened at the intersection of Willow and Orchard streets, in the city of San Jose, shortly after 10 o'clock in the morning. Plaintiff was driving easterly along Willow street, and the truck was being driven northerly along Orchard street. Plaintiff testified that when his machine passed the westerly line of Orchard street and he "was approximately in the middle of the street," he observed the truck, which was then about 15 or 20 feet from the corner, traveling between 22 and 25 miles an hour, and that the driver thereof was not observing the traffic on the highway, but seemed to be looking down at his steering wheel. Seeing that if he continued to travel at the rate of speed he was then maintaining the truck would strike him "squarely in the middle," plaintiff immediately applied his brakes, but after doing so, saw that the truck driver was coming ahead without diminishing his speed or diverting his course, and, consequently, in order to avoid being struck, plaintiff first attempted to "parallel" the truck, but instantly realized that by such maneuver the force of the truck would overturn him, so he diverted his course slightly to the south in an effort to pass behind the truck, with the result that the right front wheel of his automobile collided with the left rear wheel of the truck, practically demolishing the front end of his machine, and inflicting upon him the injury above mentioned.

Subdivision 2 (b) of section 113 of the state Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) declares that it shall be lawful to drive a vehicle at a speed not exceeding 15 miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed; and that a driver's view shall be deemed obstructed when at any time during the last 100 feet of his approach to such intersection he does not have a clear and uninterrupted view of such intersection and of the traffic upon all of the highways entering such intersection for a distance of 200 feet from such intersection. Defendant contends that the evidence proves that plaintiff proximately contributed to the collision by violating the foregoing provision of the law. This contention is based mainly upon certain asserted contradictions contained in a typed statement, prepared by an insurance adjuster and signed by plaintiff either on the day of the accident or the day following; also upon the testimony given by the truck driver, the physical facts which defendant claims existed at the time and place of the collision, and certain mathematical demonstrations founded upon defendant's conception of the evidence. On the other hand, however, we are confronted with the positive testimony of plaintiff to the effect that he was not exceeding the statutory speed limit at the time of the accident. With reference thereto he testified that upon reaching a point about 100 feet from the intersection he reduced his speed from 24 to approximately 18 miles an hour, and that when he was 50 feet from the corner he again slowed down so that upon entering the intersection and while traversing the same he was traveling between 13 and 15 miles an hour. The trial court evidently accepted plaintiff's testimony as being true; and on this appeal defendant has failed to demonstrate wherein plaintiff's testimony is inherently improbable, or so wanting in probative force as to warrant this court in declaring as a proposition of law that it is legally insufficient to support the trial court's finding.

[2] It will be seen therefore, that the evidence relied upon by defendant as establishing contributory negligence does no more than raise a conflict, and in that state of the record the trial court's finding upon such issue is controlling on appeal, it having been repeatedly held that the question of contributory negligence becomes a question of law only where the facts are undisputed, and even then only where on the facts reasonable minds can draw but one conclusion with reference thereto. Loftus v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 166 Cal. 464, 137 P. 34; Seller v. Market Street R. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 P. 1006; Noce v. United Railroads, 64 Cal. App. 658, 222 P. 642; Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 232 P. 1010.

The circumstance of plaintiff's automobile running into the truck is readily accounted for by the fact that when the two machines drew near to each other, the truck driver increased his speed in an attempt to pass in front of plaintiff. With reference thereto, the truck driver testified in substance that he saw plaintiff as plaintiff "went for his brakes and wheel"; that he did not stop the truck, although admittedly he could have done so, but went right on his way, as he expressed it, until plaintiff "was on top" of him, and then he stepped on the accelerator to increase his speed.

[3] The automobile driven by plaintiff was a "Studebaker," and over defendant's objection the trial court allowed plaintiff to prove in rebuttal a statement claimed to have been made the day of the accident by Lunford, the driver of defendant's truck, to one Johnson, another truck driver, which was substantially as follows:

"Yes; when you hit a damned Studebaker, hit it hard. * * * I didn't see him, and when I did I stepped on her to get across."

We think the ruling admitting the statement was not erroneous, for the reason that the record shows that on cross-examination Lunford, after having his attention called to the substance of the statement and the time and place and to whom it was made, positively denied having had a conversation with the witness Johnson on that day, or that he ever made such statement.

The appeal in our opinion is without merit, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

CITY INV. CO. v. RACIK et al. (Civ. 5994.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 18, 1928.

Municipal corporations Ⓒ697(4)—Evidence supported findings that portable news stand in front of plaintiff's property constituted public nuisance and that plaintiff suffered special damage.

In suit for injunction, evidence held to support findings that portable news stand in front of plaintiff's property constituted public nuisance, and that plaintiff suffered damage thereby different in kind and degree from that suffered by general public, and that damage was incapable of pecuniary estimation and irreparable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by the City Investment Company against John Racik and another to enjoin the maintenance of a portable news stand. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Sylvester J. McAtee, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. The judgment appealed from gave plaintiff a permanent injunction enjoining defendants from maintaining a portable news stand in front of the plaintiff's property on the west side of Third street, just south of Market street, in San Francisco. The news stand consisted basally of a 4-wheeled wagon, 4 feet wide, 10 feet long, and 6½ feet high. Daily from 9 a. m. to 9 p. m. it remained parked with two wheels in the street and two upon the sidewalk. From the photographs it appears as if one side of the wagon unfolded out over the sidewalk, forming a supplemental platform or shelf which rested on boxes placed on the sidewalk. This extension was covered on top with an awning. The three sides of the extension and the three sides of the wagon proper were walled in with racks which were filled with magazines and newspapers set up for display and sale.

Based upon appropriate pleadings, the court made findings to the effect that the news stand constituted a public nuisance, and that plaintiff had suffered damage thereby different in kind and degree from that suffered by the general public, and that such damage was incapable of pecuniary estimation and irreparable.

Respondent has carefully cited law and precedents for each legal principle involved in such an action and points out that this case is substantially the same as Strong v. Sullivan, 180 Cal. 331, 181 P. 59, 4 A. L. R.

343, but it is unnecessary to consider these legal principles because appellant makes one and only one point on this appeal. Appellant merely contends that there is no evidence to support the court's findings. This argument is based upon a consideration of the oral testimony on the point of what extent and in what manner the news stand obstructed the full use of the street and interfered with the plaintiff's right of ingress and egress and with its right of light, air, and view in the enjoyment of its property. This oral testimony, however, does not fail to show substantial injury to plaintiff's rights. More important and most convincing, however, are the visible and physical facts of the case, which are scarcely in dispute. Three photographic views of the news stand as set up in operation were received in evidence and are a part of this record on appeal. These alone eloquently and fully support the court's findings complained of by appellant.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Original application for a writ of habeas corpus by Lew Smith to secure petitioner's release from custody. Writ granted.

Frank V. Cornish, of Berkeley, for petitioner.

Earl J. Sinclair, City Atty., of Berkeley, and James M. Koford, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Habeas corpus. Petitioner was convicted of violating an ordinance of the city of Berkeley which regulates the laying of shingles on the roofs of buildings. The facts of the case, as agreed upon by stipulation, may be briefly summarized as follows: An ordinance was adopted by the city council of Berkeley immediately after the conflagration in that city in September 17, 1923, known as Ordinance 927, N. S., which prohibited the use of wooden shingles on buildings. On May 6, 1924, the people of such city, upon an initiative petition, adopted Ordinance 995, N. S., which restored the right to use wooden shingles for roofing. This ordinance may not be amended or repealed except by a vote of the people. That portion of the last-mentioned ordinance which is necessary for a discussion of the proceeding reads as follows:

"Sec. 9. All metal flashings used in roof construction shall be properly incorporated with the roofing materials in a workmanlike manner. The supporting members and portion of roofs shall be constructed in accordance with the structural requirements and kinds of materials prescribed by the Building Code of the city of Berkeley for the respective classes of such buildings. The roofs of all buildings shall be sheathed tight before the roofs are laid thereon except that the building inspector may permit open sheathing to be laid not to exceed five inches (5") on centers to receive sixteen-inch (16") wooden shingles, five and one-half inches (5½") on centers to receive eighteen-inch (18") wooden shingles and seven and one-half inches (7½") on centers to receive twenty-four-inch (24") wooden shingles.

"Sec. 10. Whenever any roof or the covering thereon of any building heretofore created in the judgment of the building inspector is or becomes damaged by the elements of fire or otherwise, to the extent of fifty per centum (50%) of the area of the said roof or covering then the said roof or covering shall be reconstructed or replaced with materials of the kinds and in the manner prescribed by this ordinance for the construction and covering of roofs on buildings hereafter erected. Any roof on any addition or enlargement hereafter made to a building shall conform to the provision of this ordinance for buildings hereafter erected.

"Sec. 11. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to violate any of the provisions of this ordinance or to cause, permit or suffer to be violated any of the provisions of this ordinance. Any person, firm or corporation violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punishable by a fine of not more than five hundred (500) dollars or by imprisonment for not more than three

(3) months or by both such fine and imprisonment. Every day during which any violation of this ordinance continues shall be deemed a separate offense and shall be punishable as hereinbefore provided."

Prior to June 1, 1927, petitioner applied to the building inspector for a permit to lay prepared composition roofing on top of the wooden shingles of a frame building which had been erected some twenty years previously, and the permit was refused. Petitioner was, however, granted a permit to repair 50 per cent. of the roof. He proceeded to and did lay the prepared composition roofing over the entire surface of the roof. The material was laid on top of the old wooden shingles, which had been nailed to inch boards six inches in width, with open spaces between them. The composition roofing so laid complied with the requirements of the ordinance in every respect as to quality. Upon the completion of the work, a complaint was sworn to by the deputy building inspector. Petitioner was arrested, tried, and found guilty of a violation of the ordinance and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for a period of fourteen days. This application followed. It is petitioner's claim that he has not violated the ordinance, as its manifest object is to insure a solid base for shingles laid upon roofs of buildings so that such roofs may be safe to walk upon in the event of a fire, and the shingles as so laid by him insure this protection; that this intent is recognized by the building inspector who issues permits to all applicants to lay rigid composition roofing known as Johns Manville asbestos shingles or rigid imitation slate shingles over old shingles without requiring the open spaces between the inch boards on which the old shingles were originally laid to be filled or closed up, but refuses such permits to applicants requesting the privilege of laying the kind of prepared nonrigid composition roofing used by petitioner known as Pabco roofing, which roofing last named, as above mentioned, meets all the requirements of the ordinance as to quality. It is drawn to our attention that the fire hazard is less on buildings repaired in the manner petitioner has performed the work, as is evidenced by the fire insurance rates for frame buildings repaired with prepared composition roofing laid directly on old wooden shingles nailed on inch boards with open spaces between them, the rates under such conditions being 6 per cent. per $1,000 valuation for three years, whereas the rate is 7 per cent. on all frame buildings with wooden shingle roofs which the ordinance permits, whether old or new. It is stipulated that the cost of removing the shingles results in an increased cost of 50 per cent., in consequence of which a large percentage of the inhabitants of the city are affected in making necessary repairs. Under the facts, petitioner contends that the roof laid by him and for which act he was convicted is as good and fireproof as a roof of prepared composition roofing nailed directly to inch boards "sheathed tight" without old shingles under it, and that the laying of such roofs over old shingles is a laying on a surface "sheathed tight" within the meaning of the ordinance, and this is the universal practice in all other locations where composition shingles are used.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that counsel for petitioner is correct in his contention, and that the requirements of section 9 of the ordinance that roofing be "sheathed tight" is satisfied by the laying of the composition shingles on the old shingles nailed to inch boards with open spaces. It is a familiar rule of statutory construction that common words are to be extended to all the objects which, in their usual acceptation they describe or denote, and that technical terms are to be allowed their technical meaning and effect, unless in either case the context indicates that such construction would frustrate the real intention of the lawmaking power. Technical words when relating to a trade, when used in a statute or ordinance, dealing with the subject-matter of such trade, are to be taken in their technical sense, and will be so construed unless the context or other considerations show a contrary intent. The word "sheathing," so far as our investigation has led us, has never been defined by the courts, nor have we been able to find any dictionary on architects and buildings that limits the use of the word exclusively to the plates or boards covering the rafters upon which shingles are nailed. Lexicographers define the term as being a covering, and such covering is not confined to lumber alone, but may include any waterproof material. Among the various definitions we find the following:

"The first covering of boards, or of waterproof material on the outside wall of a frame house or on a timber roof; also the material so used." Webster's Dictionary.

"That which sheathes or covers, or protects, or may be used for that purpose." Century Dictionary.

"Sheathing—in carpentry, a covering or lining to conceal a rough surface, or to cover a timber frame. In general, any material, such as tin, copper, slate, tiles, etc., prepared for application to a structure, as covering." When made with asbestos or "with magnese-calcite, it is used for fireproofing." Sturgis, Dictionary of Architecture and Building.

Cal.Rep. 261-263 P.—61

Under the heading of Sheathing, Roget's International Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, sheathing is referred to as a covering, and when applied to a roof is said to include thatch, tile, or shingles. Under these definitions it seems plain to us that the word "sheathing," both in its general and technical sense, means a mere covering of any material, and that consequently the shingles on a wooden roof are as much "sheathing" as the boards which support them. They are a covering within the meaning of that term. That the boards or plates supporting shingles are "sheathing" to the extent that they in part cover a roof there can be no question, but by the same token so are shingles, for they too constitute a covering. It would have been an easy matter for those responsible for the existence of the ordinance to have defined the character of sheathing that they intended, as is usual when the term is used in building contracts, but they did not see fit to do so, for the ordinance is silent upon the subject. It follows from what we have said that the nonrigid shingles which petitioner placed upon his roof were placed upon a surface or roof that was covered or "sheathed tight" within the meaning of that term as defined by all authorities upon the subject. To hold otherwise would be to give the term employed an interpretation not sanctioned by any authority, at least not any that has come to our attention, and one that would be at variance with both its common and technical acceptance. In so far as the object of the ordinance may be considered as a protection against the fire hazard, such hazard is as much reduced by the manner of the repairs here made as it would be with the shingles removed and the open spaces filled up, and certainly more so than if wooden shingles had been installed on open spaces, which, in particular cases, the ordinance permits. The construction contended for by respondent would impose a useless expense upon the property owners and one no doubt not contemplated by them in the adoption of the measure they initiated. This conclusion renders unnecessary a discussion and determination of the constitutionality of the ordinance as being a valid exercise of the police power.

The writ is granted, and the petitioner discharged.

Error in admitting parol evidence to vary a bill of sale of a business, by attempting to show that the seller retained an interest in the business, held harmless, where the trial court's finding showed that the entire interest had been transferred to buyers.

5. Evidence $\S$ 432—True consideration or want thereof may always be shown by extrinsic evidence for purpose of impeaching contract, though valuable consideration be stated therein (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1962, subd. 2; Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 1614, 1615).

The true consideration or the want of consideration may, because of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1962, subd. 2, and Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 1614, 1615, always be shown by extrinsic evidence for the purpose of impeaching a contract, notwithstanding that the contract states facts to show a valuable consideration.

6. Evidence $\S$ 419(7)—That consideration for bill of sale was defendants' (buyers') promise to pay money due plaintiff held admissible, though not stated in bill.

Where plaintiff sued the buyers of a business to collect the amount of money lent the seller, prior to sale, suit being on the ground of the buyers having agreed to assume the obligations of the seller, evidence that part of the consideration for the bill of sale was defendants' promise to pay the note to plaintiff held admissible, though such fact was not expressly stated in the bill of sale.

7. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 18(3)—Buyers' contract to pay seller's debts on buying business held not within statute of frauds, being an original obligation (Civ. Code, $\S$ 2794).

The promise of the buyer of a business to assume and pay, as part consideration for the transfer, the obligations of the seller, held not within the statute of frauds, being such original obligation as described in Civ. Code, $\S$ 2794, which is not required to be in writing.

8. Evidence $\S$ 222(6)—In suit by third person to enforce buyers' promise to pay seller's debts on buying business, evidence of promise to pay, made subsequent to sale, held admissible as admission of liability.

In suit by a creditor of the seller of a business to enforce the buyers' promise, made in the sale, to pay the seller's obligations as a part of the consideration, evidence of buyers' promise to pay, made subsequent to the sale, held admissible as being an admission of liability on the part of the buyers, even though the action itself could not be based on promises made at such time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by R. F. S. Wurdeman against Reba A. Waller and another, individually and as copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Coast Electric & Machinery Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rush M. Blodgett, of Los Angeles, and W. W. Rennie, of Venice, for appellants.

William F. Adams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendants, Reba A. Waller and W. J. Starr, from a judgment entered against them in the sum of $1,528.89. The facts are briefly these:

Converse Wurdeman, the son of plaintiff, was engaged in the electrical business in Venice, Cal., under the fictitious name of "Coast Electric & Machinery Company." On May 18, 1922, Converse Wurdeman executed and delivered to the Electric Corporation, a corporation of Los Angeles county, a promissory note in the sum of $2,000, payable in installments of $200 per month. The plaintiff Mrs. R. F. S. Wurdeman signed this note as joint maker, without receiving any consideration therefor, for the purpose of enabling her son to obtain credit from the Electric Corporation. Converse Wurdeman was heavily in debt at the time this note was signed, and his financial condition continued to get worse, instead of better, until on or about June 13, 1922, it became apparent to him that he could conduct his business no longer. The defendants were in his employ and had considerable wages due them. A conference was held between Converse Wurdeman and the defendants, wherein it was agreed that Converse Wurdeman should transfer the entire business to the defendants, and they would assume and pay certain indebtedness of Converse Wurdeman. Pursuant to this arrangement, and on June 13, 1922, Converse Wurdeman made, executed, and delivered to defendants a bill of sale for the entire business, including all of the stock of merchandise, consisting of electrical supplies and fixtures of every kind and description, also all the bills receivable, and all interest in any uncompleted contracts, together with the good will of the business, etc.; said bill of sale reciting a consideration of $10. The defendants went into possession of the business when the bill of sale was delivered on June 13, 1922, and have conducted the business ever since.

The disputed question of fact in the case was whether this particular note of $2,000 to the Electric Corporation was included in the indebtedness that the defendants were to assume and pay. Converse Wurdeman testified that, as part of the consideration for the transfer, the defendants agreed to assume and pay the note of $2,000 to the Electric Corporation, and that defendants actually did pay $200 on account of said note on July 7, 1922, and a further sum of $35 on October 19, 1922. Converse Wurdeman further testified that, as part of the consideration for the transfer to defendants, he was to be employed by them at a salary of $35 per week, and that he did actually work for defendants from June 13, 1922, until October 5, 1922. The defendants, and one or two witnesses, on the other hand, testified positively that this note was not included within the accounts they agreed to assume and pay, and that they had made no payments thereon. Plaintiff testified that she was present at a conference in October, 1922, and heard defendants agree to assume and pay the $2,000 note in question. Mr. Riley, the secretary of the Electric Corporation, testified that he was also present at a conference in October, 1922, between Converse Wurdeman, Mrs. Wurdeman, and defendants, and heard defendants agree to assume and pay said note.

The trial court accepted the statements of the plaintiff and her witnesses, and found that the defendants did assume and agree to pay the $2,000 note to the Electric Corporation, and that they had, since making said agreement, actually made two payments thereon, but had refused to pay the balance. In default of payment by defendants, the Electric Corporation demanded payment from plaintiff, and on July 7, 1923, plaintiff paid to the Electric Corporation, in full settlement of said note, the sum of $1,408.50, and said note was assigned to her. Thereafter, and on the 17th day of September, 1923, this action was commenced, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff.

[1, 2] Many contentions are made for a reversal of the judgment. It is strenuously contended by appellants that the findings are not supported by the evidence. As we have already seen, the evidence upon the material issue—that is, whether defendants agreed to assume and pay the note in question—is decidedly conflicting. The law is, of course, well settled that the findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive on appeal, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings. Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 7, 239 P. 332; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111. The court's finding, therefore, that the defendants did assume and agree to pay the $2,000 note to the Electric Corporation, being supported by substantial evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

The appellants next contend that the court erred in permitting Converse Wurdeman, the vendor, to testify that he retained an interest in the things granted by the bill of sale. The testimony complained of, which was admitted over the objection of defendants, is set forth in the bill of exceptions as follows:

"Mr. Wurdeman: Mr. Green (representing defendants) said I should sign this bill of sale, and that Mr. Starr and Mrs. Waller would carry the business on from that date; that I was to remain as manager of the company, with no change in the company; that I would receive from that date one-third of the profits; that if, during the next 60 days, I would absolve them from any liability of theirs satisfactorily that I could take over the entire ownership again; if not, that I would at all times be one-third owner in the profits; that Mrs. Waller and Mr. Starr would run it under my management. * * *

"Q. (by the Court): Then the conversation resulted, amongst other things, that you said you were still to retain an interest in the business? A. Yes, sir. * * *

[3, 4] Appellants contend that this would be varying the terms of the written bill of sale by parol evidence. This contention is undoubtedly true. The legal effect of a written instrument cannot be varied or defeated in whole or in part by parol evidence. Arnold v. Arnold, 137 Cal. 291, 70 P. 23; Hendrick v. Crowley, 31 Cal. 472; Burkett v. Doty, 32 Cal. App. 337, 162 P. 1042; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 P. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Winchester v. Winchester, 175 Cal. 391, 165 P. 965. The answer, however, expressly admits that the business was transferred in June, 1922, by Converse Wurdeman to defendants, and admits that the transfer included all the assets of the business, and that defendants took possession of the entire business upon the consummation of the sale, and have conducted the business ever since. Moreover, the court found that the entire interest in the business was transferred by Converse Wurdeman to the defendants by the bill of sale; therefore the erroneous admission of this evidence was not prejudicial to the rights of defendants.

[5] Appellants also contend that the court erred in admitting oral testimony as to the consideration for the bill of sale. There is no merit in this contention. The rule is well established that the plaintiff was not estopped by the recitals in the bill of sale with respect to its consideration. The true consideration, or the want of consideration, may always be shown by extrinsic evidence for the purpose of impeaching a contract, notwithstanding that it states facts to show a valuable consideration. Section 1962, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.; sections 1614 and 1615, Civ. Code; Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 63 P. 692; Shepard v. Hunt, 43 Cal. App. 630, 185 P. 677; Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 220, 41 P. 1028; National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 7, 130 P. 881; Royer v. Kelly, 174 Cal. 70, 161 P. 1148; Braseltan v. Vokal, 53 Cal. App. 582, 200 P. 670.

[6] It was therefore competent for the plaintiff to show by parol testimony what the consideration for the bill of sale given by Converse Wurdeman to the defendants in fact was; that is to say, to show that the consideration for the bill of sale was the agreement on the part of defendants to pay the $2,000 note to the Electric Corporation, as well as other indebtedness of Converse Wurdeman.

[7] Appellants further contend that the agreement to assume the indebtedness of Converse Wurdeman was within the statute of frauds, and therefore invalid unless in writing. There is no merit in this contention. This principle does not apply to contracts of the character here made; it was not a contract to guarantee or become surety for the obligations of Converse Wurdeman, but was an original obligation on the part of defendants to pay the debts of Converse Wurdeman direct to the Electric Corporation, and it was based upon a sufficient consideration—that is, the transfer to defendants by Converse Wurdeman of the entire electrical business. It comes within the description of such original obligations as are set forth in section 2794, Civil Code, and need not be in writing. Garroway v. Jennings, 189 Cal. 98, 207 P. 554; Fuller v. Towne, 184 Cal. 89-96, 193 P. 88; Tevis v. Savage, 130 Cal. 411, 62 P. 611; Meyer v. Parsons, 129 Cal. 656, 62 P. 216; Sacramento Lumber Co. v. Wagner, 67 Cal. 293, 7 P. 705; Doe v. Allen, 1 Cal. App. 560, 82 P. 568; Montgomery v. Dorn, 25 Cal. App. 671, 145 P. 148. In Montgomery v. Dorn, supra, the court, quoting from 20 Cyc., page 174, said:

"The promise of a transferee of property, made in consideration of the transfer, to assume and discharge an indebtedness of the transferor to a third person, is obligatory on him although resting in parol."

[8] Appellants further contend that the court erred in admitting evidence of promises to pay the note in question, made in October, 1922. This contention is based upon the fact that the bill of sale and transfer were made in June, some four months before these promises were made, and that any promise made after the transfer would be within the statute of frauds and invalid unless in writing. This action could not, of course, be based upon promises made in October, 1922; nevertheless, this evidence was properly admitted for the purpose of showing an admission of liability on the part of appellants.

This case in its last analysis is simply one where the evidence was decidedly conflicting upon the vital point in the case, and, the court having resolved that conflict in favor of the plaintiff, we are powerless to interfere.

We think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

PEOPLE v. TAYLOR. (Cr. 1586.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 20, 1928.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 345, 351(1)—Defendant's entire conduct before and after particular act involved may be considered to determine his intent (Pen. Code, $\S$ 21).

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 21, in interpreting defendant's actions for purpose of determining his intent, it is proper and often necessary to consider his entire conduct before and after the particular act which is the subject of scrutiny.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 564(1)—Evidence held to warrant finding that venue of offense of child stealing occurred in county of parents' residence and where laid (Pen. Code, $\S$ 278).

Evidence held to warrant finding that offense of child stealing, in violation of Pen. Code, $\S$ 278, by enticing from their parents two girls between the ages of 14 and 15 years and detaining them about four weeks occurred in the county where girls' parents resided and in which venue was laid.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Shelley J. Higgins, Judge.

Elmer Taylor was convicted of child stealing, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Kelly and Nicholas J. Martin, both of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Defendant was charged by an information, filed by the district attorney of San Diego county, in two counts, with the crime of child stealing. The first count charged the theft of a girl by the name of Ellen Tibbets, and the second charged the stealing of a girl by the name of Claudine Chriswell. Both girls were between 14 and 15 years of age at the time that the alleged offense was committed.

The crime which defendant stands convicted of is defined in section 278 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

"Every person who maliciously, forcibly, or fraudulently takes or entices away any minor child with intent to detain and conceal such child from its parent, guardian, or other person having the lawful charge of such child, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding twenty years."

Three grounds are urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment of conviction: (a) That the venue was not established; (b) that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment of conviction; and (c) that the court misdirected the jury in matters of law.

[1] According to the testimony of the two girls, the story of the events leading up to the alleged stealing and what followed until the arrest of all three in New Mexico may be briefly related as follows:

On March 16, 1925, which is the date that the offenses are alleged to have been committed, and for some months prior thereto, both girls were attending school and residing in their respective homes with their parents in the city of Oceanside, San Diego county, Cal. Several weeks previous to the date of the alleged stealing, the defendant made the acquaintance of the girls by picking them up on the street on their way home from school, and taking them for a ride in his automobile. Between that time and March 16th he had taken the girls on several rides. On the afternoon of March 15th the defendant met the girls on their way home from school and took them for a ride. On this occasion he proposed to them that they all drive to Long Beach, where a carnival was being held. The girls refused the invitation, giving as a reason that it was necessary for them to be at home that afternoon at 4 o'clock. Again on the following day defendant picked up the girls on their way home from school and again suggested to them that they drive up to Long Beach and attend the carnival. This time the girls consented to the proposal, and it was agreed that they would meet later in the evening and start out on the trip. Some time between 8 and 9 o'clock that evening, the Chriswell girl met the defendant on one of the main streets of Oceanside, and the two drove up and got the Tibbets girl at or near her home. They arrived in Long Beach late that night. They spent the night in the automobile, the girls sleeping on the back seat and the defendant on the front seat. Just where the automobile was parked does not appear in the evidence, but it was somewhere in the city of Long Beach.

The following morning the defendant proposed to the Chriswell girl that they get married. After some discussion the girl assented to the suggestion, but requested that they return to Oceanside in order that she might get other clothes, as she had with her only the clothes she was wearing. Defendant objected to this suggestion and promised to purchase the necessary clothing for the girl. When the subject of marriage was further discussed defendant stated that they would have to go farther on for the marriage, as he did not consider it advisable to be married in Long Beach. The Chriswell girl demurred to the plan to go farther alone with the defendant, and so it was arranged that the Tibbets girl would accompany them. Again the question of extra clothing for the girls was raised by them, and the defendant met their proposal to return to Oceanside in order to secure the necessary clothing with the promise to provide clothing for both girls. Thereupon they left Long Beach for Yuma, Ariz. It may be observed at this point that the party did not attend the carnival at Long Beach, nor does it appear that any attempt was made to go to the carnival, nor was any explanation made for not attending the carnival.

They arrived at Yuma the following evening, and again spent the night in the automobile, the girls sleeping in the back seat, and the defendant on the floor of the car. The next day they pushed on to Phoenix, Ariz., where they spent the night, the girls again sleeping in the car with the defendant. In due time they reached Lordsburgh, N. M., where the defendant had friends, in whose home they spent two nights, the girls and the defendant sleeping in the same room on the floor. They then drove on to Portales, N. M., where they remained for some weeks and where they were eventually apprehended. At Portales, they stayed in a rooming house, the two girls and the defendant occupying the same room. In accordance with the suggestion of the defendant, the Chriswell girl went under the name of Mrs. Taylor, and posed as the wife of the defendant, while the Tibbets girl went under the name of Ellen Cloudman, and posed as the defendant's sister-in-law. The Tibbets girl testified that while staying at Lordsburgh the defendant had intercourse with her, and the Chriswell girl testified that in the rooming house at Portales the defendant had intercourse with her; that in Portales the defendant and the Chriswell girl lived and cohabited as husband and wife. On several occasions during the trip from Long Beach to Portales the Chriswell girl raised the question of their getting married, but the defendant stated that they would have to put it off as he did not have sufficient money. After spending some days at Portales, the girls, having as yet received no additional clothing and being without any money, decided that they would try to return home and started out to walk, going down the railroad track. The defendant overtook them and induced them to return, promising that he would get work and would soon have money and secure clothing for them. The girls returned with him and continued to live in the rooming house at Portales until all were arrested.

On one or two occasions while the girls were in Arizona and in New Mexico, one or both of them suggested writing back to their parents to let them know where they were, but the defendant advised against this course, and in deference to his wishes they did not write.

The parents of both of the girls testified that they never heard from the girls during their absence until they were apprehended by officers; that they had no knowledge or intimation that the girls were going to leave home, nor had they any knowledge of the girls' whereabouts until their apprehension in Portales. The girls were away from home about four weeks and left home without the consent of their parents.

Defendant's story of the affair differs in certain respects from that of the girls. He denied that he invited the girls to go with him to Long Beach, but asserted that the Chriswell girl, learning that he was going to Long Beach to visit members of his family, requested that he take her on the trip; that he demurred to the suggestion, because of a fear of criticism that he might be subjected to, and that she overcame his reluctance to take her by promising to get her girl chum, Ellen Tibbets, to accompany them; that the Chriswell girl invited the Tibbets girl to make the trip with them; that he took the girls to Long Beach at their request, with the expectation of returning that night or the following morning to Oceanside. He further asserts that he never asked the Chriswell girl to marry him, nor did he promise to marry her; that she requested him to marry her in order to aid her out of a difficult position, in that she was pregnant and wished to cover up her indiscretion by having her child born in wedlock. Defendant further denied that it was his suggestion that they go on from Long Beach to Arizona and New Mexico, and insisted that this was a plan proposed by the girls, who represented to him that they were unhappy at home and desired to get East to some relatives of the Tibbets girl. He asserted that while the Chriswell girl was driving the car in Long Beach, she asked as to where a certain road led to, and when defendant replied, "Yuma, Ariz.," she drove the car out that road and thus they started for Arizona; that on several occasions on the trip when the Chriswell girl asked him if he would marry her, he replied that he would not. The defendant further denied that he had any sexual relation with the Tibbets girl, but admitted such a relation with the Chriswell girl. On other points, defendant's testimony conflicted with that of the girls, but we do not deem it of sufficient importance to dwell further in detail upon his testimony.

Appellant urges that taking the girls' own testimony, that is, as to the circumstances of leaving Oceanside, there is nothing in the record to support the charge of child stealing as defined in section 278 of the Penal Code; that, according to the girls' own admissions, it was their intention to return to Oceanside when they left Long Beach; that at most the trip from Oceanside to Long Beach was a joy ride to visit a carnival, with the expectation of returning that night or the next day.

Appellant further urges that, if there is any evidence in the record that is at all susceptible to the inference that defendant was taking or enticing the girls away with the intent to detain and steal them from their parents, it is that evidence which relates to the events in Long Beach on the morning following their arrival there; in other words, if there is any evidence in the record that can possibly sustain the charge, it was what happened or was done at Long Beach in Los Angeles county, and not in San Diego county.

The offense with which the appellant was charged involves: (a) The taking or enticing away of a minor child; (b) a malicious intent, or the use of fraud or force in the taking; (c) an intent to detain and conceal the child from its parents. If there is evidence in the record which directly proves these requisite elements, or evidence that would reasonably justify the inference that the necessary facts and conditions existed, then the judgment must be sustained.

[2] The testimony of the girls furnishes abundant evidence to support the finding that defendant not only took the girls away, but that he also enticed them away. Conceding that when they left Oceanside it was the intention and expectation of the girls to go only to Long Beach and return on the following day to Oceanside, this would not determine what was in the mind and purpose of the defendant. In the light of the undisputed fact that when the party arrived at Long Beach they did not visit the carnival, nor was any attempt made by the defendant to attend the carnival, or give an excuse for not doing so, the jury might very well have concluded that the representation of defendant that a carnival was in progress in Long Beach, and a repeated invitation to the girls to go with him to see it, was simply a method of enticing the girls to go away with him. In interpreting one's actions for the purpose of determining the intent, it is quite proper, and indeed often necessary, to consider the entire conduct of the individual before and after the particular act which is the subject of scrutiny. "The intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused. * * *" Section 21, Pen. Code.

Considering further the conduct of the defendant toward the girls and subsequent events after leaving Long Beach, the inference that defendant took and enticed the girls away from home for the unholy purpose which became manifest when they reached Arizona and New Mexico becomes almost irresistible.

Appellant's contention that the utmost in the way of misconduct on the part of the defendant that may be reasonably inferred from the evidence, and particularly from the testimony of the girls as to the trip from Oceanside to Long Beach, is that he intended to and did take the girls for a joy ride to Long Beach to attend the carnival, with the intention of returning that night or the following day. Such might well have been the conclusion of the jury had the defendant returned the girls to their homes as planned, or if, as urged by appellant, the girls insisted on remaining away from their homes and going East to relatives, he had returned to his work in Oceanside. Unfortunately for his contention, his subsequent conduct after arriving at Long Beach nullifies the favorable aspect of his earlier actions.

Added support is given the theory of the prosecution, that the twice accorded invitation to the girls to accompany him on a trip to see the carnival at Long Beach shows a preconceived plan on the part of appellant to induce the girls to leave home with him, in the testimony of one Ed Hall, a watchman at Oceanside, who related a conversation had with appellant just prior to March 16th, wherein the appellant, in reply to a comment about having his automobile newly painted, stated that he expected to go away on a trip to be gone for a while. The testimony of the appellant is so full of inconsistent statements and explanations that do not explain as to give added support to the findings of the jury.

Appellant in his brief quotes at length from the case of People v. Black, 147 Cal. 426, 81 P. 1099, which he asserts involve facts similar to those in the instant case. A reading of that case discloses a marked difference in certain essential matters from the facts in the instant case. To point out in detail the differentiation would only serve to extend this opinion to unnecessary length.

[3] Other considerations are readily suggested from a review of the evidence that may well have entered into the conclusion of the jury that all of the necessary elements of the offense were present when the defendant drove away with the girls from Oceanside. We are satisfied that there is abundant evidence in the record to support the judgment of conviction and also the finding that the offense was committed in San Diego county.

Involved in the last point urged by appellant are two instructions, one given by the court and the other requested by appellant, but refused. We have examined both instructions and are satisfied that no prejudicial error was committed by the court in giving the one and refusing the other.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BARRETT v. GORE et al. (Civ. 3392.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 17, 1928.

1. Trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 165—Motion for nonsuit should be denied, where evidence, given every favorable presumption for plaintiff, indicates plaintiff has proved cause of action or where doubt arises.

Upon motion for nonsuit, evidence must be construed most strongly against defendant, and every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from evidence should be construed in favor of plaintiff, and, if evidence thus construed indicates plaintiff has proved cause of action, or even where trial judge is in doubt and evidence is susceptible of different constructions, plaintiff should be given benefit of doubt and motion for dismissal denied.

2. Licenses $\Leftrightarrow$ 39—Evidence as against motion for nonsuit held to constitute substantial proof of purchase of unit in oil enterprise issued in violation of statute (Corporate Securities Act, §§ 3, 12).

In action by buyer of unit in oil-developing enterprise to recover money under Corporate Securities Act, §§ 3, 12 (St. 1917, pp. 673, 679), providing that sale of securities issued without permit is void, on motion for nonsuit, evidence held to constitute substantial proof that buyer had purchased security which was void.

3. Licenses $\Leftrightarrow$ 18½—Association operating oil-developing enterprise under trust by terms of which capital was divided into units held to be "company," within Securities Act (Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 3).

An association of individuals operating oil-developing enterprise under declarations of trust, by terms of which capital contributed by them to common enterprise was divided into units or interests, held within definition of "company" as defined by Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 3 (St. 1917, p. 673).

4. Licenses $\Leftrightarrow$ 18½—Unit in association operating oil enterprise under trust held to constitute "security," within meaning of statute (Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 6a).

Where association of individuals operating under declaration of trust, by terms of which capital contributed by them to common enterprise was divided into units, held, that such units constitute "securities," within meaning of Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 6a (St. 1917, p. 674).

5. Licenses $\Leftrightarrow$ 39—Money paid for unit in association operating oil enterprise under trust sold without sanction of corporation commissioner held recoverable in assumpsit (Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 6a, and § 12).

Where association of individuals operating oil-developing enterprise under trust deed, by terms of which capital contributed by them was divided into units, held, that money paid by purchaser of unit in such company, sale of which was not sanctioned by corporation commissioner, could be recovered in an action in assumpsit for money had and received, since sale was void under Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 6a, and section 12 (St. 1917, pp. 674, 679).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by C. A. Barrett against M. Gore and others to recover money paid for an individual interest in an oil-developing enterprise. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Thos. L. Clay and Mark F. Jones, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. T. Lucey, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit which was granted in an action in assumpsit. The suit was brought to recover money paid for an undivided interest in an oil-developing enterprise, which unit the respondent Rosenberg sold and transferred to appellant in violation of the Blue Sky Law.

The defendants A. L. Gore, M. Gore, Adolph Ramish, and Barnett Rosenberg were the owners of equal undivided interests in a lease of oil lands at Long Beach, Cal., and an oil-developing enterprise called the Lyceum Oil Syndicate. M. Gore held these property interests as trustee for the said owners. The organization was first considered a copartnership. The defendant Rosenberg testified as follows:

"Q. Just what was said [to Mr. Barrett]? A. I told him it was only four partners, * * * and each one of us has got 15 per cent.—and they are actually four partners in these properties, but I have got another silent partner. * * *

"Q. You told him it was a partnership? A. I told him it was a partnership. * * *

"Q. What did you say? A. We were four partners and we got a trust agreement between Mr. Ramish, Mr. Gore, and myself."

Mr. Hutton, attorney for defendants, also testified:

"Q. November 25, 1922, and for three or four months prior to that date you were acting as attorney for what is known as the Lyceum Oil Syndicate? A. Yes.

"Q. Who were the members of that? A. M. Gore, Adolph Ramish, A. L. Gore, and Barnett Rosenberg.

"Q. Do you know whether on or before that time the title to the property was held in trust? A. Yes, sir [it was].

"Q. By whom? A. M. Gore. * * * Prior to November 25th, the interest of the several parties were equal, namely, Mr. Rosenberg; * * * from the record that I have, appeared to have 25 per cent.; M. Ramish 25 per cent., and each one of the Gore boys 25 per cent."

November 29, 1922, these defendants formally executed and recorded an elaborate declaration of trust empowering them to hold and operate said properties for the purpose of sinking oil wells, developing and marketing the products thereof. It was provided that the trust estate should consist of 100 equal interests of the par value of $3,000 per unit. Gore Bros., Inc., were declared to own 29 units; J. C. Gore, one-half of 1 unit; Israel Gore, one-half of 1 unit; Adolph Ramish, 15 units; Barnett Rosenberg, 15 units; York & Sullivan, 10 units; and the remaining 30 units were set apart to defray costs of operation and to pay royalties. The form of certificate for shares to be issued to the unitholders was specified. The trustees named were authorized to sink wells, develop and market oil products, and declare and pay dividends. The trust was to continue until 1932. Operations were commenced, and a well was sunk to a depth of about 5,000 feet, and on May 15, 1923, it was abandoned as a "duster," or dry hole.

September 29, 1922, in consideration of the sum of $2,000, the respondent Rosenberg sold and conveyed to appellant's assignor, George L. Symons, an undivided 1 per cent. of all products derived from the properties of said oil syndicate. This transfer was made "subject to all the terms * * * of that certain lease * * * assigned under date of September 5, 1922, to the Lyceum Oil Syndicate, and also subject to the trust agreement heretofore entered into by the undersigned with M. Gore, trustee. * * *" November 25, 1922, in consideration of the sum of $2,850 a similar 1 per cent. unit of interest in the products of said syndicate was sold and conveyed to appellant by Rosenberg by an assignment couched in the same terms above specified. March 6, 1923, the respondent M. Gore wrote a letter to appellant requesting him to execute an inclosed form of reconveyance of said unit of interest to the syndicate, explaining that:

"Under the terms of the agreement, Mr. Rosenberg cannot, as an individual, assign any interest in the Lyceum Oil Syndicate, * * * [as said] certificate [is] not presumed to be a document other than a usual stock certificate. * * *"

A postscript was added to this letter explaining the reason why Rosenberg had failed, in the first instance, to issue to appellant the usual prescribed form of certificate of the Lyceum Oil Syndicate. He said:

"The error was not made on the part of Mr. Rosenberg, but was originally an error on the part of our attorney, who imagined * * * Mr. Rosenberg could execute such an assignment."

Appellant promptly executed and returned the requested reconveyance, whereupon the Lyceum Oil Syndicate, on the same date last mentioned, issued and delivered to appellant its certificate in lieu of the former assignment, for an undivided 1 per cent. unit of interest in the products of the Lyceum Oil Syndicate. This certificate was signed by M. Gore, president, and B. Rosenberg, secretary of the syndicate, and was in the following form:

"Certificate.

"No. 10. Lyceum Oil Syndicate One Unit.

"Los Angeles, California. Capital, $300,000.

"This is to certify that Claud A. Barrett is the owner of 1 unit, fully paid and nonassessable, for the par value of $3,000 each, of the beneficial interest in the Lyceum Oil Syndicate, a business trust, transferable only on the books of the company by the owner thereof in person or by duly authorized attorney upon surrender of this certificate properly indorsed. This certificate is held subject to an agreement and declaration of trust dated November 29, 1922, and which is recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, Cal., in Book 1775, at page 85. * * *

"Said declaration of trust provides: Trustees shall at their discretion declare dividends when revenues from production of said wells shall justify, and such dividends shall be paid to the unitholders in proportion to the respective number of units owned by each as shown by the books of the trustees. And no unitholder shall ever be personally liable for any debt, covenant, demand, contract, or tort of any kind of this company.

"Witness the signature of the trustees of said company this 6th day of March, 1923.

"Lyceum Oil Syndicate, by M. Gore, Pres.

Attest: B. Rosenberg, Sec'y."

[1] Upon a motion for nonsuit, the evidence must be construed most strongly against the defendant. Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence should be construed in favor of the plaintiff. If the evidence thus construed indicates that the plaintiff has proved a cause of action, or even where the trial judge is in doubt, and the evidence is susceptible of different constructions, the plaintiff should be given the benefit of the doubt and the motion for dismissal should be denied. 9 Cal. Jur. 551, § 35.

[2] It will be observed that the units of interest involved in this action were conveyed by assignment prior to the actual execution of the final declaration of trust under which the syndicate continued its operations. But these assignments were made while the properties were being held in trust by the respondent M. Gore for the same oil-mining purposes, and for the benefit of the same unitholders who then owned equal undivided interests. The organization was known by the same name of Lyceum Oil Syndicate, and the owners were actually engaged in sinking a well on their Long Beach property. They considered this temporary organization a copartnership, and contemplated an immediate consummation of a formal voluntary trust. Within a month of the first sale to Symons, and within four days from the sale to appellant, the organization was merged into the voluntary trust association by the execution and recording of a formal declaration of trust. In every respect the former trust served the same purpose and imposed the same obligations required under the latter trust. The respondent Rosenberg held no individual negotiable shares, but possessed merely an undivided interest in the entire enterprise, whether it be termed a copartnership, association, trust, or company. The two units in question were evidently sold to participate in the profits of the oil-mining enterprise. The specific share sold to appellant was so recognized and ratified as the act of the syndicate by the subsequent request for reconveyance, and by the formal issuing of a syndicate certificate over the signatures of the president and secretary thereof. This furnishes substantial evidence of a sale to appellant by the Lyceum Oil Syndicate of securities of an interest in its enterprise, which under the Corporate Securities Act was illegal and void, in the absence of a permit for such sale by the corporation commissioner.

It was stipulated that said Lyceum Oil Syndicate at no time held a permit from the corporation commissioner of California to sell or convey units, shares or interests in its enterprise. It necessarily follows that these sales were illegal and void. Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14; Wallace v. Zinman (Cal. Sup.) 254 P. 946.

The Corporate Securities Act, as enacted in the statutes of 1917 at page 673, and subsequent amendments thereto, provides:

"No company shall sell * * * or offer for sale * * * any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do." Section 3. "Every security issued by any company, without a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void. * * *" Section 12.

It is not material, whether at the time of the sale the vendor's organization constituted a partnership, voluntary trust, or association. All alike are prohibited from selling such securities without the written permission of the corporation commissioner. "The word 'company' includes all * * * private corporations, associations, joint-stock companies, and partnerships, of every kind, and also trustees, as hereinafter defined." Section 2, subd. 3. "The word 'trust' * * * includes all voluntary trusts * * * expressly created by or declared in an instrument in writing. * * *" Section 2, subd. 4. "The word 'security' includes: (a) All shares or other interests or rights into which the capital, capital stock, or property of companies, or rights of stockholders or members thereof are divided. * * *" Section 2, subd. 6a. "A 'sale,' within the meaning of this act, includes every contract by which, for a pecuniary consideration, called a price, one transfers to another an interest in property. * * *" Section 2, subd. 7.

[3, 4] An association of individuals operating under a declaration of trust, by the terms of which the capital contributed by them to a common enterprise is divided into units or interests, clearly comes within the definition of a "company" as it is defined by the Corporate Securities Act of California, and the sale of such units or interests, without a permit from the corporation commissioner, is strictly prohibited. In re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593; Agnew v. Daugherty, 189 Cal. 446, 209 P. 34; Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, 255 P. 225. Certificates of interests to be sold by the owner of a lease and option to purchase certain mining property, which lease and option had been conveyed by him to trustees under a trust empowering them to receive all payments for such interests and to hold the same as a trust fund for the holders of such certificates, was held in the case of Agnew v. Daugherty, supra, to constitute "securities," within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act.

[5] Money paid by a purchaser of units or shares in any company, under such void sale, may be recovered in an action in assumpsit, as for money had and received. Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14; Landwehr v. Lingenfelder (Mo. App.) 249 S. W. 723, 727.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed.

GARTLER et al. v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF SAN PEDRO. (Civ. 4568.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 19, 1928.

1. Parties ⇐14—Only persons having legal or property interest may, under statute, be joined as plaintiffs (Code Civ. Proc. § 378).

It is only persons having a legal or property interest that may, under Code Civ. Proc. § 378, be joined as plaintiffs.

2. Parties ⇐14—There can be no joinder of plaintiffs, where recovery of one would be inconsistent with recovery of the other (Code Civ. Proc. § 378).

While plaintiffs may be joined under Code Civ. Proc. § 378, where action would afford relief to each of them, even where relief would not be exactly the same, there can be no joinder of plaintiffs, where recovery of one would be inconsistent with recovery of the other.

3. Banks and banking ⇐221—Complaint by purchaser and payee of draft, showing that plaintiffs had no common interest in judgment prayed for, was demurrable for misjoinder of parties.

Where draft was purchased of defendant bank calling for payment on a Roumanian bank, and payment was refused, complaint by purchaser and payee of draft against bank to recover money paid therefor, showing on its face that interests of purchaser were different from those of payee, was demurrable on ground of misjoinder of parties.

4. Appeal and error ⚡1036(2)—Judgment will not be reversed for misjoinder of plaintiffs, if no impairment of substantial rights results.

A judgment will not be reversed because of misjoinder of plaintiffs, if no impairment of substantial rights results.

5. Banks and banking ⚡226—In action against bank on draft by purchaser and payee, complaint, not alleging purchaser's ownership or assignment to payee, or presentation and protest, as required by statute, held demurrable (Civ. Code, §§ 3199, 3233-3241).

Complaint by purchaser of draft calling for payment on Roumanian bank, joined in by payee of draft, which did not allege that purchaser owned and possessed draft, nor that it was assigned to payee, who presented it for payment, which was refused, and draft was protested as required of a foreign bill of exchange, under Civ. Code, §§ 3199, 3207, 3233-3241, held demurrable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran and Charles S. Burnell, Judges.

Action by George Gartler and another against the First National Bank of San Pedro. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goodspeed & Pendell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. On August 23, 1919, George Gartler, one of the plaintiffs, paid $501.50 to defendant bank at San Pedro for a draft in favor of H. Gartler, the other plaintiff, calling for 6,250 lei, Roumanian money, from the "Banca Moldova" in the city of Jasi, Roumania. The draft was presented to the drawee bank on September 15, November 8, and December 15, and 19, 1919, but each time payment was refused. Later, H. Gartler, the payee, having meanwhile removed to San Pedro, together with George Gartler, the purchaser of the draft, brought suit against defendant bank for $501.50 as damages, with legal interest and costs, alleging that, since presentation, 6,250 lei "have become of little or no value in dollars." Defendant submitted a demurrer upon the ground that no cause of action had been stated. Defendant also demurred for uncertainty on many grounds, among them the following: That it cannot be ascertained from the complaint whether or not protest had been made after presentation of the draft; why payment was refused; what act or omission is chargeable to defendants; whether plaintiffs are suing for rescission or for damages from breach of contract, or what date value of the lei is to be taken in estimating damages; and upon the further ground that the complaint is ambiguous and unintelligible in all of the particulars set out in the demurrer as to uncertainty, including those hereinabove specified. A special demurrer was likewise interposed upon the misjoinder of the parties plaintiff. The demurrers were overruled, and defendant answered, putting practically all of the allegations of the complaint in issue: That the draft was a foreign bill of exchange; that defendant did everything legally required of it; and that Banca Moldova was at all times ready, willing, and able to honor said draft upon proper identification of the payee. The trial court found generally in favor of plaintiffs and against defendant, and judgment was entered according to plaintiffs' prayer. The case was appealed by defendant, and is here on a bill of exceptions.

[1-3] We think that both the special and general demurrers should have been sustained. "All persons having an interest in the subject of the action, and in obtaining the relief demanded, may be joined as plaintiffs, except when otherwise provided in this title." Section 378, Code Civ. Proc. This, of course, means a legal or property interest. Toomey v. Knobloch, 8 Cal. App. 585, 97 P. 529. Plaintiffs may be joined where the action would afford relief to each of them, even where the relief would not be exactly the same, but we know of no case holding proper a joinder of plaintiffs where the recovery of one would be inconsistent with the recovery of another. The purchaser of a draft generally has a very different interest in its payment than the payee, and there is no allegation in the complaint in the instant case showing any common interest in the judgment prayed for. They cannot join in one action so as to secure a judgment against the bank "going or coming." There is no allegation in the complaint that George Gartler (purchaser) has suffered in any way other than by the deprivation of the $501.50 from date of purchase of the draft to the date of suit, and this, of course, would be legally compensated by legal interest, which is the prayer and the judgment. This could hardly be on any other basis than money had and received, or rescission, since the thing he required done has not been done. He accepts this as a fact, that the contract has failed, and asks for his money back. Upon any theory of this kind surely H. Gartler (payee) has no interest as a co-plaintiff. If any basis for a judgment against the bank (drawer) can be found in favor of H. Gartler, it must be because he has removed to the drawer's situs, and, not having received the money called for by the draft, seeks to enforce the contract and get it directly from the drawer. Such a judgment would be of no legal interest to George Gartler, but would be upon a basis of enforcing the contract exactly opposite to the basis of any judgment George Gartler could possibly have. It follows that the demurrer upon the ground of misjoinder should have been sustained.

[4, 5] However, if "no impairment of substantial rights" results, a judgment will not be reversed on this ground. Daly v. Rud-dell, 137 Cal. 674, 70 P. 784. Let us see, then, if the judgment can possibly be sustained. The draft was a negotiable instrument drawn upon another and placed out of the purchaser's hands and control. Before the purchaser, George Gartler, could recover the purchase price, with interest, he would have to allege and prove his ownership and possession of the draft. There is no such allegation or proof. Before H. Gartler (payee) could recover the purchase price, as such, he would have to allege assignment of the purchaser's rights, in addition to ownership and possession of the draft; and there is no such allegation or proof. If he seeks to recover as payee, he is entitled to 6,250 lei, or its equivalent in American money, and the court finds, without any proof, that the lei is worth little or nothing. If he seeks damages over what the lei would have been worth when the draft was presented, he is attempting to hold the drawer responsible for failure of payment, and the complaint would have to allege, in addition to presentation and refusal, a protest as required by the Code in the case of a foreign bill of exchange.

"A bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money to order or to bearer." Civ. Code, § 3207.

"Where any negotiable instrument has been dishonored it may be protested for nonacceptance or nonpayment, as the case may be; but protest is not required except in the case of foreign bills of exchange." Civ. Code, § 3199.

"Where a foreign bill appearing on its face to be such is dishonored by nonacceptance, it must be duly protested for nonacceptance, and where such a bill which has not previously been dishonored by nonacceptance is dishonored by nonpayment, it must be duly protested for nonpayment. If it is not so protested, the drawer and indorsers are discharged. Where a bill does not appear on its face to be a foreign bill, protest thereof in case of dishonor is unnecessary." Civ. Code, § 3233.

The protest must be made in the manner provided in accordance with sections 3234 to 3241, inclusive, of the Civil Code.

No allegations as to these requirements appear in the complaint in question, and the general demurrer should therefore have been sustained.

The complaint alleges that the dollar value of the Roumanian lei declined to practically no value in dollars after presentation of and the refusal to honor the draft, and the findings follow this allegation. Since there was no proof on the subject, it follows that the evidence does not support the findings in that regard. In the view we take of the case, it does not matter whether or not this finding was a material one.

The demurrer as to misjoinder and the demurrer upon the ground that the complaint does not contain allegations sufficient to constitute a cause of action should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Action by C. E. Patterson against D. O. De Haven. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

W. P. Johnson, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendant in the sum of $1,000, alleged to be due the plaintiff from the defendant for and on behalf of commissions earned in the sale of a certain band of sheep belonging to G. C. Long and his brother, J. R. Long. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The complaint is in three counts. Judgment went for the plaintiff upon the first count, and, as the findings of the court are simply general, and to the effect that all the allegations of the first count of plaintiff's complaint are true and correct, it is necessary to set forth the same, which we do, as follows:

"I. That on the ——— day of July, 1925, plaintiff had an exclusive option to purchase from G. C. Long and J. R. Long 2,800 head of ewes, or thereabouts, at the price of $13 per head. That thereafter the price was reduced by the said G. C. Long and J. R. Long in this, that they agreed to take for 200 of said ewes the sum of $9 per head. That under the terms of said option plaintiff was to have the right to buy said ewes at said price or to sell the same, and, in case of sale during the life of said option, plaintiff was to be paid by the purchaser his profit or commission, and that no commission was to be paid to the said plaintiff by said Longs.

"II. That plaintiff offered said ewes to defendant for sale at said price, stating to him the terms of his said agreement with said Longs; plaintiff's commission or profit on account of said sale to be $250. That defendant agreed to take said ewes at said price and pay said Patterson the said sum of $250, if the said Longs would make no further reduction in the price of said ewes, but that, if said Longs did make a further reduction in the price of said ewes, he agreed that he would pay said Patterson as his profit or commission in making said sale the amount of the reduction made by said Longs, instead of the said commission of $250. That said Patterson agreed to this.

"III. That, after said reduction by said Longs, and on or about the 1st day of August, 1925, said defendant purchased from said Longs the said ewes. That he paid the said Longs for said ewes as follows: $9 per head for 200 of said ewes, $12 per head for 1,000 of said ewes; and $13 per head for the balance of said ewes. That the said Longs reduced the price on 1,000 of said ewes $1,000, and, in accordance with said agreement between plaintiff and defendant, there became due to plaintiff from defendant on the purchase of said ewes at said reduced price the sum of $1,000. That said ewes were delivered to said defendant by said Longs on or about the 10th day of November, 1925. That the number of ewes so delivered was 2,757 head. That defendant paid to said Longs the amount said Longs were to receive on account of the purchase of said ewes.

"IV. That the said sale was made during the life of said option. That before the sale was made to the said defendant plaintiff told the said Longs the arrangement he had made with the said defendant, and that, under the terms of the said arrangement, $1,000 was to be paid to him by the said defendant. That the said Longs made the said sale direct to the said defendant with the agreement on the part of said defendant that he was to pay the said plaintiff in accordance with his agreement as above set forth."

No testimony was introduced in relation to counts 2 and 3, and no findings were made thereon. Upon the conclusion of plaintiff's case, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. Defendant also interposed a motion for a new trial after the rendition of judgment herein, which motion was also denied. This appeal raises questions as to the correctness of the ruling of the trial court upon the defendant's motion for a nonsuit; also on the motion for new trial and the sufficiency of the testimony to support the findings of the court. The point is also made that the findings and judgment are against law.

[1] Before going into the legal questions involved, it may be stated that there is no evidence whatever in the transcript to support the finding of the trial court that paragraph I of plaintiff's complaint is true. The plaintiff's own testimony in this particular is as follows:

"Q. What arrangement did you have with G. C. and J. R. Long in regard to the sale of sheep belonging to them? A. Well, about the 1st of July, 1925, he (referring to one of the Longs not named) was over to my house one day, and he wanted to know if I could sell the ewes for him; that was about the 2d or 3d of July, 1925, and I asked him when he wanted it, and he said, if he could get $13 net a head, he would sell them, and that there would be about 2,800 head, and I said, 'Will you give me an exclusive option on them until the 25th of July, to sell them,' and he said, 'Yes; and, if they are not sold then, we can extend it,' and I said I thought I could sell them for him. Q. Were you figuring on buying them for yourself or selling them? A. I figured on selling them at a profit; I priced them to everybody at $13.50."

There is no testimony in the record to the contrary; that the plaintiff simply had an option, or, in other words, was acting in the capacity of an agent to sell the band of sheep for the Long brothers. That this is true is further evidenced by one of the paragraphs, which we take from the opinion of the trial court set out in the transcript as follows:

"The evidence is undisputed that plaintiff was given an option to sell the sheep of Grover and Joe Long at $13 per head; that he interested defendant in the sheep, and was to get 50 cents per head; that the Longs were not to pay him anything by way of commission or otherwise; that later the price was reduced to $9 per head on 200 ewes, and still later a reduction was made of $1 per head on 1,000 head of ewes."

When the findings of fact were signed, the testimony which we have quoted and the views of the trial court as to the testimony expressed when deciding the case appear to have been overlooked.

The first paragraph of plaintiff's complaint and the findings of the court to which we have referred were apparently both based on the opinion of this court in the case of Flint v. Giguere, 50 Cal. App. 314, 195 P. 85. This case is set forth in the trial court's opinion, and also in the brief of respondent herein as supporting the judgment. However, as the testimony which we have quoted shows conclusively that the appellant had only an option to sell, the case of Flint v. Giguere is not an authority here. The difference between the case at bar and the case of Flint v. Giguere is readily perceived by reading the first paragraph of the opinion in the latter case. It is:

"That within two years last past the said plaintiff and D. B. Woods entered into a contract whereby the said D. B. Woods agreed to sell and deliver to the said plaintiff 365 head of cattle," etc.

The opinion then goes on to state that the contract which gave the plaintiff the option to buy said 365 head of cattle was sold to the defendant; the defendant agreeing to pay $1 per head for said cattle. Flint negotiated with Woods as a purchaser, and he was given the right to purchase. He did not negotiate with Woods and obtain an option simply to sell the cattle for Woods at so much per head. In the Flint Case the plaintiff was an independent contractor, having the right to purchase the 365 head of cattle within a certain period of time, and he simply sold his contract right to the defendant in the case referred to for the sum of money therein named. No question of agency was involved in the Flint-Giguere Case. Here the very inception of the negotiations created the relationship of principal and agent between the plaintiff and the Long brothers. After this relationship had been established, the plaintiff looked up the defendant, and offered him the sheep at $13.50 per head. The defendant went to the ranch or range where the sheep were kept, examined the same, and, in negotiating with one of the Long brothers, a reduction to $9 per head was made on 200 head of sheep on account of their age. After this had taken place, the defendant and the plaintiff had an interview, which is related by the plaintiff as follows:

"Ollie (referring to the defendant) said, 'The bank won't let me buy only for $13,' and I said it was all off, and went and stopped in front of our office, and talked a few minutes, and then went and sat on the bench in front of Fisher's, and Ollie wanted to know if I thought they would not come down a little more, and I told him no. Q. He told you he would not pay more than $13? A. He said the bank would not let him pay over $13. Q. That was after the reduction was made on the 200? A. Yes. Q. And then you told him the sale would have to be off, or the deal would have to be off? A. Yes; we sat on the bench and talked a little bit, and I told him I didn't think so; that Joe had told me that, if he couldn't get $13, they wouldn't sell them, and that he had concluded not to sell them anyway, and Ollie (referring to the defendant) said, 'I believe they will come down some more, but, if they won't come down some more, I will give you $250 profit on it, and give it to you some other way, but, if they will come down, I will take them, and save my $250, and whatever they come down will be yours. Q. And the arrangement with Longs was 200 at $9—and then, if they were sold at that rate to De Haven, what would you get on them for commission? A. I wouldn't get any on them. Q. And then he made this proposition that he would take them on the $13 proposition instead of the $13.50? A. Yes. Q. There had already been a reduction on the 200, you stated? A. Yes. Q. And, as added to that, he was to pay you $250 commission, is that right? A. Yes; he said, 'I will take them, but I will go back up there, and, if they won't come down any more, I will take the sheep, and pay you the $250 profit, but I think they will come down on that, and whatever they come down will be yours, and I will save my $250.'

Upon cross-examination, the plaintiff testified in relation to this transaction as follows:

"Q. I understood you to say in front of Johnson's office, or in front of Fisher's store, De Haven said, 'I can't pay but $13 for the sheep, do you suppose they will come down,' and you said, 'I don't think so,' and you sat down there, and finally De Haven said, 'I will take the sheep at $13, and I will give you $250, but, if I can get them to come down, you can get the profit,' and that you went and told the Longs that, didn't you? A. I didn't tell them anything of the kind. I never said a word to them until they knocked them down $1,000."

After this agreement had been entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant relative to the plaintiff receiving whatever might be the drop on the price of the sheep, the defendant entered into negotiations with Joe Long, one of the owners of the sheep, and secured a reduction on 1,000 head of said sheep, in the sum of $1 per head. It is this drop in the price, as it is frequently called in the testimony and the briefs, that constitutes the basis of the plaintiff's action. The transcript further shows that the agreement as to the price of the sheep was made by the Longs on the ranch or range where the sheep were kept, and that, after such arrangements, the parties all came down to the town of Red Bluff, and there the money was paid over. The sheep were kept at a place called Bartels. The testimony of Grover Long as to when he obtained notice of the commissions claimed by the plaintiff is as follows:

"Q. He told you that De Haven would take the sheep at $13 and pay him a commission of $250, but that, if he could get you to come down, he was to have the drop? A. I don't know as he told me that he was to have the drop, but he said that he was satisfied that De Haven would take the sheep at $13. Q. Was that at Bartels? A. Yes. Q. Why did you drop down? A. That was done—my brother done that after I left there. I wasn't at Bartels when the deal was made. Mr. Patterson got there in the evening, and I left there the next morning. Q. Did you tell your brother that then? A. I wouldn't say whether I did or not. If I did, I don't remember it."

The brother, Joe Long, who negotiated the sale of the sheep at Bartels, and had agreed with the defendant to reduce the price on 1,000 head thereof from $13 to $12 per head, testified in relation to the transaction under inquiry as follows:

"Mr. De Haven never told me he would take the sheep until after we got to Red Bluff. He said nothing to me about the sheep until we got to Red Bluff. Mr. Patterson came to me in the mountains that morning before we left, and he had been down to Mr. De Haven's camp, and he said that Mr. De Haven and he had agreed on $250, and that they would fix the deal up satisfactory to everybody down there. Q. Did he say anything to you if you dropped any that he would get the drop? A. No; I don't remember about that. Q. When did you first hear about that, that he was to get the drop? A. Well, after we closed the deal with the sheep, Mr. Patterson told me, I believe the morning before we left Bartels when we went to see Mr. De Haven, that he was to get $250, and when we got to the valley we would fix it up satisfactorily down there. Q. Did you hear that, if you dropped in the price of the sheep, Patterson was to get the benefit of the drop? A. Yes; Mr. Patterson told me that. Q. When did he tell you that? A. After we closed the deal here. Q. You never did know that De Haven would give you $13 regardless of the drop? A. No. Q. You never knew it until afterwards? A. No. Q. If you had held up the price, you would have gotten $13 for the sheep? A. I don't know that. Q. Mr. Patterson told you afterwards? A. Yes; Patterson told me afterwards. Q. He told you after the money was paid? A. Yes, sir. Q. And not before? A. No, sir."

Section 2020 of the Civil Code reads:

"An agent must use ordinary diligence to keep his principal informed of his acts in the course of the agency."

This section of the Code and the principle there stated has received consideration at the hands of this court a number of times. The first case coming to our attention is that of Tate v. Aitken, 5 Cal. App. 505, 90 P. 836. In that case an agent was given authority to sell a parcel of real estate for $1,000 or such less sum as the vendor might agree to receive. The remuneration provided for was such sum as the agent might receive in excess of the selling price agreed upon by the vendor. After the relationship of agent and principal had been established, the agent represented to the vendor that he had a buyer who was willing to pay the sum of $800, and no more. The agent in fact had a buyer for the sum of $1,300, at which sum the property was actually sold. After learning these facts, the plaintiff brought an action to recover the sum of $500, being the difference between the represented selling price of $800 and the actual selling price of $1,300. The plaintiff had judgment for the sum of $200. Upon appeal, the judgment was affirmed. It was there held, as we must hold here, that the agreement did not give the agent an option to buy, but only an option to sell, and it was the duty of the agent to make full disclosure. Again, in Curry v. King, 6 Cal. App. 568, 92 P. 662, in an action involving a purchase by the agent who had been given only authority to sell, it was held:

"The relation of an agent to his principal is fiduciary in its nature, and he is bound to treat with his principal concerning the property over which he has been invested with authority in the utmost good faith, and if he fails to show such good faith affirmatively, a transaction whereby the agent acquired the ownership thereof is deemed by the law to be fraudulent."

A number of cases are cited on page 576 of this opinion (192 P. 665) supporting the rule which we have just stated, and then the following quotation is taken from the case of Rubidoe v. Parks, 48 Cal. 215:

"The agent and principal are not absolutely prohibited from dealing with each other in respect to the subject-matter of the agency or trust; but in all their dealings with each other, the utmost good faith is required, and the burden of proof is on the agent to show affirmatively that he acted in good faith, fairly and honestly."

In Whitnack v. Ellworthy, 63 Cal. App. 411, 218 P. 631, in considering the relationship of principal and agent, this court, speaking through Justice Hart, used the following language:

"The law is well settled that one who, either for compensation, or otherwise, assumes to act as an agent for another, is bound to the utmost good faith, and cannot make any secret profits or take any advantage of his position as such agent for his own benefit"—citing Kevane v. Miller, 4 Cal. App. 598, 88 P. 643; Ritchey v. McMichael, 4 Cal. Unrep. 384, 35 P. 151.

The opinion further cites the case of Laurence v. Kilgore, 154 Cal. 310, 97 P. 760, to the effect that, where an agent to buy secretly buys for a less figure than that represented to his principal, the principal may recover the excess paid on account of such misrepresentation. Likewise, in Nielsen v. Richards, 75 Cal. App. 680, 243 P. 697, this court, in considering the relationship of principal and agent, stated the rule as follows:

"The doctrine is familiar, and has been often recognized by this court, that an agent cannot, either directly or indirectly, have an interest in the sale of the property of his principal, which is within the scope of his agency, without the consent of his principal, freely given, after full knowledge of every matter known to the agent which might affect the principal. Coat v. Coat, 63 Ill. 74; Ebelmessenger v. Ebelmessenger, 99 Ill. 548; Ziegler v. Hughes, 55 Ill. 238; Hughes v. Washington, 72 Ill. 85. It is of no consequence in such case that no fraud was actually intended, or that no advantage was in fact derived from the transaction by the agent. Kerr on Fraud and Mistake (Bump's Ed.) 173, 174; Perry on Trusts, par. 206; Story's Eq. Jur. par. 315; Bispham's Eq. (2d Ed.), par. 238, p. 299. The rule is not merely remedial of wrong actually committed. It is intended to be preventive of wrong. Public policy requires, as was tersely and forcibly said by the Chief Justice in Staats v. Bergen, 17 N. J. Eq. 554, that 'a trustee may not put himself in a position in which to be honest must be a strain on him.'

In 2 Cor. Jur. p. 763, § 430, defining the rule in relation to the action of agents acquiring adverse or secret interests, it is stated as follows:

"An agent is held to the utmost good faith in his dealings with his principal, and if, in the transaction of the agency, he represents persons having interests adverse to those of the principal, he generally loses his right to compensation, unless the principal, either expressly or by implication, from the facts and circumstances of the case, consents to the dual employment, or waives, or estops himself from asserting, any objection based thereon. This rule is based on the ground of public policy, and the mere fact that the principal had knowledge that the agent was also acting for the other party, without any consent thereto, will not enable the agent to recover compensation. An agent who represents the adverse party, without his principal's consent, not only loses his right to compensation from his principal, but he cannot recover compensation from the adverse party, on either an express or an implied promise to pay, unless the principal consents not only to the dual agency, but also to the double compensation, because a secret contract by the adverse party to compensate the agent is illegal, as tending to work a fraud upon the principal."

In one of the footnotes supporting the text just stated, we find the following taken from the case of Bell v. McConnell, 37 Ohio St. 396, 41 Am. Rep. 528, which is pertinent here:

"Several reasons may be given for this rule. In law, as in morals, it may be stated that, as a principle, no servant can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Luke, 16, 13. Unless the principal contracts for less, the agent is bound to serve him with all his skill, judgment and discretion. The agent cannot divide this duty and give part to another. Therefore, by engaging with the second, he forfeits his right to compensation from the one who first employed him. By the second engagement, the agent, if he does not in fact disable himself from rendering to the first employer the full quantum of service contracted for, at least tempts himself not to do so. And for the same reason, he cannot recover from the second employer, who is ignorant of the first engagement. And if the second employer has knowledge of the first engagement, then both he and the agent are guilty of the wrong committed against the first employer, and the law will not enforce an executory contract entered into in fraud of the rights of the first employer. * * * The contract itself is void as against public policy and good morals, and both parties thereto being in pari delicto, the law will leave them as it finds them."

That an agent cannot recover commissions from either of the parties where there has been double dealing by him, as appears in this case, was held in the case of Glenn v. Rice, 174 Cal. 269, 162 P. 1020. After stating that the authorities are practically unanimous in so holding, the opinion sets forth the following reasons:

"The reason for the rule is that he (referring to the agent) thereby puts himself in a position where his duty to one conflicts with his duty to the other, where his own interests tempt him to be unfaithful to both principals, a position which is against sound public policy and good morals. His contract for compensation being thus tainted, the law will not permit him to enforce it against either party. It is no answer to this objection to say that he did, in the particular case, act fairly and honorably to both. The infirmity of his contract does not arise from his actual conduct in the given case, but from the policy of the law, which will not allow a man to gain anything from a relation so conducive to bad faith and double-dealing. And the fact that the party whom he sues was aware of the double agency and of the payment, or agreement to pay, compensation by the other party, and consented thereto, does not entitle him to recover. He must show knowledge by both parties. One party might willingly consent, believing that the advantage would accrue to him, to the detriment of the other. The law will not tolerate such an arrangement, except with the knowledge and consent of both, and will enter into no inquiry to determine whether or not the particular negotiation was fairly conducted by the agent. It leaves him as it finds him, affording him no relief."

This holding is supported by a long list of authorities. See page 272 of the opinion from which we have just quoted (162 P. 1021).

[2, 3] The facts in this case show that the plaintiff kept quiet when he should have spoken; that he did not tell the owners of the sheep that any reduction they made in the price would inure to his benefit, until after the deal had been closed. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff in this case to act fairly and honorably toward the owners of the sheep, and immediately convey to them the information that the purchaser was willing to pay $13 a head as soon as such statement had been made to him by such purchaser. Instead of so doing, he remained silent, and is in the position of seeking to benefit by his silence, when good faith and fair dealing demanded that he should speak. This is condemned by all of the authorities, and the law will leave the plaintiff just where it has found him, and not permit him to gain by his breach of trust.

In the recent case of Gordon v. Beck, 196 Cal. 768, 239 P. 309, the court had occasion to review double dealing on the part of the agent, and, in condemning such action, stated the law as follows:

"Such conduct is a fraud upon his principal, and not only will the agent not be entitled to compensation for services so rendered, but the contract or dealings made or had by the agent, while so acting also for the other party without the knowledge or consent, of the principal, are not binding upon the latter, and if they still remain executory, he may repudiate them on that ground, or, if they have been executed in whole or in part, he may by acting promptly and before the rights of innocent parties have intervened, restore the consideration received, rescind the contract and recover back the property or rights with which he has parted under it. It makes no difference that the principal was not in fact injured, or that the agent intended no wrong, or that the other party acted in good faith; the double agency is a fraud upon the principal and he is not bound."

It is further set forth that such a contract is voidable at the option of either principal. The opinion from which we have just quoted cites a long list of authorities supporting the rule just stated. To the same effect is the case of Lem v. Wilson, 27 Cal. App. 512, 150 P. 641.

In 1 California Jurisprudence, 810, the following summary is made of the authorities holding that no compensation can be recovered from either principal, to wit:

"The authorities, with practical unanimity, declare that if an agent is engaged by both parties to effect a sale of property from one to the other, or an exchange between them, not as a mere middleman to bring them together, but active in inducing each to make the trade, he cannot recover compensation from either party unless both parties knew of the double agency at the time of the transaction."

The rules of law governing cases such as the one under consideration, and condemning double agencies under circumstances such as are disclosed by the transcript in this case, are fully set forth in 1 California Jurisprudence, p. 790 et seq.

It necessarily follows from what we have said that the judgment herein should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

HILL et al. v. MORRISON et al. (Civ. 4553.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 19, 1928.

1. Animals ⚡100(4)—Finding orchard damaged by defendant's cattle was inclosed by substantial fence or other enclosure held supported by evidence.

In action for damage to fruit trees by defendant's cattle, finding that orchard lands trespasssed on were entirely inclosed by substantial fence or other inclosure held supported by evidence.

2. Trial ⚡404(1)—A finding should be read as a whole.

To interpret a finding, it should be read as a whole.

3. Damages ⚡112—Value of fruit trees destroyed was determinable from value of ground with trees over value of ground without trees.

In action for damage to fruit trees by defendant's cattle, damage to trees was determinable from evidence that each tree was worth a definite sum which related to the added worth of the ground with trees, over worth of ground without trees.

4. Appeal and error ⚡1071(6)—Failure of findings to cover value of loss of fruit which trees would have produced held not prejudicial to defendants.

In action for damage to fruit trees by defendant's cattle since allegation in complaint referring to fruit as an added damage was surplusage and added nothing to complaint, defendants were not prejudiced by court's failure to find value of loss of fruit which trees would have produced.

5. Damages ⚡188(2)—Testimony of orchardist figuring damage to fruit trees held to sustain damage award.

In action for damage to fruit trees by defendant's cattle, testimony of orchardist fixing damages at slightly less than $900, and another orchardist fixing it as more than that sum, held to justify decision fixing damage of $1,400, or in reduced sum of $900.

6. Animals ⚡100(4)—Evidence held to warrant finding that fruit trees were injured by defendant's cattle, not by snow or other cattle.

In action for damage to fruit trees by defendant's cattle, evidence held to warrant finding that injury to trees was caused by defendant's cattle, not by weight of snow or other cattle.

7. Evidence ⚡547—Overruling objection to question to expert as to what he considered amount of damage to trees held within discretion.

In action for damage to fruit trees by defendant's cattle where expert witness was testifying as to value of land with and without trees, overruling objection to question asking him to state what he considered to be amount of damage to trees was not an abuse of discretion, where answer received was clarified by other questions and answers which brought witness' answer within proper admeasurement of damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by Fred Hill and another against F. P. Morrison, trustee, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants W. H. Glass and W. W. Glass appeal. Affirmed.

C. A. Ballreich, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Byron Waters, of San Bernardino, and U. F. Lewis, of Redlands, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This cause is based upon an alleged damage to fruit trees by cattle belonging to, or controlled by, the defendants W. H. and W. W. Glass. The trial court entered an order of nonsuit as to all other defendants, and they are not before this court. The trees, about 850 in number, are in a mountainous orchard in San Bernardino county which is entirely surrounded by the area known as Angeles National Forest. The action was tried before the court without a jury, and the judgment was awarded against said W. H. and W. W. Glass for the sum of $1,400 with costs, but, after motion for new trial, which was denied, the damage judgment was reduced to the sum of $900. Said last-named defendants, herein-after referred to as defendants or appellants, appealed, specifying several numbered points upon which they rely for a reversal of the judgment.

[1] Point No. 1:

"Judgment should be reversed for failure of plaintiffs to prove that the lands trespassed upon were entirely inclosed by a substantial fence or other inclosure."

The finding upon which appellants base the above point is as follows:

"That said orchard is and at all times mentioned in said complaint has been inclosed with a 4-barbed wire fence except where there is a trail, which fence together with said brush and the lay of the land thereat formed a substantial inclosure of said orchard."

[2] Appellants point out that there is a seeming inconsistency in the finding that there is a trail through the brush, and yet the brush together with the lay of the land thereat forms a part of a substantial inclosure. They also argue that the expression "which fence together with said brush and the lay of the land thereat formed a substantial inclosure of said orchard" is a pure conclusion and no part of a finding of fact. Therefore, there is no finding of fact from which a conclusion could be drawn that the orchard was substantially inclosed. Reading the finding as a whole, as of course it should be read, we do not find it to be fatally defective. The court finds as a fact that partially around this orchard there is a fence and partially around it there is a thick brush, and that as a fact the fence and the brush form a substantial inclosure. And this, notwithstanding there is a trail through the brush. The circumstance that the court finds that the fence and brush form an inclosure is to be taken that the trail was not such a trail as to preclude the finding that the fence, the brush, and the lay of the land thereat "formed a substantial inclosure." Without quoting extensively from the transcript, it is sufficient to say that the evidence supports this construction of the finding and supports the finding in its entirety. We however, quote the following from the testimony of R. H. Stetson, one of the plaintiffs in the case:

"Q. And the land described in the complaint has been in the possession of the plaintiffs how long? A. About 10 years, nearly 11 years now; not quite.

"Q. In the months of February, March, and April, 1922, was the tract fenced or unfenced? A. Fenced.

"Q. What kind of a fence? A. Mostly a 4-barbed wire fence, with posts 12 feet apart. A portion of the old fence that was on the place had a 3-barbed wire fence; and the north portion, the north line of the place, is very thick and heavy brush, and it was never necessary to have a fence there; the stock never penetrated it, or never did to my knowledge.

"Q. That is to say the thickness of the brush furnished the inclosure for that part? A. Yes, sir, inclosed it."

It is as easy to conceive of a fence so constructed or in such bad repair that it would not aid in substantially inclosing the ground as it would be to conceive of a brush of such tender qualities, or a lay of the land so even, that they would not aid in inclosing the orchard. But the court finds these three elements present, and that they constitute a substantial inclosure. It would, indeed, be a refinement to require in the finding the details of the fence construction posts, space between wires, etc., the density and the resisting power of the brush and the grade of the land. The evidence must be looked to for these details.

The briefs of both parties very carefully analyze the law as to whether or not it is necessary to a recovery by plaintiffs that the orchard area, situated as it is and where it is, must have been substantially inclosed. Appellants contend that if the orchard was not within an inclosure the plaintiffs cannot, as a matter of law, recover. But we need not consider this point, as we have determined that the trial court's finding that the orchard was substantially inclosed is proper in form and supported by the evidence.

"The decision is against law for the reason that the trial court failed to make a finding on material issues, to wit, the loss in value of the lands or trees thereon resulting from the injuries found done to the trees, and the loss of fruit which the trees would have produced if such damage had not been done."

Appellants contend that the finding that the defendants permitted their cattle to break through plaintiffs' fence and to go into plaintiffs' orchard, and to bite, eat, break, horn, damage, and destroy trees to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $1,400 (later reduced to $900) is a naked conclusion and does not suffice to constitute a finding as to the extent of the injury to or the loss in value of the lands or the trees thereon resulting from such injuries.

[4] There is no claim or intimation in this case that the plaintiffs are asking for damages on a sentimental ground. On the contrary, the evidence responds to the allegation in the complaint referring to damage to the trees and only to the theory of a pecuniary loss. Fruit trees, under this theory, are valuable only because they produce valuable fruit. This value may be considered by a direct evaluation of the fruit itself or as an added value of the land with the fruit-producing trees thereon. The evidence adduced was that each tree, according to its age, condition, and kind, was worth a specific sum; that those destroyed were thereafter worth nothing; and that those injured were worth sums proportionate to their normal condition. This worth, of course, related to the added worth of the ground with the trees, over the worth of the ground without the trees, and was a proper method of determining the damage. Sedgwick on Damages (7th Ed.) 276; Montgomery v. Locke, 72 Cal. 75, 13 P. 401; Shearer v. Park Nursery Co., 103 Cal. 415, at p. 420, 37 P. 412, 42 Am. St. Rep. 125. Since the method used considered the value of the trees as fruit producers, it follows that an added sum for the crop itself would have been counting the damage twice, and hence the allegation in the complaint referring to fruit as an added damage is pure surplusage. This allegation adds nothing to the complaint, and the defendants have not been prejudiced in any way by the failure of the findings to cover it. Being an immaterial allegation, no finding thereon need be made.

[5] Point No. 3-A:

"The evidence is insufficient to justify the decision fixing the amount of damage in the sum of $1,400, or in the reduced sum of $900."

As may be seen from the evidence quoted and further from our comment under point No. 4, we regard the testimony relating to the method of measuring the damage as proper. Under this method one of the orchardists figured the damage slightly less than $900, and the other as very much more than that figure. It is plain that there was substantial testimony upon which the trial court could arrive at the amount fixed in the judgment.

[6] Point No. 3-B.

"The evidence is insufficient to justify the decision that the injuries to plaintiffs' property were not in anywise done or caused by the weight of snow."

R. H. Stetson, one of the plaintiffs, testified that he had lived in the neighborhood of the orchard for many years; that he went up to the place in the early spring of 1921 and found six head of defendants' cattle in the orchard; that he observed the trees eaten, broken, and limbs twisted and broken, and that the damage was done by cattle; that never before had he sustained any considerable damage to his orchard trees except through a late frost; that when he examined the broken limbs he found the breaks comparatively recent; that around the broken and browsed trees there were many cattle tracks; that the spring buds had been browsed off up to six or seven feet from the ground. Another witness, Selover, also saw two of defendants' cattle in the orchard in March, 1921. This evidence was competent to support the finding criticized.

Points Nos. 3-C and 3-D:

"The evidence is insufficient to justify the decision that the injuries and damage to plaintiffs' property were done by the cattle of defendants, and not by cattle of other persons."

The discussion under 3-B of this point covers this subdivision of point 3 as well. We will add that, while it may have been possible that other cattle joined in causing the damage, there is no testimony to that effect and the testimony referred to was competent evidence upon which the trial court could have based the above referred to finding.

[7] Point No. 4:

"The court erred in overruling appellants' objection to the question put to the witnesses Ford and Pendleton, calling for their estimate of the amount of damage to the trees in question."

Ford and Pendleton were called as orchard experts to give in detail their experiences, and were allowed to testify. Ford was asked:

"Now, taking all these different elements into consideration, you may state what you consider to be the amount of damage to these trees."

To which the objection was made that the question asked for a conclusion on the ultimate fact and that no foundation had been laid. The circumstances as to Pendleton may be considered the same as those applying to Ford for all practical purposes. Our comments under appellants' point No. 3 will be in mind while considering this point, without specific reference. In the cross-examination, counsel for defendants asks the following questions and Mr. Ford gives the following answers:

"Q. Mr. Ford, where did you obtain the $8 valuation that you placed on the Rome Beauty trees of that age? A. Well, that is what I would consider a fair valuation of the Stetson orchard, considering the age of the tree and the location and the variety of the tree."

"Q. Did that $8 per tree include the land value that it is growing in? A. Well, I would say that it would be part of the land value—that is, you really might calculate the land and the trees growing together, but the trees have, I would consider, have a value themselves, $8."

It requires no argument to arrive at the conclusion that the witness was in effect testifying that the land with these trees was worth $8 more per tree than without them, and was worth proportionately less through the extent of their injury. Both witnesses qualified as experts to the satisfaction of the trial judge, and we find no abuse of discretion therein, as we should have to do to sustain the objection as to qualification. We hold that the overruling of the objections was not error, and that the bases of the answers received were clarified and squarely brought within the proper admeasurement of damages in this case by the questions and answers quoted herein.

It is further contended by appellants that the estimates of damage are gross instead of net, but sufficient of the testimony has been referred to and quoted to show that it does not support this view.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LOUGHEED. (Cr. 1436.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Jan. 20, 1928.

1. Criminal law §419, 420(11)—Police officer's testimony respecting conversation with prosecutrix in rape case to show her chastity held inadmissible as hearsay (Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 3).

In prosecution for rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 3, consummated by use of force overcoming resistance of prosecutrix, testimony of police officer as to a conversation with prosecutrix, offered to show her chastity, on the theory that it had been put in issue by defendant, held inadmissible as hearsay.

2. Criminal law §721(5), 730(10)—Prosecuting attorney's comment on accused's failure to deny rape held error, and court's failure to admonish jury to disregard it rendered error more prejudicial (Pen. Code, § 1323, and § 261, subd. 3).

Under Pen. Code, § 1323, providing that defendant's failure to testify cannot prejudice him or be used against him on the trial, prosecuting attorney's argument to jury commenting on defendant's failure to deny commission of forcible rape, in violation of section 261, subd. 3, charged against him, held error, and trial judge's failure to admonish the jury to disregard it made the misconduct more prejudicial.

NOURSE, J. Defendant was tried before a jury upon an information charging rape under subdivision 3 of section 261 of the Penal Code—where the female "resists, but her resistance is overcome by force or violence." A verdict of guilty of attempt to commit rape was returned, and, from the judgment upon the verdict, the defendant has appealed on a typewritten record.

The material evidence in the case is found in the transcript of the testimony of the prosecutrix, taken at the preliminary examination (she having failed to appear at the trial of the action in the superior court) and in the extrajudicial statement of the defendant, made in the office of the district attorney shortly after his arrest. The stories of the two parties are without substantial conflict except upon the two issues of resistance and penetration. At about the noon hour of July 11, 1927, the defendant, a man of 50 years of age, picked up the prosecutrix, a woman over 21, on the streets of Berkeley, where she was soliciting subscriptions for an Oakland newspaper. He drove her in his car to a place in the hills of Contra Costa county, where the attack is alleged to have taken place about an hour later. The prosecutrix went upon the ride willingly, and permitted the defendant to engage in undue familiarities while in the car, apparently in expectation that she would secure from him a number of subscriptions to the paper by which she was employed. According to her story, she left the car and tried to escape, but the defendant followed her and accomplished the act without her consent and against her protest. The jury evidently disbelieved her story as to penetration when it found a verdict of attempt only. If her story were true and believed by the jury, it would have required a verdict of guilty of the crime charged in the information. If untrue, in this essential part, the doubt which this fact must cast upon the rest of her story merely emphasizes the importance of the errors of law herein-after considered.

The appellant insists that the evidence is insufficient to prove the essential element of resistance on the part of the prosecutrix, and points out that the most that appears from her testimony is that she resented his caresses, resisted, pleaded, fought, and struggled with him; that it does not appear that any clothing was torn, that there was any blood upon her body or clothing, or that either the prosecutrix or her assailant showed any scratches, bruises, or marks of violence; and that there is no evidence of any character tending to prove that her resistance was "overcome by force or violence." Many cases are cited by appellant touching on the question of the sufficiency of evidence to prove this issue, but we do not deem it necessary to further discuss the evidence or to consider the authorities cited, because we are satisfied from our review of the entire record that the appellant was not accorded a fair trial, and the judgment must be reversed for that reason. We will rest the opinion on the two assignments in which error is confessed by the state.

[1] 1. In the direct examination of one of the Berkeley police inspectors, the district attorney asked him if the prosecutrix had said anything to him about her chastity. The appellant's objection to this inquiry was overruled on the ground that the question had been opened by him. The witness was then allowed to testify as follows:

"I asked her when this man raped her, if it hurt her, and she said, 'No.' I said, 'Have you ever had sexual intercourse with a man before?' She said, 'Absolutely not.' I said, 'That's strange; it generally hurts a woman the first time.' She said, 'I had some female trouble and had to undergo an operation, and at that time my hymen was ruptured.'"

The evidence was plain hearsay, and should have been excluded. The ruling of the trial judge was evidently based upon the theory that the question of the chastity of the prosecutrix had been put in issue by appellant. Before this testimony was taken, the appellant had, during the cross-examination of another police inspector, and for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the prosecutrix given at the preliminary examination as to her chastity, elicited the statement that when she made the complaint to this inspector in the presence of the police matron and other police officers she said:

"I am engaged to a young man in San Francisco, and I have had sexual intercourse with him, because I expect to marry him."

Though this may have opened the door to evidence of chastity and good reputation, it certainly did not let down the bars for all kinds of incompetent and hearsay testimony.

[2] 2. During the presentation of the case in chief, the state introduced the statement of the appellant made in the office of the district attorney following his arrest. The appellant was called to the stand and testified that the statement was made after a deputy sheriff had assured him that "they would get me out of this." During the argument to the jury by the deputy district attorney, the following occurred:

"But this remains, gentlemen of the jury, he took that stand, he took that stand to tell you something, and he has never denied, while he was on the stand, that he took that girl to those hills, and he forcibly raped her. It appears to me that the proper procedure is, when they put the defendant on the stand, if they put him on at all, to ask him, 'Did you rape this girl?' is the material question in this case, and at this particular time he got upon the stand and made himself a witness in the case, and didn't deny it, and it went into the record then, gentlemen of the jury, undisputed, so far as his testimony is concerned, after taking the stand and being sworn as a witness in this case.

"Mr. Doyle: If your honor please, we assign as reversible error, the remarks of the assistant district attorney with respect to the, or any, failure of counsel for the defendant to examine the defendant at length as to the merits of the case.

"The Court: It is best, Mr. Hoey, to refrain from reflecting upon counsel. The defendant went upon the stand and testified, and counsel has a right to refer to the evidence given by the defendant, just the same as he has a right to refer to the evidence given by any other witness, but it is best to refrain from reflecting in any way upon counsel.

"Mr. Hoey: I am not reflecting on counsel. If I did, I apologize, if they take it that way. I am referring to the testimony, and I am only trying to answer the question.

"Mr. Doyle: My objection is, in this assignment of error, we refer specifically to section 1323 of the Penal Code of the state of California, respecting the rights of the defendant.

"Mr. Hoey: Let's see it.

"The Court: Well, proceed, Mr. Hoey."

The Attorney General concedes the error, but insists that the question cannot be raised on an appeal from the judgment, citing People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 235, 33 P. 202. The rule of the Sansome Case, that the point can be raised only on a motion for new trial, is no longer authority in this state. People v. Amer, 151 Cal. 303, 309, 90 P. 698; People v. Derbert, 138 Cal. 467, 71 P. 564. There is some confusion in the decisions as to whether the point can be raised on an appeal from the judgment when the trial judge has sufficiently admonished the jury to disregard the misconduct, but the authorities are uniform that it is properly raised on such appeal when no admonition is given, because in such a case it is an error at law on the part of the trial judge to refuse the admonition.

Section 1323 of the Penal Code provides that the neglect or refusal of a defendant to be a witness "cannot in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial." When the deputy district attorney called the attention of the jury to appellant's failure to deny the assault, he deprived the appellant of a right which the statute has accorded every defendant in a criminal case, and the failure of the trial judge to admonish the jury tended to make the misconduct the more prejudicial. It is neither proper nor fair to take advantage of a defendant on trial because of his failure to be a witness in his own behalf, so long as the statute safeguards him in that right. People v. Morris, 3 Cal. App. 1, 6, 84 P. 463; People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 238, 46 P. 153; People v. Brown (Cal. App.) 253 P. 735.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEAK et al. v. KEY SYSTEM TRANSIT CO.
(Civ. 6045.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 16, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 15, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1031(1)—Prejudice in procedure and practice is rarely presumed.

Where injury complained of goes only to question of procedure and practice, it is rarely that prejudice to appellant is presumed.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1170(1)—Permitting Compensation Insurance Fund to intervene as plaintiff in injured employee's action against tort-feasor, after impaneling jury, held not prejudicial error (Const. art. 6, § 4½; Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8).

Permitting State Compensation Insurance Fund to intervene as plaintiff after impaneling jury in employee's action against another than employer for injuries sustained in alleged violation of Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8, held not prejudicial error as depriving defendant of opportunity to examine individual jurors on voir dire as to connection with intervener or feelings toward latter's counsel, but at most a mere irregularity of procedure, without substantial injury to defendant within Const. art. 6, § 4½, where counsel frankly discussed situation with trial judge, and defendant knew of intervener's interest long before examining jurors, and made no request for further examination, nor any suggestion that complete re-examination would have disclosed any ground for complaint.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1170(1)—Permitting State Compensation Insurance Fund, which is state agency, to intervene as plaintiff in injured employee's action against tort-feasor, held not prejudicial error (Const. art. 6, § 4½; Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8).

State Compensation Insurance Fund being an agency of state, established for purpose of administering certain portions of latter's sovereignty, there was no error prejudicial to defendant, within Const. art. 6, § 4½, in permitting it to intervene as plaintiff after impaneling jury in injured employee's action against tort-feasor, in alleged violation of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8; there being no stockholders or private interests for or against which juror might entertain a friendly, protective attitude or a prejudice.

4. Street railroads ⇨117(11)—Negligence in increasing speed of street car after driver of parked truck warned motorman to stop held for jury.

In action for injuries to driver of parked truck struck by street car, evidence that motorman increased speed of car instead of stopping as directed by plaintiff, when seven or eight feet from truck, held sufficient to take to jury question of defendant's negligence, even if neither motorman, conductor, nor plaintiff was negligent, or plaintiff was equally negligent, until he gave such warning.

5. Street railroads ⇨117(24)—Contributory negligence of driver of parked truck, directing movement of street car colliding therewith, held for jury.

Contributory negligence of injured driver of parked truck in failing to see in time that grab handle at center entrance of street car, proceeding as directed by him, would strike truck, held for jury.

6. Negligence ⇨136(26)—To determine contributory negligence, as matter of law, undisputed facts must clearly show failure to exercise ordinary care.

To determine, as matter of law, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, it must be clearly shown from undisputed facts, judged in light of common knowledge and experience, that he failed to exercise such care as men of common prudence usually exercise in positions of like exposure.

7. Negligence ⇨136(9)—Evidence should leave no room for doubt to justify court in determining contributory negligence as matter of law.

To hold plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, evidence should be so clear as to leave no room for doubt, and the facts such that the inference is irresistible.

8. Street railroads ⇨90(4)—Operatives, aware of danger of collision, held bound to exercise care and watchfulness until entire street car had passed parked truck.

Street car motorman and conductor, aware of parked truck's situation near track, and danger of collision therewith, and proceeding with driver thereof in full view advising of its nearness and possibility of passage, held bound to exercise care and watchfulness until entire length of car, center entrance of which was equipped with grab handles, passed truck, not merely until front end had passed in safety.

9. Trial ⇨296(4, 5)—Instruction that street railway company is liable for injuries in collision with vehicle near tracks through its servants' negligence held not erroneous as ignoring question of contributory negligence, in view of succeeding instructions.

Instruction that street railway company is liable for injuries resulting if car collides with vehicle near tracks through its servants' inattention or carelessness held not erroneous as directing verdict for injured truck driver, regardless of his contributory negligence, if defendant's servants were negligent, in view of succeeding instructions on contributory negligence.

10. Trial ⇨228(1)—That instruction does not contain all conditions and limitations gathered from entire charge is not ground for reversal.

Trial court is not required to state all the law applicable to case in single instruction, but instructions should be considered in connection with each other, and, if charge harmonizes as a whole, and fairly and accurately states law, without straining any portion of language, reversal may not be had because separate instruction does not contain all conditions and limitations to be gathered from entire charge.

11. Street railroads ⇨118(1)—Instruction that street railway is liable for servants' "inattention or carelessness" held not erroneous as authorizing recovery for slight act of inattention.

Instruction that street railway company is liable for injuries resulting, if car collides with vehicle near tracks through its servants' "inattention or carelessness," held not erroneous as positively directing such finding, if such servants were guilty of slight act of inattention, without finding that their acts constituted negligence proximately contributing to injury, or that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence.

12. Trial ⇨296(3)—Instruction that street railway company is liable for injuries by collision with vehicle near tracks through its servants' inattention or carelessness held not reversible error, in view of other instructions (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Instruction that street railway company is liable for injuries from collision with vehicle near tracks, through its servants' inattention or carelessness, held not so prejudicial as to require reversal, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, in view of other instructions that company is not insurer against any casualty that may happen, nor liable for merely accidental injuries, which ordinary care could not have avoided, or injury not proximately contributed to by its negligent act or omission.

13. Trial ⇨194(17)—Instruction that it is conductor's duty to watch for, and avoid, obstructions, after front end of street car safely passes vehicle near tracks, held not to invade jury's province.

Instruction that it is not only motorman's duty to see that front end of street car passes vehicle beside track safely, but conductor's duty to watch for, and avoid, obstructions that car may meet at any time before it has entirely passed, held not erroneous as invading jury's province and telling jury that motorman and conductor of car, grab handle at center entrance of which struck parked truck, were derelict in their duty, if they did not see that car passed safely and avoid obstruction.

14. Street railroads ⇨90(4)—Motorman and conductor must exercise ordinary care in passing vehicle beside tracks.

It is motorman's duty to see that front end of street car passes vehicle beside tracks safely, and conductor's duty to watch for and avoid obstructions that car may meet at any time before it has entirely passed, but each fulfills duty by exercising ordinary care and diligence under the circumstances.

15. Negligence ⇨2—Breach of duty essential to recovery for negligence.

When damages are sought by reason of negligence, it is nearly always essential that a breach of some duty owing plaintiff by defendant be established.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Appeal by defendant from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs pursuant to the verdict of a jury in an action brought to recover damages on account of personal injuries sustained through the alleged negligence of defendant, its agents and servants.

Plaintiff Peak was injured on September 5, 1924. At the time of his injury he was employed by one Fred W. Diehl, and the nature of his employment was as driver of a truck. The said Diehl at all times embraced within our inquiry carried compensation and accident insurance with the State Compensation Fund.

In November of 1924 Peak commenced this action against defendant Key System Transit Company, alleging that his injury was sustained through the negligence of said company. Thereafter, on November 17, 1924, Peak duly notified the said State Compensation Fund that such an action had been instituted by him, and such notice stated that it was given in pursuance of the terms and provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of the state of California. Thereafter, on January 29, 1925, the State Compensation Insurance Fund filed an action against Key System Transit Company. Both actions were predicated upon the same facts, but the action of State Compensation Insurance Fund contained additional facts showing the contract of insurance issued to Peak's employer by the Insurance Fund, and that the same covered the injury sustained by Peak, and that he did receive certain benefits. In both cases the defendant was represented by the same counsel. In case of Peak v. Key System issue was joined, and the case placed upon the trial calendar, while in the case of the Compensation Fund v. Key System the issue remained open pursuant to stipulations entered into between respective counsel.

The Peak Case coming on regularly for trial, a jury was impaneled, and, after the taking of testimony had commenced and a day of trial consumed, the State Compensation Fund appeared herein, and asked permission of court to intervene as a party plaintiff. After much discussion and colloquy between the court and counsel, the request was granted. Appellant vigorously assails the action of the court in this as being prejudicially erroneous.

Upon the intervention all of the allegations of the complaint of Compensation Fund were deemed denied. The main objection now urged concedes the right of the trial court to permit intervention or order consolidation for purposes of trial, but stresses the claim that, after trial commenced, the application came too late; indeed, in the court below, when the matter was first discussed, counsel for appellant then stated, "My only objection is that it comes too late."

Before discussing the point further, it may be stated that no question of fraud or inexcusable delay appears. The case of the Compensation Fund had lain dormant by request of defendant, and counsel for defendant were at all times aware of the pendency thereof and of the issues tendered thereby.

Without going exhaustively into the questions of intervention or consolidation for purposes of trial, and without reviewing the law establishing the rights of an employer for damage caused him by or through injury to servant, it is sufficient for the case to note that all parties concede the cause of action in plaintiff Compensation Fund against defendant, and concede further that, if the case had been at issue and ready for trial, the action of the court would have been correct in ordering a consolidation of the cases prior to the actual commencement of the trial of the Peak Case. The only purpose of the intervention of the State Compensation Insurance Fund was to secure for it a return of its outlay in case it was determined that the negligence of defendant caused the injury to plaintiff, and that through the injury damages were suffered. At all times the issue of defendant's negligence was the same, and was the one issue determining defendant's liability either to Peak or the Compensation Fund. The contention of the appellant here admits all of this. Concretely, appellant's argument is thus put:

"When the statute says that the right to consolidate is confined to a consolidation before trial, then the employer or his insurance carrier must apply for a consolidation prior to trial, and there can be no order permitting consolidation after trial commenced,"—citing section 26, Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Laws (St. 1917, p. 854, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8).

The controlling facts remain that the error complained of consists in the court's permitting to be done what concededly the law permits and requires to be done, but permitting it at a stage in the proceedings beyond that expressly set forth in the statute.

[1, 2] It surely would serve no useful purpose for us to minutely analyze all of the possible constructions which might be suggested. After a most searching inquiry, we would be brought back to the main endeavor—to weigh the entire case to find if any substantial prejudice resulted to the rights of appellant. We must concede that errors might arise so far affecting the rights of the litigant that a reviewing court perforce must conclude that a miscarriage of justice resulted without further inquiry. But, where the injury complained of goes only to a question of procedure and practice, it is rarely that the prejudice is presumed. Such is the case here.

Appellant centers its claim of deprivation of rights upon the theory that, the intervention or consolidation being permitted after the impanelment of the jury, the defendant was deprived of the opportunity of examining the individual jurors on voir dire as to any possible connection with the intervening party, or as to the feelings of the persons examined for or against the counsel for the said intervenor. This objection seems to be merely perfunctory. Counsel in the court below were quite frank in discussing the situation with the trial judge, and it is apparent that both court and counsel were striving to meet a somewhat unusual situation. Naturally, counsel desired to preserve his record and retain for consideration the point involved. Yet, after such consideration and after trial, the claim of error finds only this one theory upon which to rest. We have not before us the record showing the scope of the voir dire of the jurors. However, the record does disclose that defendant, long before the examination of the jurors, knew the interest of the Compensation Fund in the result of the action. Further, the record here discloses that no request was made to further examine any juror, and there is not even a suggestion that, if a complete re-examination had been undertaken, it would have disclosed any ground for complaint. From our record here we must presume that a fair and impartial jury was impaneled, and it would surely be speculative in a high degree to arbitrarily conclude that, by reason of the intervention of a formal party, the complexion of the jury would be changed.

[3] We are mindful, too, that we are not considering a case where a private corporation insurance carrier is involved. The State Compensation Insurance Fund is an agency of the state, and was established for the purpose of administering certain portions of the sovereignty of the state. Rauschan v. Gilbert [Cal. App.] 253 P. 175. Therefore there are no stockholders or private interests involved for or against which a juror might entertain a friendly, protective attitude or a prejudice.

Going further and into the trial of the case, the State Compensation Fund took no active part in the trial. It simply offered more or less formal proof on the facts of its claim, which was wholly conditioned upon the jury's determination on the facts presented by the other parties to the action.

We conclude that at most the action of the court could be held a mere irregularity of procedure without substantial injury to the rights of the defendant, and as such not ground for disturbing the judgment. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

[4-7] This brings us to a consideration of the merits of the appeal. For the purpose it becomes necessary to detail sufficient of the facts to illustrate the contentions made.

Plaintiff Peak, at the time of the accident, was employed as a truck driver. He had driven his truck from Oakland to Alameda, and had parked on Park street. No question is presented as to the propriety of his parking, nor is any point involved concerning local ordinances. The position of the truck when parked was in such relation to the tracks of the car system maintained and operated by the defendant corporation as to render doubtful the free passage of street cars. The plaintiff Peak, anticipating that the street car of defendant might strike the truck, walked toward the advancing street car, and raised his hand in warning, and the car stopped. Up to this point there seems little, if any, disagreement as to the facts. After the street car had come to a full stop, the plaintiff and the motorman and conductor of the car viewed the situation, and all saw the difficulties liable to be encountered in attempting to pass. Plaintiff explained to those in charge of the car that, if it should prove impossible for the car to pass, he (plaintiff) would move the truck out, and drive to a place where the truck would be entirely out of the way. After observation, it was determined by all that an effort would be made to pass without moving the truck. Accordingly, plaintiff took a position at or near the end of the truck, and signaled the car to proceed. With the motorman at his regular station in front, the attempt began. The street car in question is of a type known as a center entrance car; that is to say, that in the center of the car is the entrance for passengers as distinguished from that type of car which passengers enter from the ends. This center entrance is equipped with bars or handles, referred to throughout the case as grab handles, being bars or stanchions projecting some four or five inches from the body of the car, and the said grab handles are thus placed on either side of the entrance to facilitate the entry and exit of passengers. When the car started, the conductor remained on the step of the car, sighting along the side thereof to observe the progress of the passage. The plaintiff, as noted, stationed himself near the end of his truck, and signaled with his arms to the motorman that he might proceed. The car was started, and proceeded cautiously towards the truck. The front end of the car passed without interference. It then appeared to plaintiff that the grab handles projecting from the side of the car could not permit through passage without collision. When these grab handles were still six or eight feet distant from the truck, plaintiff signaled to the motorman, and shouted "Stop." Thereupon, instead of stopping, the speed of the car was increased, and the collision occurred. Plaintiff was struck by the truck and injured. It further appears that the plaintiff Peak, in signaling to the motorman and conductor, and directing the advance of the car, was at all times in plain sight of said motorman and conductor. It also appears that, up to the time of the signal to stop, the car was going slowly, and at a speed that would have permitted an immediate stop.

It is true that on many details there is a conflict on the facts as we have outlined them; but appellant concedes that we must disregard this conflict and accept for the purposes of this appeal the facts as made out by the respondent. In any event, the summary of facts thus made is sufficient to present the contentions presented on this appeal.

It is appellant's contention, giving respondents the benefit of all conflict, that the facts disclose such contributory negligence on the part of respondent as to preclude a recovery. Putting it in the language of appellant, "the plaintiff and defendant motorman were in substantially the same position, and saw the same things, and reacted in the same way to what they saw, and had the same opportunity of determining whether the grab handle was or was not going to strike the truck; and the plaintiff, if he had foreseen the collision in time, could easily have saved himself from injury. Therefore, one of two things must necessarily be the case: Either the motorman and plaintiff were both negligent in failing to see in time that the grab rail was going to strike the truck, or they were both exercising due care when they failed to make that observation. It must be either one or the other, for it is impossible that one should be negligent and the other not negligent in failing to observe the same thing." We conclude, however, that the question is not so easily disposed of. Adopting appellant's theory up to a certain point, there is also the added circumstance that, while the car was still seven or eight feet away from the truck, plaintiff did anticipate the danger, and directed the motorman to stop, and that the speed of the car, wholly under control of the defendant's employee, was increased and the collision followed. We might assume that up to the point of warning neither party was negligent, or that, if there was any negligence, then plaintiff was equally guilty thereof. However, there is evidence, as stated, that both the motorman and conductor were aware of the situation, and were proceeding as directed by plaintiff, and that, when directed to stop, they did just the opposite.

Without further analysis, we think that the facts presented a question for the jury, and the finding of negligence on the part of defendant's servants and employees is supported by the evidence, and that no facts appear from which the law itself concludes contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. Gumb v. R. R. Co., 57 N. Y. Super. Ct. 1, 559, 9 N. Y. S. 316. In order that this court could determine as a matter of law that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, it must be clearly shown from the undisputed facts, judged in the light of common knowledge and experience, that a party has not exercised such care as men of common prudence usually exercise in positions of like exposure. Nehrbas v. Central Pac. R. R., 62 Cal. 320. The evidence against the plaintiff should be so clear as to leave no room for doubt, and the facts such that the inference is irresistible, to justify this court in determining as a matter of law plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence. Schneider v. Market St. R. R., 134 Cal. 487, 66 P. 734; Schurman v. L. A. Creamery Co. (Cal. App.) 254 P. 681.

[8] Many authorities are cited as to the standard of care required on the part of operators of street cars in passing persons or vehicles on or dangerously near the car tracks. It would serve no useful or other purpose to attempt a differentiation of the cases cited. In no cited case are we presented with facts similar to those appearing here. We are content to hold that in this particular case the duty of care and watchfulness remained incumbent on the servants of defendant company throughout, and until the entire length of the car had passed the truck. With two operators aware of the immediate situation and its dangers, and with the plaintiff in full view advising of the nearness of the truck and the possibility of passage, it would be indeed a harsh and unusual rule that would hold the operators free from all further care as soon as the front end of the car passed in safety.

An interesting and instructive discussion on the law applicable is found in the case of Davidson Bros. Co. v. Des Moines City R. R., 170 Iowa, 467, 153 N. W. 59, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 1226. Without quoting therefrom, it is sufficient to state that the views hereinbefore expressed find ample support therein. In Annotated Cases 1917C, at page 1229, following the report of the Davidson Case, is an exhaustive annotation covering the entire subject, and citing authorities from many jurisdictions upholding the doctrine announced in the reported case.

[9] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury, and that the error thus committed prejudiced the rights of appellant to an extent requiring a reversal of the judgment.

In this connection but two instructions given are called to our attention, viz.:

A. "I instruct you that it is the duty of the Key System Transit Company through its servants in control of its cars to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to avoid colliding with vehicles on or near its tracks, and the company is liable for the injuries or damage resulting if, through the inattention or carelessness of its servants, a car collides with a vehicle so near to the tracks that the car could not pass without striking it."

Discussing instruction A.

[10] Appellant contends that this instruction entirely disregards the question of contributory negligence, and, in effect, tells the jury that, regardless of any contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, if the servants of the company were negligent, the company is liable for the injuries or damage resulting. Thus premised, the argument is that the instruction is the equivalent of an instruction to find for plaintiff, if the jury find that defendant was negligent. Having thus builded the case, appellant cites much authority to support the rule that, where an instruction directs a verdict for plaintiff, if the jury finds certain facts to be true, that instruction must embrace all of the things necessary to warrant the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict. The rule has no application here. It would be stretching the wording of the instruction beyond fair construction to hold that the jury were directed to bring in a verdict regardless of anything other than a showing of negligence on the part of defendant's employees. The scope of the instruction embraced only the substantive law of primary liability without reference to any defenses. This instruction was the first of the instructions given to the jury, excluding the general preliminary instructions on credibility of witnesses and burden of proof. The instructions which followed this very clearly and fully set forth the law of contributory negligence and its effect upon plaintiff's right to recover. The jury were instructed that the negligence of plaintiff proximately contributing in any degree whatever to plaintiff's injuries would necessitate a verdict in favor of defendant, regardless of whether or not the jury should believe the defendant negligent. A trial court is not required to state all of the law applicable to a case in a single instruction. The charge must be read as a whole. The instructions given should be considered in connection with each other; and, if, without straining any portion of the language, the charge harmonizes as a whole, and fairly and accurately states the law, a reversal may not be had because a separate instruction does not contain all of the conditions and limitations which are to be gathered from the entire charge. 24 Cal. Jur. 857, 860; Weaver v.

Carter, 28 Cal. App. 241, 247, 152 P. 323; Lawrence v. Goodwill, 44 Cal. App. 440, 455, 186 P. 781; Henderson v. L. A. Traction Co., 150 Cal. 689, 699, 89 P. 976.

In Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, at page 560, 182 P. 281, 285, the court uses this strikingly appropriate language: "The instruction complained of, which is one of a series, cannot fairly be torn from its context for criticism."

We might concede that the doctrine of the cases last cited would not have application where the entire charge contained instructions flatly contradicting each other, and by reason whereof it would be impossible to say what instruction the jury followed. Pierce v. U. S. Gas Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700; Starr v. L. A. Railway Co., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599. Such, however, is not the case here. There appears no conflict in the instructions.

[11] Appellant, in further attack upon this instruction, presents a second point. Before stating the contention, it is to be noted that this last ground of attack is not disclosed in appellant's opening, but was reserved for the final brief. It is contended that the instruction positively directs the jury that "the company is liable for injuries or damage resulting, if, through the inattention or carelessness of its servants, a car collides with a vehicle." In other words, it is contended the jury was not required to find that the acts of the company's servants constituted negligence, or that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, or that the acts of the servants of the company proximately contributed to the injury, but it was enough to find that they were guilty of some slight act of inattention.

What has been said before with reference to the duty of appellate courts to view the instructions as a whole has equal application here. Appellant, anticipating this, argues that nowhere in any of the remaining instructions did the trial court define either the word "inattention" or the word "carelessness," so that the error was not cured by the giving of any other instructions.

The words complained of seem to require little defining. It seems plain to us that the instruction told the jury simply that the company was liable, if the collision occurred through lack of attention or lack of care on the part of the employees. Necessarily, the instruction must be applied to the then admitted facts of the case. It was admitted that, when the car started after the attention of the employees had been directed toward the conditions existing and the nearness of the truck to the car track, these employees knew of the specific hindrance to be met. The case is quite different from a situation where a sudden emergency is met. Obviously, ordinary care under the circumstances was co-extensive with attention and care during the brief space of time necessary to pass the anticipated possible obstruction. Where, as here, the street car is moving a foot or two at a time in jerky motion, and all concerned in the transit have but one purpose, namely, to avoid an object with only a possible inch or two clearance, attention and care are essential elements of ordinary care, and the absence of either constituted negligence. A fair reading of the instruction renders it easily susceptible to this construction.

[12] In addition, the jury were told that a street railway company is not an insurer against any casualty that may happen, nor is it liable for injuries that are merely accidental, and which ordinary care could not have avoided; and were further told that, unless a negligent act or omission of the defendant contributed proximately to the injury, no action for damages could be founded upon it.

While we do not hold that in this case the instruction was erroneous, yet, if it were subject to all of the criticism offered, nevertheless, as the Supreme Court states in Hall v. Steele, 193 Cal. 602, 226 P. 854, "When the instruction complained of here is read in connection with and in the light of the other instructions in the case, of which [appellant] does not complain, it cannot be said that the instruction, though manifestly erroneous, was prejudicial to a degree which would require a reversal of this case."

[13] Instruction B. This instruction is as follows:

"I instruct you that in passing a vehicle beside the tracks it is the duty not only of the motorman to see that the front end of the car may pass safely, but also of the conductor in charge of the car to watch for and avoid obstructions the car may meet at any time before it has entirely passed."

Appellant contends that this instruction invades the province of the jury, and, in effect, tells the jury that, if the motorman and conductor did not see that the car passed safely, and did not avoid the obstruction, they were derelict in their duty. Appellant, in presenting this point for our consideration in the same paragraph, practically disposes of the contention in this language, which we might adopt:

"Probably no contention concerning instructions comes more frequently before the court than the contention that certain instructions invade the province of the jury, and it would undoubtedly be useless for us to enter into a discussion concerning the principles of law involved, principles which this court has had innumerable occasions to apply."

However, the following cases indicate that the application of these principles does not sustain appellant: Wirthman v. Isenstein, 182 Cal. 108, 187 P. 12; Robinson v. Western States Gas, 184 Cal. 401, 409, 194 P. 39.

[14, 15] The instruction complained of is manifestly a preliminary announcement, and sound enough in and of itself. In point of law, it is the duty of the motorman to see that the front end of the car may pass safely, and it is also the duty of the conductor in charge of the car to watch for, and avoid, obstructions the car may meet at any time before it has entirely passed; but in point of law each has fulfilled his duty when he has exercised ordinary care and diligence under the circumstances. All this was abundantly set forth in numerous instructions and found in specific instructions proposed by the defendant and given by the court. Lonnergan v. Stansbury, 164 Cal. 488, 129 P. 770. In almost every case when damages are sought by reason of negligence it is essential that there should be established a breach of some duty owing to plaintiff by defendant. If in instructing a jury, a court is not permitted to advise the jury as to what that duty is, it would seem impossible for the jury to intelligently determine whether or not there had been any violation thereof. The case of Wirthman v. Isenstein is in point. There the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"All motor vehicles upon public highways must be provided at all times with adequate brakes kept in good working order."

In approving the instruction, the court says:

"It will be noted that the court did not instruct the jury that a failure to perform the duty defined was in itself negligence, or, if negligence, a ground for recovery by the plaintiff; it merely informed the jury concerning the duty of defendants in regard to the brakes in the language of the statute. The instruction was not given for the purpose of establishing the plaintiff's right to recovery, but was purely incidental to the question as to whether or not, under all the circumstances, the defendants were driving the car negligently, and, in view of the evidence * * * was properly given."

SEAWELL, J. The question involved upon this appeal is whether defendant, Scofield Engineering Construction Company, a corporation, was the special employer of Howard Wilson Umsted, for whose death, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the employees of said construction company, his father, Howard Claire Umsted, plaintiff herein, seeks to recover damages. If the construction company was, as it asserts, the special employer of decedent, plaintiff was without right to maintain an action for damages against it for the death of his son, but was limited to the remedy provided in the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended) for injuries resulting in death.

[1] The court below, being of the opinion upon the conclusion of the trial that the evidence as a matter of law established the relation of special employer and employee between the construction company and the decedent, made a special finding to the effect that decedent was the special employee of the defendant and that the injuries resulting in his death grew out of and were received in the course of the employment of the said decedent, upon which finding was entered the judgment that plaintiff take nothing by the action. Although the court below did not follow the procedure generally adhered to in such cases and direct the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendant, which would serve as the basis for its judgment, a judgment entered by the court upon the basis of a special finding, where the court is of the opinion that the state of the evidence is such that there is only one judgment which can lawfully be rendered, is to be given the same effect as a judgment entered by the court upon a directed verdict. Without regard to the procedure followed, the determination is, in law, the act of the court. The jury merely acts in a ministerial capacity in bringing in a verdict in pursuance of the court's direction. Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283; Gaskill v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 30 Cal. App. 593, 159 P. 200; 24 Cal. Jur. 918.

The respondent had contracted to excavate and construct a basement for an addition to the New Broadway Department Store in the city of Los Angeles, and at the time decedent received the injuries from which he subsequently died, it was engaged in excavating for the basement of said addition to a depth of over 60 feet below the level of the street. By reason of the fact that operations were being carried on during the night, as well as by day, and that much of the work was being done below the surface of the ground, it was necessary that temporary lighting facilities be installed from time to time at such places as they were needed. In addition, large quantities of electrically operated machinery were being used and the services of electricians were required for such work. Decedent, who was 18 years of age at the time of his death, was an electrician's helper on the regular pay roll of the Golden State Electric Company. The respondent had applied to the said Golden State Electric Company for electricians and said company had directed one C. F. Sims to report upon the job and had later sent decedent to assist Sims. Sims was a regular employee of the electric company. While going to a toolhouse adjacent to the premises where the excavation was in progress to obtain tools at the direction of Sims, decedent was struck by a large plank which was being used in the excavating and building operations and thus received the injuries from which he died on the following day.

[2, 3] Respondent, in denying appellant's right to maintain an action for damages, relies upon those cases holding that, where either by the terms of the contract or during the course of its performance the employee of the alleged independent contractor comes under the control and direction of the other party to whom he has been lent or hired and suffers injury in the course of and in consequence of such direction and control, the relation of both general and special employer exists and the injured employee is entitled to compensation from both the general and special employer in accordance with the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, which affords the exclusive remedy in such cases. Famous Players Lasky Corporation v. I. A. C., 194 Cal. 134, 228 P. 5, 34 A. L. R. 765; Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation v. I. A. C., 179 Cal. 432, 177 P. 273; Federal Mutual Liability Ins. Co. v. I. A. C., 190 Cal. 97, 210 P. 628. If the workmen lent or hired are under the control of the special employer in the performance of work which is a part of his business, they are, for the time being, his employees. Famous Players Lasky Corporation v. I. A. C., supra. As such workmen may under the common law of master and servant look to the general employer for wages and to the special employer for damages for negligent injuries, so under the Workmen's Compensation Law they may, so far as its provisions are applicable, look to the one or to the other, or to both, for compensation for injuries due to occupational hazards.

[4] By taking the case from the jury and making the special finding that decedent was the special employee of the construction company, upon which finding the judgment for defendant was entered, the court below adopted the respondent's theory of the case. Unless it can be said that, as a matter of law, no other reasonable conclusion was legally deducible from the evidence, and that any other holding would be so lacking in evidentiary support that an appellate court would be impelled to reverse it upon appeal, or a trial court to set it aside, it must be held that the court erred in taking the case from the jury and itself rendering the decision. Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 P. 38; Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 P. 631; Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 P. 267; 24 Cal. Jur. 912. We are of the view that the testimony as to material facts regarding the relationship between decedent and the construction company, concerning which there is no substantial conflict, is susceptible of the inference that the electrical work of a temporary nature was being done by the electrical company as an independent contractor through its employees Sims and decedent, Umsted; that the jury might have concluded, without abusing the discretion vested in it as the trier of the facts, that the electrical company at no time had surrendered to the construction company, nor had the construction company exercised, that degree of control over Sims and decedent which would give rise to the relation of special employer and employee between decedent and Sims and the construction company, but had itself retained the right to direct and control said workmen, the construction company merely indicating the result it desired to have accomplished. Pryor v. I. A. C., 186 Cal. 169, 198 P. 1045; Flickenger v. I. A. C., 181 Cal. 425, 184 P. 851, 19 A. L. R. 1150.

Since decedent, Howard Wilson Umsted, while working upon the job, as an electrician's helper, was directed solely by Sims, the relationship between Sims and the construction company would be determinative of the status of decedent as to said construction company. If Sims was an employee of an independent contractor, to wit, of the electrical company, and not the special employee of the construction company, decedent was likewise not the special employee of said construction company. Both Sims and decedent received payment of their wages from the electric company, being paid at a daily rate based on an eight-hour day. They kept a record of their time on time cards, which were "O. K'd" each day by the timekeeper for the construction company and turned over to the electric company by Sims and decedent. The construction company also kept a record of the time said electricians worked. They were expected to report at 8 o'clock each morning, although the regular construction company employees commenced work at 7 or 7:30 a. m. The construction company paid the electric company on what was known between the parties as a "cost-plus" basis; that is, it paid to said construction company a sum equal to the wages of all electricians who worked upon the job and the cost of all materials furnished by the electric company, and, in addition, a sum equal to 14 per cent. of the amount of said wages and material costs on account of the overhead of the electric company, and a further sum equal to 5 per cent. of said labor and material costs to said electric company, on account of profit. Since the cost of the electrical work to the construction company was dependent upon the amount earned as wages by the electricians, whose wages in turn were dependent upon the number of hours or days they worked, the fact that the construction company kept a record of their time is not conclusive evidence of a right to control residing in the construction company, for sound business practice would indicate to said company that it should keep a record of the time worked by the electricians even if it did not possess such control of them as to create the status of special employer and employee.

When asked upon the trial "how or with what means" he was to do the work, Sims replied that Mr. Sayre, who was superintendent of electrical construction for the electric company, directed him. Although it appears from the testimony of Sims, given in response to more specific questions, that the only occasions upon which he received any express directions from Mr. Sayre were when Sayre told him in the office of the electric company to go over to the job and do whatever was needed and on the following day when he telephoned to Mr. Sayre and was told to do "anything they wanted to take care of," the jury may well have inferred that the absence of more specific and detailed instructions from Sayre was to be accounted for by the fact that Sims was a skilled electrician, who did not require supervision or control as to the details of accomplishing the task to which he was assigned. It is the right to exercise control, rather than the mere fact of its exercise, which is decisive. Sims also stated that he had been assisted by several electricians besides decedent on the department store job; that he communicated with the electric company when he needed additional help and it furnished him with the desired assistance; that the electricians supplied their own tools, such as pliers, screwdrivers, and hammers, and the electric company provided an acetylene torch; and that a small quantity of electrical materials which the construction company had on hand was used and the balance was furnished by the electric company as it was requested by Sims.

Sims further stated that when on the job Mr. La Barr, superintendent of construction for the construction company, had directed him as to what was to be done, but not "as to how to do anything." The jury might have inferred that the instructions given by La Barr were merely directions as to the result to be accomplished, such as are required in the nature of things to be given to independent contractors in any case. By reason of the character of the work, it would have been impossible for the duly authorized agents of the construction company and the electric company to have agreed beforehand as to the precise work to be done. Although the witness Sayre, superintendent of electrical construction for the electric company, stated that the electricians sent to the job were working under the direction of the construction company, other portions of his testimony and the evidence as to the circumstances surrounding the employment, as testified to by other witnesses, would support the conclusion that the control of the construction company was only as to the result to be accomplished and that it did not possess such control of the mode of accomplishment as to render it the special employer of Sims and decedent. CHILDRESS et al. v. L. DINKELSPIEL CO.,
Inc., et al. (S. F. 12241.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1928.

I. Evidence ⇐73—In suit to enjoin special meeting for election of director, it may be presumed that annual corporate meeting was called at regular time and directors elected (Civ. Code, § 361).

In suit to enjoin holding of special meeting for election of additional director for corporation under Civ. Code, § 361, it was presumed, in absence of proof to the contrary, that corporation and directors regularly performed their duty and called annual stockholders' meeting at regular time, and that all corporation's directors were then elected for the ensuing year.

2. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 781(4)—Propriety of injunction restraining election of additional director held moot after time for regular stockholders' meeting had passed (Civ. Code, § 361).

Where time for regular meeting of stockholders of corporation had elapsed between time of proposed special meeting and hearing of appeal, court presumed that stockholders' meeting was regularly held and all directors elected for ensuing year, and question whether injunction was properly granted to prevent holding of earlier special meeting for election of additional director under Civ. Code, § 361, was therefore moot.

3. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 781(1)—Appeal will be dismissed where controversy has become moot.

Where controversy existing at time appeal was taken has ceased to exist on account of matters subsequently transpiring, appeal will be dismissed as involving moot question.

LANGDON, J. Appeal from order granting an injunction to prevent defendants from holding a special meeting for the election of an additional director of the defendant corporation, which additional director had been provided for pursuant to section 361, Civil Code. The by-laws of the corporation provided for but five directors, and also provided that "the directors shall be elected by ballot at the annual meeting of the stockholders to serve for one year," etc. It was further provided that "the annual meeting of the stockholders may be held * * * on the last business day of the month of December of each year." This language in by-laws has been construed as mandatory and not permissive. Pennington v. Pennington, 170 Cal. 114, 148 P. 790; Stabler v. El Dora Oil Co., 27 Cal. App. 516, 150 P. 643. After a compliance with section 361, Civil Code, the defendants called a special meeting for March 18, 1926, for the election of the additional director, which meeting was enjoined, as above stated.

[1-3] Presuming, as we must, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the corporation and the directors thereof regularly performed their duty and called the annual meeting for the last business day of December, 1926, at which all directors of the corporation were elected for the ensuing year, the question presented by this appeal becomes moot. As stated in Matter of Guardianship of Ambrose, 170 Cal. 160, 149 P. 43:

"This court is not called upon to pass judgment on a question which, when given, can have no practical effect; where a controversy existing at the time the appeal was taken has by reason of matters subsequently transpiring ceased to exist. When this appears the proper course is to dismiss the appeal."

The appeal is dismissed.

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 1033(9)—Defendant might not complain on appeal because trial court found smaller sum due plaintiff than was in fact due.

Defendant might not complain on appeal because trial court found that smaller portion of purchase price of hay was due to plaintiff than was in fact due to him, since error was in defendant's favor.

2. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 360(1)—Facts held to show that \$4,416.45 was due on purchase price of hay rather than \$4,692.06.

Facts held to show that $4,416.45 was balance due to seller on purchase price of hay after subtracting conceded payments and uncontested sum in buyer's favor, rather than $4,692.06.

3. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 200(2)—Title held to pass under contract for purchase of hay at specified price per ton, exact quantity to be later ascertained.

Title held to pass to buyer under contract for purchase of all of certain hay, stored in a specified elevator, shown to buyer, and estimated at 500 tons, at $20 per ton, f. o. b. cars, shipment to be made on buyer's order within 60 days, and payment to be made promptly on receipt of invoices.

4. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 187—Sales contract, providing for shipment within 60 days, and payment on receipt of invoices, entitled seller to interest after specified time.

Sales contract, providing that hay should be shipped on buyer's order within 60 days, and that payment should be made promptly on receipt of invoices, held to entitle seller to interest on unpaid balances of total purchase price after expiration of 60-day period, notwithstanding that shipment of some hay had not yet been ordered by buyer.

5. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 176(4)—Contention that contract was vitiated by misrepresentations as to quality of hay held untenable, where buyer inspected hay before purchase, and subsequently wrote that it did not complain.

Buyer's contention that sales contract was vitiated by false representations that hay purchased was in good condition, whereas in fact it contained a large quantity of "fox tail," held untenable, where buyer's agent inspected hay before it was purchased, and buyer subsequently wrote to seller that it did not complain of quality of hay.

6. Appeal and error ⚡909(5)—Appellate court will presume that no errors were made in weighing hay, where there is no dispute as to weights.

Supreme Court will presume that no errors were made in weighing hay sold at specified price per ton, where there is no dispute between parties as to correctness of weights.

7. Continuance ⚡33—Denying continuance to secure witness to testify to quality of hay purchased held proper, where buyer waived issue.

Denial of continuance, asked by buyer, to secure absent witness to testify as to bad quality of hay purchased, held not error, where buyer had waived issue as to quality by letter to seller, especially where absent testimony would have been merely cumulative on disputed question of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action to recover balance of purchase price of hay by the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company against Haarer Elden Goss, doing business under the name of Chas. E. Goss & Son. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Conclusions and judgment modified, and cause remanded, with directions.

Hankins & Hankins and Olin F. Nuckolls, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

C. W. Croop, of Merced, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. [1] This action was commenced to recover an alleged balance due, together with interest thereon, on account of a lot of hay purchased on January 12, 1925, by appellant from respondent corporation. Appellant, Haarer Elden Goss, doing business under the name of Chas. E. Goss & Son, with offices in the city and county of San Francisco, was, at the time the contract in suit was made, and for some years prior thereto had been, engaged in the business of buying and selling hay in large quantities upon the open market.

On January 12, 1925, appellant addressed the respondent as follows:

"This will confirm our purchase from you today of all the wild oat and alfalfa hay 1924 crop belonging to you, now stored in the Merced Elevator * * * Company's warehouse at Merced and which you showed to our buyer, Mr. Bull, estimated at about five hundred (500) tons, at $20.00 per ton f. o. b. cars Merced, in good order. Shipment buyer's order within 60 days. H. Goss, E. S. M.

"Railroad weights to govern. Payment to be made promptly upon receipt of invoices. Kindly sign the duplicate copy as your acceptance and return to us.

"Yours very truly, Chas. E. Goss & Son.
"H. Goss."

The duplicate copy was signed and marked "Accepted" by E. S. Murchie, who was the assistant manager of respondent, in accordance with the request of appellant. The total amount of hay delivered under the contract was 999,979 pounds, representing in money $9,999.79. The office manager presented the ledger of accounts receivable at the trial, which showed that deliveries of hay commenced January 27th, and continued until all the hay was removed. On March 12, 1925, the total amount agreed upon by the parties as the purchase price of said hay became due, and under the terms of the agreement all the hay should have been removed from the warehouse not later than that day. The only payment on account of said transaction prior to March 12th was the sum of $2,526.40, which payment was made February 14, 1925. The amount due and unpaid on March 12, 1925, was thus reduced to $7,473.39. The complainant, however, alleged that the amount due and unpaid on March 12th was $7,398.51, and the court's finding that all of the allegations of the amended complaint were true by reference adopted that sum as the unpaid balance due on March 12th. The balance alleged and found to be due being $74.88 less than the amount actually due as shown by the evidence, and the difference being in appellant's favor, the latter has no ground of complaint by reason of said inaccuracy. Other amounts were paid on account, which, according to the averments of the amended complaint, reduced the indebtedness on the day the amended complaint was verified, to wit, September 19, 1925, to $4,692.06, plus interest on certain overdue amounts calculated from March 12th to the day of payment, in case payments were made on account of the transaction.

[2] The day on which all unpaid indebtedness became due, as shown by the evidence, and upon which computations of interest were reckoned by respondent, was March 12th. Accepting that day as the starting point, we are unable, in view of the credits allowed appellant by respondent's bookkeeper, E. N. Brown, who furnished the only figures on the subject, to justify the finding that the amount due and owing respondent at the time of the trial was the sum of $4,692.06, or more than the sum of $4,491.33. It is conceded that the purchase price of the hay was $9,999.79. Respondent concedes the following payments were made: February 14th, $2,526.40; April 10th, $323.20; April 16th, overcharge, $21.70; April 16th, $2,383.25; May 28th, credit, $253.91; total, $5,508.46. By the process of subtraction, the demand is reduced to the sum of $4,491.33. But, as above mentioned, the allegation of the complaint and the finding of the court were that, on March 12th, the principal sum due was but $7,398.51, as against the correct amount of $7,473.39, a noncontested difference of $74.88 in appellant's favor, which would leave $4,416.45 of the principal unpaid at the time suit was filed, upon which sum interest should be computed at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from March 12th. Interest on the sums of $323.20 and $2,383.25 from March 12th until paid was properly allowed. The appellant complains that the judgment is excessive and erroneous; that respondent was not entitled to interest on any amount prior to the entry of judgment; that title to the hay did not pass until delivery and acceptance of the hay; that said hay was fraudulently represented to be in good condition; and that the court erred in refusing to grant the defendant a continuance by reason of the absence of a foreign witness, who, it is claimed, had promised the defendant that he would be on hand. No subpoena was issued for, nor had any effort been made to take the deposition of, said witness.

[3-5] The title to the hay passed to the purchaser under the contract of January 12, 1925. Fiddymment v. Johnson, 18 Cal. App. 339, 123 P. 342. Payments were to be made upon each lot as per shipment, all to be performed within the limits of 60 days. A large portion of the hay was not removed within the 60-day limit, nor until some 2 or 3 months thereafter. Respondent made several demands during the month of March for payment of the balance due and the removal of the hay from the warehouse. There is evidence in the record to the effect that appellant by its authorized agent expressly agreed to the payment of interest at the legal rate from March 12th, if the respondent would forbear in its demand for immediate payment and the removal of the hay. The finding on the question, as well as the conclusion of law which necessarily follows from a consideration of the contract itself, supports the judgment as to the issue of interest. There is no substance in the claim that the contract was vitiated by the false representations that said lot of hay was in good condition, when, as a matter of fact, it was foul, in that it contained a large quantity of "fox tail." Appellant's agent inspected the hay at the warehouse before it was purchased. Moreover, this question is set at rest by appellant's letter to respondent written on March 24th in answer to respondent's demand for payment. Appellant wrote:

"We are not complaining of the quality of the hay as we looked at same before buying and that is entirely up to us but we must have an extension on the time of delivery until the end of April, which we believe you will grant us."

[6, 7] The invoices were sent to appellant upon each shipment made. There being no dispute as to the correctness of weights, it will be presumed that no errors were made.

The application made by appellant on the day of trial for a continuance because of the absence of a witness under the circumstances heretofore related did not constitute error, especially in view of the fact that the absent person would have testified only as to the quality of the hay, which would have been, at best, cumulative testimony on a disputed question of fact. Under the waiver of respondent as to this issue, as set forth in the letter last above quoted from, it is very clear that the testimony of said witness would have been unavailing.

It is ordered that the conclusions of law be amended by striking out the sum of $4,692.06, as said sum appears twice in said conclusions of law, and, in lieu thereof, the sum of $4,416.45 be inserted; that the legal interest thereon be computed in the same manner as it was computed upon said sum of $4,692.06; that the judgment be corrected so as to conform with said change; that the cause be remanded to the superior court of the county of Merced to make the modifications herein directed, and, as so modified, it will constitute the judgment in said cause.

It is so ordered.

ESKEW et al. v. CALIFORNIA FRUIT EXCHANGE. (S. F. 11957.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1927.

1. Sales  172—Seller unqualifiedly contracting to deliver grapes was liable for breach, though quality specified was not procurable in district named for delivery.

Where contract for sale of grapes specifying delivery at M. station was not confined to grapes grown in M. district, seller, having made unqualified agreement for sale of five carloads of grapes, was required, after grapes of required quality could not be procured in named district after first delivery, to procure required quantity, even though in fulfilling contract it was necessary to procure grapes from another region.

2. Sales  418(2)—Damages for seller's breach of contract to deliver grapes were properly fixed as of date it expressly refused to make delivery.

Where contract for sale of five carloads of grapes required seller to begin delivery September 15 and ship one car every other day, on seller's breach of contract to deliver, after delivery of one carload, buyer's damages were properly fixed as of date of October 2 instead of on basis of price of grapes on date of breach of each successive delivery, since, prior to October 2, seller repeatedly promised to fill agreement and only after advance in price on October 2 did he announce refusal to comply with contract.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Edgar H. Eskew and another, co-partners doing business under the firm name and style of E. H. Eskew & Son, against the California Fruit Exchange. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. G. Gallaher, Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, and Gallaher & Jertberg, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Conley, Conley & Conley, W. M. Conley, Philip Conley, Matthew Conley, all of Fresno, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff, a copartnership, against the defendant corporation to recover damages for the alleged failure of the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff certain Zinfandel grapes during the season of 1924, pursuant to a contract in writing between the aforesaid parties so to do, which contract was in the words and figures as follows:

"Fresno, Cal., August 22, 1924.

"California Fruit Exchange, seller, has sold and E. H. Eskew & Son, buyers, have bought 5 cars Zinfandel grapes at $77.50 per ton, unlidded L. A. lugs, f. o. b. cars at Minkler, Cal., loaded in refrigerator cars. Shipping dates: Beginning September 15, 1924, one car every other day till order is filled.

"Terms of payment: $1,000 to be paid by buyer on signing of this contract, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, to be applied on payment as cars are loaded at the rate of $200 per car. Balance for each car to be paid when car is loaded.

"Said grapes to meet requirements of United States grade No. 1.

"It is understood that this sale is contingent upon climatic conditions, fire, failure of transportation service, strikes, or other casualties over which seller has no control, and seller is hereby released from all liability hereunder in event of failure to ship said fruit on account of said casualties save and except to return any part of advance payment which has not been applied on payment for cars shipped. E. H. Eskew & Son, by E. H. Eskew. California Fruit Exchange by L. G. Haight, Dist. Mgr."

Pursuant to such contract the defendant delivered to the plaintiff at Minkler, in the county of Fresno, on September 15, 1924, one car of the variety and quality of the grapes required by the terms of said contract. A day or two later the defendant loaded two cars of grapes, and these failed to pass the United States inspector as being United States grade No. 1, as required in the contract, and plaintiff therefore refused to accept these two latter shipments of grapes; whereupon the defendant notified the plaintiff that owing to weather conditions existing just prior to that time in the Minkler district no more grapes which would grade United States No. 1 would be shipped. Upon the execution of said contract the plaintiff had advanced to the defendant the sum of $1,000 as required by the terms thereof, and which sum was to be applied as payment on such grapes as were accepted at the rate of $200 per car. After some conferences and correspondence between the parties, in the course of which the plaintiff urged the defendant to procure the grapes elsewhere if it was unable to supply them from the Minkler district, the defendant, on or about September 30, 1924, notified the plaintiff that it would not be in a position to fulfill its contract, and undertook to return to the plaintiff the sum of $800, the check for which, however, the plaintiff refused to accept as in full of the defendant's obligation, and accordingly returned the same to the defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted the present action, setting forth in its complaint substantially the foregoing facts, and seeking damages in the sum of $3,173.12½ arising from the breach of said contract, and also seeking to recover the $800, balance of the plaintiff's advancement thereon. The defendant, in its answer, undertook to plead that in entering into said contract it was acting as the agent for other persons in the sale of carloads of grapes, and that its principals were disclosed and known to plaintiff at the time of making the contract. The defendant further pleaded that the contract referred to grapes to be grown in the Minkler district and not elsewhere, and that since by reason of climatic conditions in said district it was unable to supply grapes available to meet the requirements of United States grade No. 1 after the date of shipment of the first carload of grapes, it was absolved from liability under said contract. Upon the trial of the cause the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it found against the defendant upon both of its aforesaid defenses and directed judgment to be entered for plaintiff in the sum of $1,142.10 damages and for the further sum of $800, the amount of its unapplied advancement upon said contract. Judgment having been entered accordingly, the defendant has taken this appeal.

[1] The only two contentions which are urged upon this appeal are, first, as to the proper interpretation of the terms of said contract, and, second, as to the proper estimation of damages for the breach thereof. The appellant insists that under the terms of the contract its sale and shipments of grapes were to be confined to grapes grown in the Minkler district, and that since upon the evidence and findings of the trial court no grapes measuring up to the standard required by the contract were to be procured in said district after the first delivery, it was not bound to make further deliveries under its said agreement. The interpretation which the trial court placed upon the contract was contrary to that for which the defendant contends in the foregoing regard. From an inspection of the contract we are satisfied that the interpretation placed upon it by the trial court must be upheld, since the sale and delivery of the grapes agreed to be supplied thereunder were clearly not confined to grapes grown in the Minkler district. The contract was a general and unqualified agreement for the sale of five carloads of grapes of a certain standard, and this being so it was the duty of the seller under the terms of the contract to procure the required quantity of such grapes from whatever place or places they were procurable, and even to go into the market, if necessary, and obtain the grapes required for the fulfillment of its contract. The findings of the trial court show that grapes of the kind and quality required by the terms of the contract were procurable in the very region, though not in the precise vicinity from which its shipments were to be made. This being so, the defendant was clearly liable under the terms of its contract for its failure to procure and make delivery of the required quantity of grapes provided for in its agreement. The rule on that subject is well stated in the case of Pearson v. McKinney, 160 Cal. 649-654, 117 P. 919, 921, wherein it is stated as follows:

"Where one makes an unqualified agreement to sell goods to be delivered at a fixed time, or on demand of the buyer within a stated period, and it is inherently possible to obtain the goods, the fact that the seller may have expected to manufacture the goods himself, or to procure them from a certain source, and has not been able to complete or obtain them when delivery is due, does not excuse performance. In that event, his contract being unconditional and unqualified, he must go into the market if necessary and obtain the goods, and he will be liable in damages for nondelivery. 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1103."

[2] The next and final contention of the appellant is that the court was in error in its admeasurement of damages for the breach of said agreement. This contention is based upon the theory that the contract for the delivery of the grapes was breached as to each carload thereof upon the failure of the defendant to deliver such carload on the date specified in the contract for the delivery thereof, and that this being so the plaintiff's damages should have been reckoned upon the basis of the market price of such grapes upon the date of the breach of each successive delivery, and not upon the date when the defendant finally and expressly refused to make delivery of the remaining carloads of said grapes. We are satisfied, however, that, under the terms of the contract and the evidence in the case, the trial court was correct in its fixation of the date of October 2, 1924, as the time at which the plaintiff's damages for defendant's breach of its agreement were to be reckoned. Prior to that date and after the defendant's first failure to make delivery, in conferences between the plaintiff and the defendant, the latter repeatedly promised to endeavor to fulfill the terms of its agreement, and it was only after the market price of Zinfandel grapes of the required quality had increased to $100 a ton that the defendant finally and on the 2d of October, announced its refusal to further endeavor to comply with the terms of its agreement. This being so, the latter date was properly adopted by the trial court as the date upon which to ascertain the market value of grapes of the required kind and quality for the purpose of admeasuring the plaintiff's damages for the breach of the aforesaid agreement. It is not contended herein that having thus properly adopted such date the trial court made any error in calculation as to the amount of the plaintiff's recovery.

No other error appearing herein, the judgment is affirmed.

ROSENBERG et al. v. GEO. A. MOORE & CO. (S. F. 11757.)★

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Sales §89—Seller's repudiation of modification of sale contract held to excuse buyers from making further payments as prerequisite to claim against seller for defective goods.

Where wiping rags sold were defective, and seller agreed that buyers, who had paid for some shipments in full on presentation of documents, could sort them and reject those not conforming to contract, and make claim for refund, seller's later repudiation of such modification of sale contract made further payments on presentation of documents unnecessary as prerequisite to buyer's claims against seller for defect in rags furnished.

2. Witnesses §37(1)—Testimony of buyer present at sorting and weighing as to amount of goods not conforming to contract held competent.

In buyer's action against seller which had agreed that buyer could sort wiping rags sold, reject those not conforming to contract, and claim refund, one plaintiff's testimony that rags were sorted under his supervision, he being actually present most of time, that he was present when rejects were weighed, and that weight was noted on tags by employee in his presence, and that he added up items on tags and knew result was correct, was competent without testimony of employee who noted weight of rejects on tags.

3. Evidence §519—In buyer's action against seller, evidence of amount of defective wiping rags reached by averaging samples taken at random held admissible.

In buyer's action against seller which had agreed that buyer could have wiping rags sold sorted, reject those not complying with contract, and receive refund therefor, evidence that buyers employed expert inspectors of merchandise, and that six bales selected at random were weighed, opened, and sorted by competent crew, and that actual weight of accepted and rejected merchandise was tabulated, giving average of about 75 per cent. of rejects according to weight, held admissible, especially in view of telegram from seller to its vendor stating that rejects would be from 75 to 80 or 90 per cent.

4. Evidence ⇨215(1) — In buyer's action against seller, latter's telegram to its vendor concerning defects in merchandise held admissible, as admission against interest.

In buyer's action against seller based on delivery of defective wiping rags sold, seller's telegram to its vendor stating that from 75 to 90 per cent. of merchandise was defective held admissible, as admission against interest.

5. Sales ⇨417—Evidence as to amount of defective wiping rags rejected held to support verdict for buyer against seller.

In buyer's action against seller based on furnishing defective wiping rags, evidence as to amount of defective rags held to support verdict for plaintiff for value of defective rags rejected, less amount of notes pleaded in cross-complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Joseph Rosenberg and another, copartners, against George A. Moore & Co., for damages for breach of warranty and of a contract of sale, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin and Knight, Boland & Christin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is the second appeal in this case. The first trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendant on its cross-complaint for the sum of $8,331.25, which included $6,000 on account of three promissory notes executed by the plaintiffs to the defendant in connection with the transactions involved herein and expenses incurred by defendant in disposing of rejected goods in the open market. The defendant appealed from an order granting to the plaintiffs a new trial. The order was affirmed. Rosenberg v. Moore, 194 Cal. 392, 229 P. 34. The opinion in the disposition of that appeal is referred to for a more particular statement of the facts which gave rise to the controversy between these parties. A second trial was had, wherein a verdict was rendered in plaintiffs' favor in the sum of $8,500. From the judgment entered on that verdict the defendant now prosecutes this appeal.

It is conceded that the proof adduced on both trials was substantially the same. Briefly, after examining a satisfactory sample order, the plaintiffs, in February, March, and April, 1921, entered into eight contracts with the defendant for the purchase of wiping rags to be shipped from Antwerp by Heymann & Co., payment to be net cash on presentation of documents in San Francisco. Before the first shipment under these contracts arrived plaintiffs inspected a shipment of wiping rags from Heymann & Co. consigned to Charles Harley Company, which contained a large percentage of shoddy material not suitable for wiping rags, and notified defendant that, if shipments pursuant to its contracts with defendant were of that character, they would reject the entire lot. The situation became serious and Heymann came from Belgium to San Francisco. Heymann and both parties inspected the first shipment to arrive. As a result of this inspection it was found that the bales comprising the shipment contained large percentages of materials which were not wiping rags. It was admitted by the defendant and Heymann that, if the plaintiffs were to accept the shipments, they should be entitled to reject the shoddy and obtain allowances therefor. By an interchange of letters the parties then agreed that the plaintiffs would pay for and accept shipments under the contracts and that the defendant would make refund for all material rejected. Thereafter and before the sorting of the shipments had been completed the defendant questioned the amount of the rejections which should be allowed, and as a consequence of this disagreement the plaintiffs notified the defendant that they would accept no further shipments, and the defendant notified the plaintiffs that it refused to admit the right of plaintiffs to make any claim for rejects. Plaintiffs discontinued sorting, averaged the amount of rejects in the portion of the shipments which still remained unsorted, and brought action against the defendant for the amounts claimed to be due as refunds and for damages for breach of the various contracts. Defendant filed its cross-complaint, seeking recovery on said three promissory notes of $2,000 each executed by plaintiffs as part of one of the payments, and for damages for breach of the several contracts. This court, on the former appeal, held that regardless of the European standards of wiping rags the plaintiffs were entitled, under their original contracts, to receive rags which had wiping or absorbent qualities, and that the original contracts had been modified by the interchange of letters so as to entitle the plaintiffs to reimbursement for material rejected. Those letters were dated July 11 and 12, 1921. Concerning the effect of the letters it was held on the former appeal:

"Those letters were written after a controversy arose as to the scope of the contracts and constituted a definite proposal on the part of the plaintiffs that the rags should be sorted, and that the rags which were not wiping rags should be rejected and an acceptance of said proposal by the defendant with the understanding that the refunds would be made after the invoices had been paid. To the extent therein provided we think those letters constituted a modification of the original contracts." Rosenberg v. Moore, supra, pages 403, 404 (229 P. 39).

[1] It is the first main contention of the defendant that under the contracts as so modified the plaintiffs were required to accept and pay for the rags as tendered upon presentation of documents as specified in the original contracts, thereupon to sort the rags, reject such as were not wiping rags, and then make claim upon the defendant for refund. The evidence showed without contradiction that some of the shipments were paid for in full upon presentation of documents, and there would be much force in the contention of the defendant that, under the contracts as modified by the letters of July 11th and 12th, the plaintiffs could not claim refunds for rejections without first paying in full for the other shipments after presentation of documents, if it were not for the fact that the defendant repudiated the contracts as so modified by its subsequent letter of July 23, 1921, addressed to the plaintiffs and reading, so far as pertinent, as follows:

"* * * referring to ours of the 12th inst., replying to yours of the 11th inst., please note that after the inspection of the wiping rags held at your warehouse on the 19th inst., we cannot admit that you are entitled to make any claim for rejection."

After the defendant had assumed this attitude with reference to the contracts as modified, it is clear that the plaintiffs were not required to make further payments as a prerequisite to its claims against the defendant. See Paolini v. Sulprizio (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 380; Los Angeles Corp. v. Amalgamated Oil Co., 163 Cal. 140, 142 P. 46; Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 1, 12, 96 P. 384; De Prosse v. Royal Eagle Co., 135 Cal. 408, 411, 67 P. 502; 6 Cal. Jur. 400.

This brings us to a consideration of the second main contention of the defendant, namely, that the amount of the plaintiffs' claim on account of rejections was not proved by competent evidence. In this connection it should be observed that the defendant admitted at the trial and now admits that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for the amount of rags actually and properly rejected from shipments which had been accepted and paid for. At the trial the defendant went further and conceded that the plaintiffs were entitled to credit for rejections, if they were not wiping rags and were properly rejected, and that it was the province of the jury to determine how much of the material was properly rejected. The controversy is thus narrowed to the question of whether there was competent evidence to prove that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for rejections at least to the amount of the present verdict. By their amended complaint the plaintiffs prayed for judgment for $48,357.81, some $16,500 of which was the aggregate amount of claims for refund and the balance was for damages for breach of the contracts in suit. When the verdict is viewed in the light of the evidence, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the court and jury must have considered, and rightly so, that both parties had breached the contracts; that neither party was entitled to damages by reason of any breach of the buying or selling clauses of the original contracts; and that the amount of any verdict for the plaintiffs should be for the amount only of the plaintiffs' claim for rejections, less the amount due the defendant on the promissory notes and less any further amount that should be allowed to cover any alleged error in the ascertainment of the amount of the rejects. As to a considerable portion of the shipments, the bales were opened and manually sorted, the good was segregated from the bad, and each lot separately weighed and the result tabulated. This method of sorting was followed until, it is fair from the evidence to assume, the defendant took the position that it would not recognize any right on the part of the plaintiffs to reimbursement or claim on account of rejections, at which time the remainder of the bales was inspected and an average of the good and the bad was struck.

[2] It is insisted by the defendant that there was no competent evidence showing the amount of the material manually sorted and weighed. The plaintiff Joseph Rosenberg testified that these rags were sorted under his direction and supervision; that he was present from 60 per cent. to 75 per cent. of the time that the sorting was being done; that he was actually present when the rejects were weighed; that the weight thereof was noted on tags by his employee in his presence; and that he (Rosenberg) added up the items on the various tags and knew the same to be correct. If he was present when the rejected material was weighed and knew the same to be correct, it would seem to be of no consequence that he was not personally present when all the sorting was done, for when the weight of the rejects was ascertained it was a matter of computation to fix the weight of the remainder, as the total weight of the material was known and was not disputed. Nor was it necessary that the testimony of the employee who noted the weight of the rejects on the tags be produced if, as was shown, Rosenberg was present when the weights were taken and knew that the same were correct.

[3] It is also insisted by the defendant that the court erred in permitting evidence of the rejections that were averaged and not manually sorted. In order to arrive at an average of the good wipers and rejections in the remainder of the shipment, the plaintiffs employed inspectors of merchandise whose qualifications as men having expert knowledge of this class of merchandise were, we think, sufficiently established at the trial. These witnesses attended the inspection of the goods at the warehouse. Six bales were selected at random. Their actual weight was first determined; they were opened and sorted by the plaintiffs' crew employed for that purpose. That this crew properly performed its work in sorting the rags is not questioned. The actual weight of the accepted and rejected rags was taken and tabulated. The proportion of the good rags or wipers in these bales was found by one inspector to average 25.14 per cent. and the rejections to average 74.86 per cent. of the whole. This percentage was arrived at by actual sorting and weight. Other experts whose testimony was received in evidence were present when the sorting and inspection of the six bales, or some of them, took place.

The percentages of wipers and rejections in the remaining bales not opened were undoubtedly fixed in accordance with the percentages arrived at in the inspection of the six bales. The defendant produced no evidence on the subject.

[4, 5] The plaintiffs have cited cases in this and other jurisdictions and the statements of text-writers to the effect that in arriving at the total amount, weight, size, quality, etc., of produce, merchandise, and other forms of personal property which is the subject of ordinary barter and sale, estimates may be made of the whole by a definite ascertainment as to less than the whole, and that evidence of such estimates is not subject to the objection that it is merely the opinion or conclusion of the witness. These authorities need not be referred to, for the defendant does not dispute the rule, but contends that the rule does not fit the facts in this case. It is stoutly insisted that the verdict is the result, in large part at least, of averages or estimates applied by the jury without any evidence as to who averaged the goods, where they were averaged, or what basis was used for averaging. As noted, the total number of bales was a known quantity, the goods were in the warehouse, six bales were selected at random for actual sorting, and the amounts of wipers and rejects therein accurately ascertained. On the record here presented we think the jury was entitled to infer that the balance of the merchandise was the same or substantially the same as that actually sorted, and it was not essential to a proper verdict under the particular facts in this case that some witnesses state that the average of the goods not sorted was in weight and quality the same as that sorted. If there be any doubt of the right of the jury to draw such inferences from the evidence herein, it was in evidence by a telegram from the defendant addressed to Alfred Heymann at New York City and dated July 19, 1921, to the effect that the defendant and its representatives and experts had examined the merchandise, had opened up several bales, and had agreed that certain of the rags "could not be justified as wipers before any court, and that the rejections which could be justified would run over 75 per cent. more nearly 80 to 90." The defendant seeks to avoid the effect of the admissions contained in that telegram by asserting that it was sent to Heymann at a time when the plaintiffs and the defendant were endeavoring to compromise their differences, and that the statements therein contained as to the percentages of rejections which could be justified were based on information furnished by the plaintiffs. In the first place, the telegram was from the defendant to Heymann, the defendant's European vendor, and could on no reasonable theory be deemed evidence of an attempted compromise between the plaintiffs and the defendant. It constituted an admission against interest on the part of the defendant to a third party and was admissible for that purpose. Furthermore, in said telegram the defendant stated to Heymann that on that morning, July 19th, "Juell Duval Moore and representing us surveyor Seale chief store keeper of Union Works and contractor for cleaning tankers here twenty-five years standing together with Rosenberg and two friends of his opened up several bales of heavy dark cottons and linseys one bale of dark wipers one bale of light wipers. Each and every piece was thoroughly sorted out and examined," with the results in percentages of rejections estimated by the defendant in said telegram. Juell and Duval Moore were defendant's representatives. The statements in the telegram sufficiently meet the defendant's present contentions. If such statements were true, the defendant cannot complain of an implied finding of the jury in accordance therewith. If they were not true the defendant, on familiar principles of law, should not now be heard to complain. The jury no doubt accepted as approximately correct the plaintiffs' computations as to the amount and value of the rejections. In fact, it appears that the jury gave due allowance for any exaggerated percentages of rejections and arrived at a sum much less than the plaintiffs' estimates. Deducting from the value of the rejects as found by the jury the amount of the promissory notes pleaded in the cross-complaint it is apparent that the trial resulted in a just verdict based on sufficient evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

PURITY SPRINGS WATER CO. v. REDWOOD ICE DELIVERY et al.
(S. F. 12152.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1928.

1. Appeal and error §417(1)—Notice of appeal may be part of paper directing clerk to prepare record (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

It is no objection to a notice of appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, that it is part of the same paper that directs the clerk to prepare the record, and notice so given is sufficient to give the appellate court jurisdiction.

2. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition §60—Label used by defendant for bottled "Puritan Water" held not so similar to plaintiff's label for "Purity Springs Water" as to infringe.

Label used by defendant on its water bottles reading, "As pure and wholesome as its name implies (picture of Quaker girl) Puritan water, trade-mark registered," held not so similar to plaintiff's label used on its water bottles reading, "Purity Springs Water (picture of mountain stream) * * * from the mountains," as to constitute an infringement thereof.

3. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition §93(3)—Evidence held to show that defendant's use of plaintiff's name "Puritan" Drinking Water in advertisement was inadvertent and through error of printer.

In action to restrain defendant's alleged infringement of plaintiff's label, used by it for bottled water, on which name "Purity Springs Water" was printed, evidence held to show that defendant's advertisement, using plaintiff's name, "Purity Drinking Water," instead of "Puritan Drinking Water," as sold by defendant, was an inadvertence, and was caused by error in printer making up advertisement.

4. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition §7—Designation of term "water" in label for bottled water could not be exclusively appropriated (Civ. Code, § 991).

Under Civ. Code, § 991, plaintiff could not exclusively appropriate the term "water" as used in its label reading, in part, "Purity Springs Water."

A. J. Stebenne, of Redwood City, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff in an action for the recovery of $5,000 as damages and for a perpetual injunction to restrain the alleged infringement by defendant of a certain label, device, or trade-mark used by it for bottled water.

[1] Defendant suggests that this court is without jurisdiction to entertain the appeal because of the failure of plaintiff to give any sufficient notice thereof. The record shows that plaintiff duly filed with the clerk of the superior court a paper entitled, "Request for Transcript under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure," which contains the following clause: "* * * You will please take notice that plaintiff in the above-entitled action desires and intends to appeal from the judgment heretofore given. * * *" It is no objection to a notice of appeal that it is a part of the same paper that directs the clerk to prepare the record and, in recent decisions, construing the precise language above quoted, it has been held that "while it would be more satisfactory if the notice had been more explicit, * * * it must be held sufficient to give the appellate court jurisdiction." Anderson v. Standard Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 445, 213 P. 65; Wright & Hogan, Inc., v. Heide, 72 Cal. App. 16, 236 P. 219.

Plaintiff and defendant are California corporations, both licensed to do business in San Mateo county. The complaint alleges the claim of plaintiff to a registered trade-mark under the law of California consisting of the words "PURITY SPRINGS WATER" appearing on labels used by it in its business of bottling, selling and distributing drinking water, and the infringement of said trade-mark or label by defendant. It further alleges that defendant, a company engaged in manufacturing and selling ice, represented plaintiff during the year 1917 and part of 1918 in the establishment of an agency for the sale of plaintiff's product in said county; that as a result of said agency defendant secured a list of the names of customers of plaintiff and consumers of its product, which list said defendant afterwards used without right and to the damage of plaintiff in selling and distributing the product of Mountain Springs Water Company, and still later in connection with the sale of bottled water under the alleged infringing label here involved. The labels used by both parties are made exhibits to the complaint, as is also copy of an advertisement published by defendant in a San Mateo county paper, of which complaint is made.

Defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that it failed to allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also numerous affidavits in support thereof denying that it had ever represented plaintiff as agent or received a list of plaintiff's customers or consumers of its product; and likewise denying and explaining other allegations of said complaint, as will more fully hereinafter appear. The court sustained the demurrer, saying: "The only thing copied or imitated in this matter is 'water,' and that word is not subject to any trade-mark. Demurrer sustained." Plaintiff failed to amend within the ten-day period allowed for that purpose, and judgment was accordingly entered for defendant, from which this appeal is taken.

Appellant concedes, as indeed it must, that the complaint does not attempt to allege a cause of action for unfair and unlawful competition, and the use of the list of its customers and consumers by respondent, nor is there any attempt to predicate a cause of action upon breach of the contract between the parties at the time it is alleged the names of the customers were delivered to respondent. It is unnecessary, therefore, to discuss certain grounds of demurrer urged by respondent, to wit, that two causes of action are set forth in the complaint and not separately stated, one an alleged cause of action for unfair competition and unlawful use by respondent of said list of customers and consumers of the product of appellant, which cause respondent urges is barred by the provisions of sections 338, 339, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the other an alleged cause of action for unlawful infringement of appellant's trade-mark or label by respondent.

[2] The vital question is whether respondent's label was in fact an adoption and colorable imitation of the label of appellant, and was used by it in the advertising and sale of bottled water in such a manner and under such circumstances that the public and purchasers would be deceived or be likely to be deceived and led to believe that they were buying the product of appellant. On this point an inspection of the record can lead to but the one conclusion, that upon the merits said demurrer was properly sustained. Appellant's label reads in part:

"PURITY SPRINGS WATER (picture of mountain stream) * * * from the mountains of Marin County, delivered in all Bay Cities, * * * 2050 Kearny St., S. F., phone Sutter 2197."

Respondent's label reads in part:

"As pure and wholesome as its name implies (picture of Quaker girl) PURITAN WATER, trademark registered, for home and office use (picture of bottle of water). * * * Bottled by Redwood Ice Delivery, Redwood City, Calif., telephone Redwood 155."

Without attempting to convey the exact contour and form of said labels or their complete wording, it is sufficient to say that they are utterly dissimilar in shape, design, lettering, size, wording and coloring. A most casual glance should reveal to any purchaser by what company the water is sold.

[3] The advertisement of which appellant complains reads as follows:

"PURITY—Drinking Water—PURE ICE—Redwood Ice Delivery, phone Redwood 155 (printed in the Ikozian)."

An affidavit made by the bookkeeper for respondent avers: That neither this advertisement nor any similar one was published by respondent, but that while she was in respondent's employ, at the request of students of the Sequoia Union High School, she assisted them by offering to have published in the school paper known as "Ikozian" an advertisement of respondent's Puritan water, as follows: "Puritan Drinking Water, pure ice. * * *" That she was informed that through inadvertence and mistake of such students the first word of said advertisement was printed "Purity" instead of "Puritan"; that when the attention of respondent was called to the mistake it was rectified immediately. There is fully quoted in said affidavit a letter of apology from the business manager of the school paper, in part as follows:

"I regret very much our unfortunate mistake which occurred in one of the advertisements of our school paper the Ikozian. I want to sincerely apologize for this mistake and I assure you that it will not happen again. The editor of the paper substituted the word 'Purity' for 'Puritan' and this caused all the trouble. Hoping that you will pardon us for this mistake, I am. * * *"

[4] As above stated, the only real question is whether the label used by respondent is so similar to that of appellant as to constitute an infringement thereof. We hold that it is not. It is true that both labels advertise bottled "water," but no one can "exclusively appropriate any designation, or part of a designation, which relates only to the name, quality, or the description of the thing or business, or the place where the thing is produced, or the business is carried on." Section 991, Civ. Code. This principle is established by the early case of Falkinburg v. Lucy, 35 Cal. 52, 95 Am. Dec. 76, which has been consistently adhered to in later decisions, and which discusses fully the law applicable to the facts of the instant case. The plaintiffs there claimed their entire label as their trade-mark and asked to be protected in the use of it as a whole in advertising their product, a washing powder. The court found the labels were the same in three respects only—the words "Washing Powder," the directions as to use, mode of making soft soap, and the color of the paper upon which they were printed. In all other respects they were unlike. Holding that the words "washing powder" could not be appropriated as a trade-mark, the court said:

"The owner of such peculiar marks, provided they are original with him, will be protected in their exclusive use by the courts; but only so far as such marks serve to designate the true origin or ownership of the goods to which they are attached. He will not be protected in the use of figures, or symbols, or combinations of words, which serve merely to indicate the name, kind, or quality of the goods to which they are attached, notwithstanding they may be interblended with others which indicate origin and ownership."

In Burke v. Cassin, 45 Cal. 467, 478 (13 Am. Rep. 204), the rule is repeated in this language:

"* * * A word, figure, etc., in common use, which indicates the name, nature, kind, quality, or character of the article, cannot be appropriated as a trademark. * * *"

See, also, to the same effect, Choynski v. Cohen, 39 Cal. 501, 2 Am. Rep. 476; Schmidt v. Brieg, 100 Cal. 672, 35 P. 623, 22 L. R. A. 790; Spieker v. Lash, 102 Cal. 38, 36 P. 362; Italian Swiss Colony v. I. Vineyard Co., 158 Cal. 252, 110 P. 913, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439; Dunston v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 89, 131 P. 115.

MAHER v. DEVLIN et al. (S. F. 11839.)★

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 30, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1928.

1. Libel and slander ☞93—Defense of privilege in publication must be specially pleaded as affirmative defense, where complaint does not indicate publication under privileged circumstances (Civ. Code, § 47, subds. 3, 4).

The defense that a publication allegedly libelous is privileged under Civ. Code, § 47, subds. 3, 4, must be specially pleaded as an affirmative defense to be available, where there are no facts set forth in the complaint indicating that publication was made under circumstances which would render it privileged.

2. Embezzlement ☞11(2)—"Misappropriation" relative to money is synonymous with embezzlement (Const. art. 2, § 1; Pen. Code, § 424).

Under Const. art. 2, § 1, and Pen. Code, § 424, relative to the embezzlement or misappropriation of public money by public officials, the term "misappropriation" is synonymous with embezzlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Misappropriation.]

3. Libel and slander ☞15—To be libelous, publication need not charge crime.

In order for a publication to be libelous, it need not charge the accused with the commission of crime.

4. Libel and slander ☞16—Newspaper article as to recall of mayor and "misappropriation" of funds held libelous per se in exposing mayor to contempt and obloquy (Civ. Code, § 45).

Where a newspaper published an article relative to proceedings looking to the recall of mayor and council of the city and in such article referred to the misappropriation of public funds by the mayor, held, that the article tended to expose the mayor to contempt and obloquy, and therefore was libelous per se, making the publishers liable, under Civ. Code, § 45, for damages, in view of Const. art. 2, § 1, and Pen. Code, § 424, wherein the expression "misappropriation" of public money is synonymous with "embezzlement" thereof.

5. Libel and slander ☞123(2)—Meaning of alleged libelous language, if unambiguous, is for court.

In a suit for damages because of an alleged defamatory publication, the meaning of the language used is, if unambiguous, a question for the court.

6. Libel and slander ☞123(2)—Where article is susceptible of two meanings, one harmless and one defamatory, sense in which understood is for jury, but court determines whether language is capable of defamatory meaning claimed.

In an action for an allegedly libelous publication, if the words are susceptible of two meanings, one harmless and the other defamatory, it is for the jury to say in which sense they were used and understood, but it is for the court to determine whether the language used is capable of the defamatory meaning claimed for it by the plaintiff.

7. Libel and slander ☞104(1)—In suit for libel, evidence to show use of term "misappropriation" of public funds was innocent held inadmissible.

In action by the mayor of a city against newspaper publishers for an allegedly libelous article published relative to the mayor's misappropriation of public funds and contemplated recall proceedings, defendants held not entitled to introduce evidence to show that in stating "misappropriation" of funds they had used term in sense showing no want of integrity on part of mayor, in view of "misappropriation" in such circumstances conveying "the idea of crime."

8. Libel and slander ☞104(1)—Newspaper article itself is best evidence of its meaning.

In action for damages for publication of allegedly libelous article in newspaper, article itself is best evidence of its meaning.

9. Libel and slander ☞93—To state defense that publication, false in fact, charging officer with crime, was privileged, all that is necessary is to allege publication was without malice (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3).

In order to state a defense, under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, and permit evidence thereon that a publication, allegedly libelous and false in fact, was privileged, where the article allegedly charged a public officer with the commission of a crime, all that is necessary to plead such privilege and permit evidence thereunder is to charge that the publication was without malice.

10. Libel and slander ☞98—Refusing defendants permission to amend pleading held not error, where proposed amendment did not relate to alleged libel.

In action by the mayor of a city against newspaper publishers for an allegedly libelous article referring to the mayor's misappropriation of public funds and to contemplated recall proceedings, refusing defendants permission to amend pleading to incorporate matters as defense relative to former council's designative manner in which money from sale of bonds should be used and that had nothing to do with the alleged misappropriation held not error.

11. Libel and slander ☞100(1)—In action for allegedly libelous newspaper publication statement relative to mayor's evidence as to mismanagement of public funds held not admissible, where article pleaded charged misappropriation.

Where in a libel action by the mayor of the city against a newspaper for the publication of an allegedly defamatory article in which mayor's misappropriation of public funds was stated, court's refusing to permit defendants to prove that the respondent had mismanaged the public funds of the city held not error.

12. Libel and slander ☞124(6)—Instruction that there was no evidence tending to prove publication was fair or true report of judicial proceeding held not error.

In an action by mayor of a city against a newspaper for publication of an allegedly libelous article relative to misappropriation of funds and a proceeding for the recall of the mayor and city council, the court's instruction that there was no evidence tending to prove that the publication was a fair or true report of said judicial proceeding held not erroneous.

13. Libel and slander ☞42(1)—Untrue report of recall proceedings of mayor and council held not privileged (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4).

In an action by the mayor for the publication of an allegedly libelous article relative to recall proceeding for wrongdoing in office, report held not privileged, under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4, where evidence showed it was untrue.

14. Libel and slander ☞121(1)—Amount of verdict is largely within sound discretion of jury.

In an action for libel, the amount of the verdict is largely within the sound discretion of the jury.

15. Libel and slander ☞121(1)—Evidence held not to show abuse of discretion on part of jury in fixing mayor's damages of $3,000 for newspaper publication.

Where, in an action by the mayor of a city against newspaper publishers for an allegedly libelous publication relative to misappropriation of funds and recall proceedings, the jury fixed the damages at $3,000, held, that evidence did not show such action on the part of the jury was an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; H. C. Lucas, Judge.

Action by John B. Maher against E. J. Devlin and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, and J. L. Johnson, of Stockton, for appellants.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Action for libel based upon the publication by the defendants in the Santa Cruz Evening News, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the city of Santa Cruz, of the following article:

"A peremptory writ of mandate to compel the mayor and city council of Santa Cruz to call an election within sixty days, to enable the citizens of the city to vote on the proposed recall of these officials, 'for mismanagement and misappropriation of public funds,' was issued here today by the District Court of Appeal."

The complaint further set forth that the plaintiff was at the date of the publication of said article, and at the commencement of said action, the duly elected, qualified, and acting mayor of the city of Santa Cruz; that the defendants meant by said publication and were understood by those who read said publication to mean that the plaintiff had been guilty of want of integrity in his conduct of said office, and of the felonious embezzlement of the public funds of said city; that said publication was false and defamatory; and that by reason of said false and defamatory publication the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $10,000. It was not alleged in said complaint that the article was maliciously published, and no demand was made for punitive or exemplary damages. The answer admitted the publication and alleged that the articles set forth in the complaint was a part only of a more extended article published in said newspaper, the entire article as set forth in the answer being as follows:

"Court Orders Recall Election.

"Appellate Justices Make Former Writ Peremptory in Effect.

"San Francisco, Sept. 4.—(AP)—A peremptory writ of mandate to compel the mayor and city council of Santa Cruz to call an election within sixty days, to enable the citizens of the city to vote on the proposed recall of these officials, 'for mismanagement and misappropriation of public funds,' was issued here today by the District Court of Appeal. The writ was issued on the petition of O. H. Beeler, a resident of the city, acting for a number of other petitioners.

"City Attorney El. R. Vaughn, of Santa Cruz, announced that he will take an appeal to the state Supreme Court if instructed to do so by the defendant city officials.

"According to the allegations made by the petitioners Mayor John B. Maher and the councilmen, George C. Pratchner, Fred C. Royse, Chas. W. Balzari and George R. Gray, committed repeated acts as administrators of the city's welfare indicating their unfitness for public position, one in particular being the purchase of an automobile not needed by the municipality.

"The case was first entered in the state Supreme Court, where it was sent to the appellate court. To-day's mandate followed the failure of the accused officials to file an amended complaint when instructed to do so by the court.

"To-day's proceeding in the District Court of Appeal at San Francisco marks the culmination of the efforts of the city administration to balk those citizens who had invoked the city charter in a movement to have the voters pass on the acts of the administration.

"It will be recalled that many more than the full number of names required by the charter were secured to petitions asking that an election be called for the retirement of mayor and council. These petitions were scrutinized carefully as to each name by City Clerk Evans, who then referred them to the council with the statement that they met with the legal requirements and that it was up to the council to take the action they prayed for.

"Instead, to the surprise of every one apparently save the mayor and council, City Attorney Vaughn brought legal objections to the petitions, asserting that many of the signatures were those of persons who had not read the preamble and did not know what they were signing. Thereupon the mayor and council declined to call the election. This left it up to the interested citizens to apply to the courts for a writ of mandate to compel mayor and council to act. Application was made both to the Supreme Court and the District Court of Appeal. The Supreme Court left the matter to the disposal of the Court of Appeal, which proceeded to issue an alternative writ of mandate. The mayor and city council employed a high-priced lawyer in San Francisco to aid the city attorney in further fighting the recall movement. These lawyers then alleged fraud in the circulation and filing of the petitions. It was expected that when the matter came up to-day they would produce witnesses to sustain their allegations, but there does not appear to have been a single witness to substantiate the fraud allegations.

"The court has disposed of the matter by making the writ of mandate peremptory, which means that the mayor and city council have been ordered to call an election for their own recall."

The answer further denied that defendants meant by the words set out in the complaint, or that said words were understood by those who read said publication to mean that plaintiff had been guilty of want of integrity in his said office or that plaintiff was guilty of felonious embezzlement of the public funds of said city. For a second defense the defendants alleged that the article published by them was a true report of the proceedings before the District Court of Appeal, and therefore justified, and for third and fourth separate defenses the defendants alleged that the publication was privileged under the provisions of subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 47 of the Civil Code of California. Upon the trial before a jury a verdict for $3,000 was rendered against defendants, and from a judgment based thereon said defendants have appealed.

It is first contended by appellants that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that the complaint fails to state any cause of action against defendants, or either of them. Libel, as defined by section 45 of the Civil Code, is:

A "false and unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation."

Any false publication, therefore, which is unprivileged and which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation, is libelous.

[1] It is alleged in the complaint that the publication complained of was false. There are no facts set forth in the complaint indicating that the publication was made under circumstances which would render it privileged. Therefore the defense that the publication was privileged must be specially pleaded by the defendants as an affirmative defense. Swan v. Thompson, 124 Cal. 193, 56 P. 878; Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 64, 214 P. 968. In determining, therefore, the sufficiency of the complaint, the only question left for consideration is whether the publication of the article by the appellants exposed the plaintiff to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or caused him to be shunned or avoided, or tended to injure him in his occupation. If it had either or any of these effects then it was libelous per se. Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 227, 64 P. 290; Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 62, 214 P. 968. In the first of these two cases, after quoting the definition of civil libel as found in section 45 of the Civil Code, this court said:

"This definition is very broad, and includes almost any language which, upon its face, has a natural tendency to injure a man's reputation, either generally or with respect to his occupation."

The article published by the appellants, and set out in the complaint, contains the statement that the proposed recall of the plaintiff and other officials of the city of Santa Cruz was for mismanagement and misappropriation of public funds. This in effect charges that the recall of the plaintiff was sought on the ground that he, as mayor, had misappropriated the public funds of said municipality. In our opinion the natural tendency of such a publication would be to expose the plaintiff to the contempt and obloquy of the citizens of said community who might read said publication. Quoting again from the case of Stevens v. Snow, supra (page 62 [214 P. 969]), we find the following statement:

"Considering the publication herein, * * * it in effect charges the plaintiff with procuring by crooked methods an unjust change in the boundaries of a school district and with being actuated by bad faith in so doing. So regarded, it cannot be doubted that the natural tendency thereof would be to expose the plaintiff to obloquy, which is the equivalent of censure, reproach, blame, or reprehension."

[2] To charge a public official with the misappropriation of public funds coming into his custody, or over which he may have control, is a direct attack upon his honesty, integrity, and fitness for public service. That such a charge would bring the official into disrepute among his fellow citizens, in our opinion, admits of no argument. So serious is this offense—misappropriation of public funds—that the Constitution of the state has provided that:

"No person hereafter convicted of the embezzlement or misappropriation of public money, * * * shall ever exercise the privileges of an elector in this state." Article 2, § 1, Constitution of California.

Similar stringent penalties for the offense are imposed by the provisions of the penal laws of this state, making the offense a felony punishable by imprisonment in the state prison and forever debarring the accused from holding public office in this state. Pen. Code, § 424. As thus used, misappropriation is synonymous with embezzlement, and it has been so held at least twice by this court. Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 108 Cal. 369, 426, 41 P. 308; Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 444, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153.

[3] We do not mean to hold that it is necessary in order for a publication to be libelous that it should charge the accused with the commission of crime. Such is not the law, and it was so held in Stevens v. Snow, supra (page 62 [214 P. 969]), where Mr. Justice Myers, speaking for the court, said:

"Appellants complain that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that the publication was libelous per se, and they invoke the rule that 'it is never libelous to accuse a person of having done that which he may legally and properly do.' The validity of this rule may be conceded, but in its application, the words 'and properly' must not be ignored. It is not sufficient answer to a charge of libel to show that the publication only accuses the plaintiff of having done that which he may legally do. It has never been the law that a publication, to be libelous, must accuse a person of having committed a crime or otherwise violated some law."

[4] Neither do we mean to hold that the publication by charging the plaintiff with the misappropriation of public funds necessarily charged him with the crime of embezzlement as defined by the penal statutes of this state. We do intend to hold, however, that the publication of the article complained of tended to expose the plaintiff to contempt and obloquy, and therefore made the appellants liable for damages under the provisions of section 45 of the Civil Code.

Appellants contend, however, that the meaning of the word "misappropriation" is defined in standard lexicons as simply synonymous with misapplication and denotes merely wrongful or improper appropriation; and when used to designate the conduct of a public official in disbursing public funds does not impute to such public official any want of integrity or dishonest motive, but, on the other hand, it merely charges a misuse of such funds by said official. There are some authorities which are cited by appellants and which might appear to give some support to this contention. These authorities, however, are from other jurisdictions, and, in so far as they attempt to apply a meaning to the word "misappropriation" when used in connection with the wrongful use of public money, they are at variance with the weight of authority in this state. The meaning which some of these authorities ascribe to the word "misappropriation" is so different from that generally accepted and applied to it by people generally that we do not feel that they should be followed by this court. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the article published by the appellants regarding the plaintiff was libelous per se. It follows, therefore, that the complaint stated a cause of action against said defendants.

[5, 6] It is next contended by appellants that the court erred in instructing the jury that the publication was libelous per se, and refused to permit the appellants to prove that the words were used and understood in an innocent sense. We have already held that the publication was as a matter of law libelous per se. As to the duty of the court in passing upon the libelous character of the publication, we think the rule is correctly stated as follows:

"The meaning of the language used in an alleged defamatory publication is, in the first instance, a question for the court. Where the language is unambiguous, it is the province of the court to determine its construction, and to decide whether it is actionable per se. If, however, the words are susceptible of two meanings, one harmless and the other defamatory, it is for the jury to say in which sense they were used and understood. But it is for the court to determine whether the language used is capable of the defamatory meaning claimed for it by the plaintiff." 16 Cal. Jur. 121, citing Lyon v. Fairweather, 63 Cal. App. 194, 218 P. 477; Tonini v. Cevasco, 114 Cal. 266, 46 P. 103; Dauphiny v. Buhne, 153 Cal. 757, 96 P. 880, 126 Am. St. Rep. 136; Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 140 P. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766.

In view of these authorities it was proper for the court to instruct the jury as to the defamatory character of the publication complained of. Appellants sought to show at the trial that the objectionable words published were meant and understood in an innocent sense. There was in evidence the recall petition against the respondent herein, the said John B. Maher. This petition was the basis of the "proposed recall" mentioned in said publication. In this petition were set forth the reasons or grounds upon which the recall of respondent was asked. Those reasons as set forth in said petition were as follows:

"(1) Elected upon a platform of economy, efficiency, and progress, his official acts and methods have demonstrated his unfitness to act as mayor of our city.

"(2) He caused the passage of the merchants' license tax, sponsored and is attempting to continue the expensive and inefficient system of city assessments, and changed the plans of the water system, which will result in the city being deprived of an adequate supply of wholesome water, all without consulting the people and against their protest and wish.

"(3) He is retarding the progress of the city by holding up the pavement of streets where property owners are anxious to pave.

"(4) He dominates and controls city affairs to the extent that his will is substituted for that combined judgment of five officials intended by the charter.

"(5) By his arbitrary management of city affairs and the expenditure of city revenues from taxes and bonds, he has forfeited the confidence of the taxpayers and should not be allowed to remain in office and expend the remaining money voted for city improvements."

[7] Appellants then sought to prove that the words "misappropriation of public funds" were used by them and understood by the public not in the sense that imputed to respondent any want of integrity, but simply to mean that respondent had diverted funds of the city provided for a particular purpose from the purpose for which they were voted to an entirely different purpose or object, and that in that sense said publication was true. While appellants do not admit that the publication complained of does not on its face show that they understood the use of these objectionable words in an innocent sense, yet they did not rely on said publication for its true meaning, but sought to show by other evidence the innocent sense in which said words were used and understood. The evidence offered by them was to the effect that a former council of the city of Santa Cruz had passed a resolution outlining the plan to be followed in the improvement of the water system of said city and the particular purpose for which the funds to be derived from a proposed bond issue for said improvement were to be expended; that this preliminary step formed the basis of a bond election, which resulted in the voting of bonds in the sum of $400,000 by the electors of said city; that, notwithstanding said resolution and the plan adopted thereby, the respondent and associates diverted and expended a large portion of the proceeds of such bonds in a manner entirely different from that provided for in the resolution, so that insufficient money remained to carry out the plan originally adopted. The trial court refused this offer of proof and held that such matters were inadmissible either to prove the meaning in which said objectionable words were used or understood or to prove the truth of the publication. In so ruling, we are of the opinion that the trial court was correct.

To obtain a proper understanding of this question we must go back to the recall petition filed against respondent, and to the reasons therein set forth for respondent's recall. None of the reasons therein assigned for the recall of respondent mentions or in any manner, directly or indirectly, refers to any misappropriation, misapplication, or diversion of public funds of the city. These reasons and these alone formed the basis of and constituted the sole grounds of the recall proceedings against respondent. As nothing was stated in any of them regarding the misuse of public funds, and as the publication charged that the proposed recall of respondent was for the misappropriation of public funds, it is quite obvious that the evidence offered in no way tended to prove the truth of the article published. Had the recall proceedings against the respondent been based upon the claim that he had diverted funds properly belonging to the water system to some other public improvement of the city, then there might have been some semblance of an excuse for designating his act as a misappropriation of such funds, and evidence of such acts might have been admissible to prove the truth of the publication. Such evidence might also have been admissible as tending to prove the meaning in which the words were used in the article published, and that they were intended thereby to refer to respondent's action in directing or misusing the funds of the city rather than to a misappropriation of said funds in the sense these words are generally understood. But as respondent had not been charged in the recall petition with the diversion of any of the public funds the proffered evidence had no bearing whatever upon any question in the case, and it was properly rejected by the trial court.

[8] We have referred to the fact that appellants did not rely upon the article as published as proof that words claimed to be libelous were used in an innocent sense. This article is quoted in full in the preceding pages of this opinion. The first part was evidently a telegraphic dispatch sent from San Francisco; the remaining part of said article is apparently the personal comment of appellants upon the proceedings before the District Court of Appeal, of which the first part purports to give an account. It will be noticed by reference to this article that neither in the telegraphic dispatch nor in the personal comment thereon by appellants is there any intimation that by the use of the words "misappropriation of public funds" it was intended to refer to the act of the respondent and his associates in diverting the water bond money to purposes other than those for which it was voted. The appellants in their comments following the telegraphic dispatch purport to give a brief account of the proceedings from the filing of the recall petition up to the order of the District Court of Appeal issuing the peremptory writ of mandate. In this account no attempt was made to explain the words "misappropriation of public funds," nor was there any mention of the purported misuse of the water bond funds, nor any intimation that the "misappropriation of public funds" had reference to the acts of the respondent in the expenditure of money raised by the sale of said water bonds. The article itself is the best evidence of its meaning. It is free from ambiguous terms and technical language of any kind. We are not able to see how a reading of the published article as a whole, or otherwise, would lead to the belief that by the use of the words "misappropriation of public funds" it was intended thereby to refer to the manner in which the officers of said city expended the water bond money.

In the third separate defense of the answer of appellants, as already stated, they claimed the publication was privileged under subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code. In setting up this defense appellants specially pleaded their publication of the newspaper, the Santa Cruz Evening News, their interest in the news relative to the respondent, their duty to disseminate such news to the public, also interested therein; that the portion of said article which contained the words "misappropriation of public funds" was received by them through the news service of the Associated Press, of which they were members; that they published the same believing it to be a true and correct account of the occurrences and happenings at the hearing before the District Court of Appeal, and solely upon their said obligation and without any malice or intent to injure respondent. At the trial the court held this plea, that the publication was privileged, was insufficient, and refused to permit appellants to prove the allegations of this special defense on the ground that it failed to allege honest belief on the part of the appellants that respondent had misappropriated public funds. In support of this ruling respondent relies upon the case of Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 563, 198 P. 1. In that case this court held that the privileged character of a publication as defined by subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code applied to an article published in a newspaper regarding the official conduct of a public officer. "This is the correct rule, but it does not arise from the fact that the publication is made in a newspaper. It is based on the fact that the official conduct of public officers, especially in a government by the people, is a matter of public concern of which every citizen may speak in good faith and without malice. The privilege of the newspaper is in no wise different from that of any citizen of the community." 185 Cal. 571, 198 P. 3; Snively v. Record Publishing Co., supra.

It was further held in that case that in order for a publication to come within the protection of subdivision 3 of this section it was not necessary that it be true. Prior to the rendition of that decision it was the established law of this state that the plea of privilege under this subdivision of the section in the publication of an article claimed to be libelous would not avail against a false charge. In other words, a false article was not a privileged communication. Dauphiny v. Buhne, 153 Cal. 759, 96 P. 880, 126 Am. St. Rep. 136; Jarman v. Rea, 137 Cal. 350, 70 P. 216. But in the case of Snively v. Record Publishing Co., supra (page 576 [198 P. 5]), the court held:

"We are satisfied that Dauphiny v. Buhne and Jarman v. Rea went too far in declaring that a privileged communication must be true in order to make it privileged, and that they should be overruled so far as they so declare."

Continuing, this court said, on the same page of the opinion in that case (page 576 [198 P. 5]):

"With regard to this form of qualified privilege, no logical distinction can be made between a false charge of crime and a false charge of any other fact of a defamatory character. The occasion and the relations between the one making the charge and those to whom it is made being such that the communication would be privileged, the right of the publisher to speak or write is complete and unqualified, under the Code, except that he must speak or write 'without malice.' When under these conditions he honestly believes that the person of whom he speaks or writes is guilty of a crime of a nature that makes the fact material to the interests of those whom he addresses, it is as much his right and duty to declare to them that fact as it would be to tell them any other fact pertinent to the occasion and material to their interests. If the publisher of a newspaper honestly believes that a public officer has committed crime of a nature which would indicate that he is unfit for the office he holds, we think he is not liable for damages under the Code in a civil action for libel when, without malice, and so believing, he publishes a statement to that effect to the community served by the officer."

[9] It is this language which the respondent evidently relies upon to sustain the ruling of the trial court, in which it held that appellants' plea of privilege under subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code was insufficient and refused to admit any evidence in support thereof. The question thus presented is a matter of pleading. No such question was before the court in the case of Snively v. Record Publishing Co., supra. The language last quoted was not used in passing upon the merits of any pleading in that case, but was employed in discussing the extent to which the publisher of a newspaper might go in commenting upon the acts of a public officer and still keep within the protection of subdivision 3 of said section of the Civil Code. The court held that, according to the Code section, the article must have been published without malice in order to be privileged, but that to show an absence of malice the publisher was not required to prove that the article was true, but only that he honestly believed it to be true, or in the case then before the court where the publication had accused the officer of a criminal offense, which was false, it was necessary for the publisher, in order to prove an absence of malice and, therefore, that the publication was privileged, to prove that he honestly believed that the officer had committed the offense charged. The court then went on to show in the Snively Case that the kind of malice contemplated by the provision of the Code upon the subject of libel and slander was actual or express malice or distinguished from "that somewhat fictional form of malice sometimes described as 'a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse,' or as 'the absence of legal excuse.'" It is quite obvious that the court in these discussions had under consideration the subject of malice, and the probative facts necessary to prove its existence, or want of existence. The answer in the Snively Case, setting up that the article published was privileged under subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code, contained no allegation that the defendant in that case believed that the article published was true, or that the defendant believed the officer charged was guilty of the crime charged. It simply alleged the article was published without malice, and in effect was precisely like the answer in the present action. Its sufficiency was neither raised by the parties nor considered by the court, and we are unable to construe any language in that case as holding that in pleading that a publication, false in fact, was privileged under subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code, it was necessary to allege in addition to the fact that the article was published without malice, that the publisher honestly believed it to be true, or that, where the article charged a public officer with the commission of a crime, the defendant must allege that he honestly believed the officer guilty of the crime charged. All that is necessary in such cases is to charge that the publication was without malice. It was, accordingly, error for the trial court to have refused to permit appellants to introduce evidence in support of their third separate defense.

[10,11] It was not error for the trial court to deny appellants' application to file an amendment to this separate defense. The proposed amendment offered during the trial referred simply to the action of the former council of said city, already referred to, in passing a resolution designating the manner in which the money derived from the sale of bonds, voted by said city for the purpose of improving its water system, should be spent, and that respondent and his associates on the city council diverted this money to other purposes. As already stated, the acts of the respondent in reference to the expenditure of said bond money was not included in the grounds or reasons assigned for the recall of respondent, and they therefore cannot in any manner be relied upon as justifying the publication of that portion of the article, wherein it is stated that the proposed recall of respondent was for the misappropriation of public funds. For the same reason the court did not err in denying appellants' offer to prove that respondent had mismanaged the public funds of the city.

[12,13] The court instructed the jury "that there is no evidence tending to prove that said publication was a fair or true report of said judicial proceeding." Appellants complain of the giving of this instruction. As we have stated, the recall proceedings against respondent were not based upon any charge of misapplication or misappropriation of public funds, and we do not think that appellants seriously contend to the contrary. They do claim, however, that the recall proceedings against some of the members of the city council were based upon what they assert was an improper diversion of the water bond money from the purpose for which it was voted, and that the report of the proceedings before the District Court of Appeal did not single out the respondent, but referred to him and his associates, and that the "proposed recall of these officials" was "for mismanagement and misappropriation of public funds." In other words, appellants contend that evidence that some of "these officials" were charged with the misappropriation of public funds justified the publication as true of the article stating that all of said officials had been so charged, even though no such charge had been made against respondent. We are not impressed with this argument. If A and B were in court, A charged with speeding and B with larceny, a report of the proceedings that A and B were before the court charged with larceny could hardly be considered a true report of said proceedings, in so far as the same related to A, and we are inclined to the belief that he would have just and legal cause to object to the publication of such a report, and we hardly believe it could be successfully contended that evidence that the report was true as regards to the charge against B would be any evidence that it was true as to the charge against A. The instruction of the court was therefore justified by the evidence adduced at the trial. The report as published being untrue was not privileged under the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 47 of the Civil Code. To sustain their plea that the publication was privileged under this provision of the Code, the appellants offered in evidence the affidavits filed in the recall proceedings against the members of the city council setting forth the grounds or reasons upon which it was sought to recall these officials. The court sustained an objection to these affidavits. From what we have already said it is apparent that these affidavits were inadmissible in evidence against this respondent, and the ruling of the court thereon was correct. Neither did the court err in the giving of an instruction regarding damages nor in refusing to give a proposed instruction upon the same subject offered by the appellants.

[14, 15] It is finally contended that the verdict was excessive. This was a matter largely within the sound discretion of the jury. We cannot say from the evidence that there was any abuse of discretion on the part of the jury in fixing the amount of damages sustained by respondent.

For the error of the court in refusing to permit appellants to offer evidence in support of their third separate defense, the judgment is reversed.

DENNING et al. v. GREEN et al. (Civ. 6013.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 18, 1928.

1. Taxation ⚡810(3)—Where plaintiffs and defendant both claimed title through same person, plaintiffs need not show such person had title to recover.

In suit to quiet title, in which defendant set up tax deed on sale for nonpayment of taxes by grantor of plaintiffs showing conveyance from such grantor to plaintiffs, without further establishing that grantor had title, was sufficient to authorize recovery for plaintiff.

2. Quieting title ⚡12(1)—Plaintiffs, suing to quiet title, need not have possession.

Proceeding to quiet title may be maintained by claimant not in possession, and plaintiffs, suing to quiet title, need not prove possession, especially where court's findings determine that defendant was never in possession.

3. Taxation ⚡814(1)—On showing defendant, claiming under tax deed, received rent greater than taxes, penalties, and costs, judgment quieting title in plaintiff, not conditional on payment of such items, held proper.

In suit to quiet title, where defendant claimed under tax deed, and finding supported by evidence showed defendant had received in rents more than taxes, penalties, and costs paid, and that tender of such items had been made in open court and refused by defendant, judgment for plaintiffs, not conditional on payment of such items, was proper.

4. Taxation ⚡734(7)—Quieting title against defendant, whose tax deed was not based on compliance with requirements of law, held proper.

In suit to quiet title, in which defendant claimed under tax deed, where findings, supported by evidence, showed legal requirements with respect to sale for taxes were never complied with in many particulars, quieting title in plaintiffs was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Marie D. Denning, formerly known as Marie Darling Fyfe, and others, against M. Green and others to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert L. Levy, of San Francisco (A. L. Pierovich, of Jackson, of counsel), for appellant. J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title. The complaint is in the usual form. A dismissal was entered as to defendants C. B. Murphy and Oak Peters, and defendant Lillie F. Anderson filed a disclaimer. Issue was joined by defendant Green's amended answer and cross-complaint. Plaintiff claimed title through one Lucy J. Benjamin. Defendant and appellant Green claimed under a tax sale of the property at a time when it was assessed to Lucy J. Benjamin. At the trial plaintiffs offered this deed from Lucy J. Benjamin in evidence, and rested. Defendant Green, for the purpose of defeating plaintiffs' title and quieting his claim as against them, thereupon offered in evidence a certain alleged deed from the tax collector of the county of Sonoma to one Lichtenberg and a quitclaim deed from Lichtenberg to himself. The admission of the deeds was objected to on the grounds: (1) That defendants' answer and cross-complaint failed to set forth that the proceedings leading up to the execution of the tax deed had been complied with; (2) that there was no foundation laid for the admission of the deed, in that no deed to the state of California was offered showing the right of the tax collector to make the deed, and the deed itself contained no such recital. Certain other objections were made against the reception of the deeds in evidence. The deeds were admitted subject to the objections.

At the conclusion of the trial, the court, among other facts, found that Lucy J. Benjamin, a widow, was, on the 23d day of November, 1910, the owner in fee simple absolute of the real property in question, and that while such owner she conveyed to the plaintiffs as joint tenants her interest therein, subject to a life estate reserved in herself; that thereafter she died, and plaintiffs thereupon became, and ever since have been, and still are, the owners of the property as joint tenants, with the right of survivorship as recited in the deed of Lucy J. Benjamin. It further found that no deed by the tax collector of the county of Sonoma was ever made to the state of California of the property described in the action, at the expiration of five years after a purported sale to the state for nonpayment of state and county taxes for the year 1916; that, prior to the purported sale of the property by the tax collector to Lichtenberg, neither the tax collector nor any one on his behalf ever mailed a copy of the delinquent list or notice of sale of the property to the state, nor to the party to whom the property was last assessed at his last known place of address; that the property was so assessed to Lucy J. Benjamin. Additional findings are to the effect that plaintiffs did in open court offer to pay to defendant Green the full amount of all taxes, penalties, and costs paid out and expended by J. Lichtenberg in pursuit of the state's title to the property sold, less the amounts of rents collected from said property by said defendant, under and by virtue of the purported sale by the state to Lichtenberg, but that defendant Green refused to accept the same. As conclusions of law, the court determined that plaintiffs were entitled to possession of the property and to a decree quieting their title thereto as against the defendant Green, and judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant Green appeals from the judgment. He claims that it is against law, and that the evidence is insufficient to support it or the findings of the court, for the reasons: (1) That plaintiffs failed to prove any title in themselves or in their grantor Lucy J. Benjamin; (2) that there is no proof that the plaintiffs or their grantor were in possession of the property; (3) that plaintiffs must prove title in themselves, and, failing to do so, cannot be affected by defendant's adverse claim; (4) that, even conceding respondents to have proved their title, the judgment herein is defective, for the reason that it does not require, as a condition precedent to the quieting of plaintiffs' title, the payment by the plaintiffs to the defendant of the amount of the assessment, penalties, and costs and the legal rate of interest thereon, without which such judgment and decree cannot be given.

[1-4] The evidence as above recited shows that both plaintiffs and defendant acquired their title from Lucy J. Benjamin, for the deed offered by defendant in evidence recites that the property was assessed to Lucy J. Benjamin in 1916, and was sold to J. Lichtenberg for nonpayment of taxes for that year. Hence the record shows that defendant claims by virtue of a quasi conveyance from Lucy J. Benjamin because of the nonpayment of her taxes. Both parties therefore claim under a common source of title. Under these circumstances it was sufficient for plaintiff to show a conveyance of title from that source without further establishing that the grantor herself had title. McGorray v. Robinson, 135 Cal. 312, 67 P. 279; Phillips v. Menotti, 167 Cal. 328, 139 P. 796; Rockey v. Vieux, 179 Cal. 681, 178 P. 712; Jeffers v. Hulen, 52 Cal. App. 590, 199 P. 350. Nor was it necessary for plaintiffs to prove possession in order to maintain their action. Such a proceeding may be maintained by a claimant not in possession. Phillips v. Menotti, supra. Moreover, by its findings the court determined that defendant was never in possession. Equally without merit is the claim that the judgment should have been made conditional on the repayment by plaintiffs to the defendant of all taxes, penalties, and costs paid for by him in pursuit of his title. The record shows that such tender was made in open court and refused by the defendant. The findings which are supported by the evidence further show that the defendant wrongfully collected the sum of $920 in rents from tenants occupying the property, and that he has ever since retained the same to his own use and benefit. They further show that the total sum paid by Lichtenberg in taxes, penalties, and costs, with interest, amounted to but the sum of $254.49. The defendant therefore already had an amount greatly in excess of that to which he was rightfully entitled. The findings, which are fully supported by the evidence, show that the requirements of the law with respect to the sale of property for nonpayment of taxes were never complied with in many particulars, and the court was justified in concluding that the purported sale of the property to Lichtenberg was invalid and void, and that plaintiffs were entitled to a decree quieting their title.

The judgment is affirmed.

Corroboration of accomplice held sufficient to sustain conviction of robbery in the second degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Frederick Tubb was convicted of robbery in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Milton H. Silverberg, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant and one Erbert Gottwald were jointly charged with having committed the crime of robbery in the county of Los Angeles on or about July 6, 1927. Gottwald pleaded guilty, and testified as a witness for the people. Tubb was convicted of robbery of the second degree, moved for a new trial, which was denied, and appeals from the judgment and from the ruling on said motion.

It appears that appellant, at the time of the alleged offense, had been employed as a general handy man by one Weitzman, the owner of a hotel or apartment house on Beacon street, and of a residence on Fifth avenue, in Los Angeles city. Late in the afternoon of the date last mentioned, while the Weitzman family and appellant were seated at the dinner table in the Fifth avenue house, Gottwald entered, commanded them to put up their hands, took $80 and a check from Weitzman's person, Tubb tied their hands with rope, placed a blue bandana around the head and over the mouth of each of the family, and was then in turn likewise tied by Gottwald, who entered an adjoining room and closed the door; that Gottwald opened the door several times, threatening to shoot if any one should move, and finally escaped. Weitzman freed himself from the rope, and, upon searching for his revolver, discovered that Tubb had taken it. Weitzman then started in an automobile in search of Gottwald, whom he overtook in the near vicinity, and, with the assistance of other persons, returned him to the house, where detectives were then waiting, and placed him under arrest. About two days later appellant was arrested, and, upon being questioned at the police station, admitted to the officers that on July 1, 1927, he had planned the holdup; that on the 6th he caused Gottwald to hide in the garage near by; and that, when the family were seated at the table, appellant went to the garage, and gave a signal, and returned. Gottwald testified that appellant told him the Weitzmans were millionaires, and that he would like to get $25,000; that appellant and the witness met at a theater, in a restaurant, a mission, and in one of the city parks; and that Tubb made all of the plans, explained them, and rehearsed Gottwald on each occasion, furnished him with funds, instructed him to buy a gun, and "asked me if I was game to come out there." This witness swore, however, that he did not purchase a revolver, but procured a cigarette case which resembled one, which he ultimately used in the holdup, and as to this fact there is no controversy. Upon cross-examination Gottwald was asked if it was not "planned between you and Tubb that this was only going to be a fake robbery; he was going to assault you and chase you out of the house, and let you get away?" To which he replied, "Not as far as I know." Counsel for appellant then asked: "As far as you heard, it was going to be a real robbery? A. Yes."

Appellant's testimony and his whole contention at the trial was that he feared he was not in as good standing with his employers as he desired to be, although he had worked for them about 18 months, and was trusted by them; had the keys "to every door in the building," including the basement, and on many occasions was left alone at their home. Tubb did not attempt to deny the occurrences above recited as to the actual robbery, and as detailed by Weitzman, Mrs. Weitzman, and Gottwald, but firmly maintained that "it was all a jest; it was a myth," or was intended to be; that it was planned to be a "fake robbery," in which Gottwald was to be "frustrated eventually, and Gottwald was to get away from the house"; that he "did not imagine Mr. Weitzman would ever think it would be otherwise, my devotion on behalf of those people being my sole mission; I did not enertain any intention of robbery; I did not picture myself as an ostensible hero, but I visualized what I would do if such an occasion should ever arise." He said:

"When I saw the transformation of Mr. Weitzman's money to Gottwald's pocket, that made me fear an attempt to rob, and, putting aside discretion, I charged him, and, during the scuffle he hit me on the head with the gun, cut the right side of my head; it wasn't much of a wound."

[1] The principal ground assigned for reversal arises from alleged errors of the trial court in admitting in evidence certain confessions of appellant, which were later stricken out, and the jury instructed to disregard them. Weitzman swore that he had a conversation with appellant at the police station, and, before being allowed to state it from the witness stand, defendant's counsel requested permission to examine the witness on voir dire, which the court refused, stating that counsel might cross-examine him at the proper time. Weitzman thereupon related what amounted to a complete confession, but said that he remarked to appellant at the time:

"Why don't you tell the truth? I know the whole story, what has happened. You might as well come clean with it and tell the truth, and it will be easier for you."

The trial court, in view of the apparent promise of leniency by Weitzman, struck out the confession so made, as well as others claimed to have been made to police officers thereafter.

Appellant strenuously insists, and cites authorities tending to support his position, that in denying him the right to examine the witness on voir dire, and in admitting the alleged confessions, the damage was done, and that it became too late to cure the error by striking out such statements. If this be conceded to be a sound argument, still the details of the robbery were placed before the jury, not only by the testimony of Weitzman, Mrs. Weitzman, and Gottwald, but by the admissions of the defendant upon the stand. Therefore the sole inquiry for the jury was as to appellant's intentions, which would determine whether his acts constituted a "jest" or a robbery. Tubb swore, and Weitzman admitted, that the defendant positively declared it to be but an attempt to obtain the employer's "good graces." All of the evidence plainly indicated, and appellant admitted, that he planned the holdup. Hence neither confession prejudiced him. Such facts as appellant's previous meetings with Gottwald, the purchase of meals at a restaurant, supplying Gottwald with money, the latter's presence in the garage, the robbery, and Tubb's part in it, Gottwald's escape with Weitzman's $80, and its subsequent recovery, all are verified by Tubb's testimony upon the trial. He reiterated his good intentions in staging the holdup, which he admitted having instigated. It would be idle to discuss at length the contention that appellant's accomplice was not corroborated with sufficient evidence to support the verdict and judgment. The question of intent was stressed to the exclusion of all other considerations, and as to that the jury may well have concluded that the defense was novel, but not meritorious, and this we think is a fair estimate of it.

[2, 3] The trial court committed no error in denying a motion that the case be dismissed, made by appellant's counsel, when the prosecution rested. The corroboration required to support the testimony of an accomplice may be slight, and, although entitled to but little weight, standing alone, it is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. People v. Wilson, 76 Cal. App. 688, 245 P. 781; People v. Martin, 19 Cal. App. 295, 125 P. 919; People v. Garwood, 11 Cal. App. 665, 106 P. 113; People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 480, 24 P. 32. Some of the corroborating evidence in this instance is that Tubb arranged to have the Weitzmans present at the Fifth avenue residence upon this occasion, though they did not reside there, and had not been there for a period of two weeks. When Gottwald held them up, Tubb bound and gagged Weitzman, Mrs. Weitzman, and their daughter. Later Tubb apparently pretended to interfere with Gottwald, but Tubb was the one who demanded the key to the safe, and he made no effort to release either of the victims from their bonds. Appellant's conduct, as detailed by them as witnesses, was susceptible to a conclusion that his efforts to aid them were feigned. After Gottwald had departed, Weitzman's revolver was found to be missing from its proper place in a drawer, and it developed that Tubb had it in his possession. When told by Weitzman to fire it, Tubb at first failed to do so, at the time when Gottwald was running away. After Weitzman had repeatedly demanded that Tubb shoot, and appellant had stated that it would not work, he finally did fire, but Weitzman testified that Tubb shot in the air. There are other incidents corroborative of Gottwald's testimony, but these are amply sufficient.

No other points requiring attention are advanced by appellant.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

FINCH, P. J. The appellants were convicted of the crime of unlawfully manufacturing intoxicating liquor. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial.

[1] Appellants contend that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the information and the proof as to the time of the commission of the offense. It is alleged in the information, filed July 2, 1927, that the crime was committed "on or about the 22d day of April, 1927." The proof shows that on May 13, 1927, the defendants were in charge of a still in full operation, and had about 28 barrels of corn mash near the still and a quantity of liquor having an alcoholic content of 36.86 per cent. Appellants' contention is wholly without merit. People v. Goodwin, 132 Cal. 368, 372, 64 P. 561; People v. Singh, 62 Cal. App. 450, 452, 217 P. 121.

[2] The only other point made by appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction. The foregoing facts were proved at the trial without contradiction. It thus appears that the appellants' second contention is as devoid of merit as their first.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 6105.)*

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Jan. 17, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 15, 1928.

1. Master and servant $\S$ 414—Mistaken stipulation between applicant and supposed employer that latter was employer held not binding on commission (Workmen's Compensation Insurance Act, $\S$ 19b).

Stipulation between applicant for compensation and person thought to be employer that latter was in fact employer of deceased held not binding on Industrial Accident Commission under Workmen's Compensation Insurance Act, $\S$ 19b (St. 1917, p. 848), where it appeared stipulation was based on mistake.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 361—One leasing trucks and reserving control over operation held employer of truck driver as against claim that lessor of trucks was employer.

As between person leasing trucks for delivery purposes, in return for monthly payments for their use and for his services as superintendent of deliveries, and one receiving trucks, who expressly agreed to engage all drivers and pay their salaries and who was to have absolute control of operation of trucks, person receiving trucks was liable as employer in compensation proceedings for death of truck driver.

3. Master and servant $\S$ 388—Father who conveyed his property to son and relied solely on him for support held totally dependent.

Father living with son in house in which father transferred his interest to son held totally dependent on son in compensation proceedings for son's death, where son's earnings were sole source of father's support.

4. Insane persons $\S$ 100—Compensation award held properly entered in favor of applicant notwithstanding adjudication of incompetency following application and subsequent appointment and appearance of guardian.

Where claimant in compensation proceedings was adjudged incompetent after commencement of proceedings, guardian subsequently appearing did not become party to proceeding, and award was properly entered in favor of applicant.

5. Insane persons $\S$ 100—Applicant for compensation, adjudged incompetent between time of application and award, held nevertheless bound by award.

Applicant in compensation proceedings, who after time of application was adjudged incompetent, was nevertheless bound by award of compensation entered in his favor after appointment of guardian.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Patrick Brazel for the death of Frank I. Brazel, opposed by the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, which claimed that William Froehlich was a joint employer. From an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in claimant's favor, the insurer brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. Certiorari to review an award by the Industrial Accident Commission.

Frank I. Brazel, now deceased, was the son of Patrick Brazel, who applied to the commission for the adjustment of a claim for compensation based upon the fact that the death of the deceased was caused by an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. The deceased was employed as the driver of a delivery truck, and at the time of the injury was engaged in the delivery of parcels for Raphael Weill & Co., the insured, under an agreement between the latter and William Froehlich, who was also joined as a defendant. An award was made by respondent in favor of the applicant and against the insured; and it is contended by petitioner, which was the insurer, that Froehlich was a joint employer of the deceased, that the award should also have been against him, and, further, that the applicant was not a dependent.

[1, 2] By the terms of the agreement mentioned Froehlich leased to the insured certain trucks which were used for delivery purposes, one of which was being driven by the deceased at the time of the injury which caused his death. The agreement provided for the payment to Froehlich of certain lump sums monthly for the use of the trucks and for his services as superintendent of deliveries, from which sums, however, were to be deducted the wages of the drivers and certain other expenses, it being expressly provided "that the first party (the insured) shall engage all drivers employed to operate the said trucks and shall pay their salaries, and shall have absolute control of the operation of said trucks, and shall designate the routes to be covered by the same, and any superintendence or direction undertaken by the second party (Froehlich) shall be as an agent or employee of the first party and not as an independent contractor." While at the first hearing in the proceeding it was stipulated between the applicant and Froehlich that the latter was the employer of the deceased, the commission was not bound thereby (Workmen's Compensation Insurance Act, § 19b [St. 1917, p. 848]); and, as now claimed by it, the conclusion that the relation existed was based upon an obvious mistake by the parties, and the provisions of the contract, together with the testimony, fully support the finding that the deceased was employed by the insured and not by Froehlich.

[3] The testimony shows that the wife of the applicant acquired title to a dwelling house in Oakland, to which, upon her death in 1916, the applicant and his sons, Frank and Edward Brazel, succeeded. The applicant and his son Frank continued to reside in the dwelling until the year 1925, when they removed therefrom, and the house was sold in 1926. With the exception of his interest in the dwelling the applicant was without estate, and this interest was shortly before the sale of the dwelling conveyed by deed of gift to his son Frank. This son during the years following the death of Mrs. Brazel was the sole support of the applicant with the exception that the latter occupied the dwelling as above stated. It further appears that after the death of his son, the appraised value of whose estate was $2,500, the applicant was allowed by the probate court a monthly sum payable from the estate for his temporary maintenance. The applicant testified that the reason for the transfer of his interest in the dwelling to the deceased was that the latter had supported him; and while it was doubtless the intention of the deceased to do so, the record discloses no promise to furnish future support, nor evidence that the transfer was made in trust.

The facts of the present case are analogous to those in London Guarantee & Accident Co., Limited, v. Industrial Accident Commission et al. (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 196, and were sufficient to support the finding of total dependency.

[4, 5] Petitioner also contends that the applicant was an incompetent person at the time the award was made and was not represented in the proceedings by his guardian. The proceedings were commenced on January 29, 1927, and after the matter had been partially heard the applicant was on April 19, 1927, by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco adjudged to be an incompetent person. His son Edward Brazel was thereupon appointed and duly qualified as the guardian of his person and estate, and as guardian appeared in the subsequent proceedings before the commission. The guardian, however, did not thus become a party to the proceeding (O'Shea v. Wilkinson, 95 Cal. 454, 30 P. 588; Estate of Callaghan, 119 Cal. 571, 51 P. 860, 39 L. R. A. 689), and the award was properly entered in favor of the applicant, who, though an incompetent, was bound thereby (Redmond v. Peterson, 102 Cal. 595, 36 P. 923, 41 Am. St. Rep. 204; Welsh v. Koch, 4 Cal. App. 571, 88 P. 604).

The award is affirmed.

GENAZZI v. MARIN COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 6090.)Henry E. Greer, Dist. Atty., of San Rafael, for respondents.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 24, 1928.

- 1. Eminent domain ⇨106—Generally, right of abutting landowner on public highway of easement and user for access purposes cannot be damaged or taken without due compensation.

Generally, abutting landowner on public highway has a special right of easement and user in public road for access purposes, and this is a property right of easement which cannot be taken or damaged without due compensation.

- 2. Highways ⇨85—Landowner is not entitled, as against public, to access to lands at all points in boundary between land and highway.

A landowner is not entitled, as against public, to access to his land at all points in boundary between it and highway, and, if he has free and convenient access to his property, he has no cause for complaint.

- 3. Highways ⇨120(1)—Power to provide for drainage of surface water from highways is incidental to power to build and repair highways.

The proper authorities have power to provide for drainage of surface water from highways and to build ditches and culverts; such power being incidental to power to lay out, build, and repair, highways.

- 4. Highways ⇨120(1)—Courts cannot control discretion of proper authorities in providing for drainage of surface water from highways, unless private rights are invaded.

Discretion of proper authorities in providing for drainage of surface water from highways and building of ditches and culverts cannot be controlled by courts, except where private rights are violated.

- 5. Injunction ⇨118(1)—Complaint held to state mere conclusions, and not sufficient to state cause of action for injunction against diversion of stream into ditch.

Complaint by owner of land abutting highway that, by reason of diversion of stream into a wide and deep ditch between his land and highway, instead of permitting it to cross highway, road will in all probability be destroyed by reason of large quantities of water which will be backed up on plaintiff's land, and that it will be impossible for plaintiff to obtain ingress and egress to large body of his land, held mere conclusions, and insufficient to state cause of action for injunction against maintenance of dam and ditch.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Fred Genazzi against the County of Marin and others. From an order sustaining demurrer to complaint and from judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. P. Hall, of Petaluma (J. Hall Lewis, of Petaluma, of counsel), for appellant.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages and mandatory injunction. The proceeding was brought by plaintiff against the county of Marin and the supervisors for the purpose of preventing defendants from continuing to divert a stream from its natural course to plaintiff's damage. The complaint, in substance, alleged that plaintiff was the owner of about 500 acres of land in Marin county. That for more than 40 years last past, and until the year 1927, there had been in said county a natural stream of water commonly known as Olema Creek, which flowed along and across the southerly portion of the lands of plaintiff, and thence upon and across the main county road leading from Point Reyes to Olema; that, at a point where the said Olema Creek crosses the said county road, there had, for many years, existed a bridge, and the waters of the creek, in their natural course, flowed across the road under said bridge; that on or about July 1, 1926, the defendants, the supervisors of the county of Marin, executed a contract with the defendants Cuffe and White for certain improvements on the county road, and in the process of the work it was decided to divert the stream from its old crossing, and carry it in a northerly direction, along the easterly side of the county road, by means of a wide and deep ditch some 500 feet in length constructed along said easterly side of said road in front of plaintiff's land, to a point about 500 yards northerly from the point where the creek flows out upon the county road from the lands of plaintiff; that the construction of the ditch results in preventing ingress and egress to the plaintiff's property without the use of bridges. Other allegations recite that defendants have entirely filled the creek bed across the county road, thereby forming a dam. It is the contention of the plaintiff that the probable result which will follow this diversion of the water will be the backing up of storm flood waters onto his land, inundating the same, and destroying the roadway. As an additional element of damage, it is alleged that the construction of the ditch along plaintiff's property frontage prevents ready egress and ingress to a large portion thereof, save by the construction of numerous bridges. An injunction is prayed for restraining the defendants from the continued maintenance of the dam and ditch, and for their removal, so as to permit the waters to flow along their natural course. Damages are also claimed in the sum of $1,000. A demurrer was filed to the amended complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered in favor of defendants and against the plaintiff. This is an appeal from the order and judgment.

[1-5] It is appellant's contention that the diversion of the waters onto the main road creates a nuisance per se, which limits the use of his land, and which entitles him to injunctive relief and to nominal damages. That this being so, the complaint states a cause of action. We do not think so, as we are of the opinion that the demurrer was rightfully sustained. Generally speaking, an abutting landowner on a public highway has a special right of easement and user in the public road for access purposes, and this is a property right of easement which cannot be damaged or taken from him without due compensation. But an owner is not entitled, as against the public, to access to his land at all points in the boundary between it and the highway, although entire access cannot be cut off. If he has free and convenient access to his property, and his means of ingress and egress are not substantially interfered with by the public, he has no cause of complaint. 29 Corp. Jur. p. 547. The proper authorities have power to provide for the drainage of surface water from highways, and to build ditches and culverts, such power being incident to the power to lay out, build, and repair highways. Of course, the construction of the drains must be performed with care and skill so as not to damage the land of an abutting owner. But the question of obstructing a highway or changing the natural course of the stream so as to cast it upon the land of plaintiff, where it had not previously been accustomed to flow, thereby damaging his land, is not involved in this proceeding. The complaint proceeds upon the theory that the improvement complained of prevents ingress and egress to a portion of plaintiff's frontage, and anticipates that damage might result in the event of freshets. But an abutting owner has not the right to insist that the authorities so construct and repair roads in such a manner that he may travel unobstructed without any act whatever on his part, directly over the highway to any portion of his adjoining land. He may construct bridges to gain access thereto, and it is here alleged that it is possible to do so. As above stated, in the construction of highways the proper authorities have power to provide for the drainage of surface waters and to build ditches and culverts, such power being incident to the power to construct and repair the same, and their discretion in the matter cannot be controlled by the courts, except where private rights are violated. Here the complaint contains nothing except the conclusion of the pleader that plaintiff's rights have been invaded. It is alleged that the waters from the creek, by reason of the change, are carried along the county road by a wide and deep ditch, and that during the rainy season, by reason of the conversion of the stream, the road under construction will in all probability be destroyed by reason of very large quantities of waters which will back up on the land of plaintiff; that by reason of the construction it will be impossible for plaintiff to obtain ingress and egress to a large body of his land lying along said county road; that defendants will continue to divert the waters unless restrained, to plaintiff's great and irreparable injury. These allegations are but mere conclusions, and are wholly insufficient to state a cause of action for an injunction in the absence of facts from which such conclusions may be adduced. It may be, under certain facts, that an improvement might be enjoined where it interfered with the right of an easement of access to land until damages were paid which would follow such use, but a complaint, whether seeking damages after the construction, or an injunction before, must show some actual or threatened injury to a private property right of a plaintiff. The conclusion by the pleader that such a result will in all probability follow is a mere averment of opinion or conclusion too general and indefinite to afford a basis for relief by injunction. Brown v. Rea, 150 Cal. 171-175, 88 P. 713; Willis v. Lauridson, 161 Cal. 106, 118 P. 530.

BOWMAN v. MARYLAND CASUALTY CO.
et al. (Civ. 5977.)*

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 20, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 19, 1928.

1. Principal and surety $\S$ 100(1)—Verbal agreement to extras and deductions held mere noncompliance with procedural requirements of building contract, not releasing surety on contractor's bond.

Action of building contractor and owner in agreeing to extras and deductions verbally, instead of in writing, as contemplated by contract, was only a failure to comply with procedural requirements, which is not such a change in contract as to release surety on contractor's faithful performance bond.

2. Principal and surety $\S$ 100(1)—Surety on building contractor's bond held not released by noncompliance, due entirely to contractor's fault, with requirements that deductions and extras be agreed to in writing.

Failure to comply with requirements of building contract that deductions and extras be agreed to in writing did not release surety on contractor's faithful performance bond, where such failure was due entirely to contractor's fault and neglect.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 395(3)—Finding that building contractor failed to submit, or agree on manner of determining, prices for extras or allowance for omissions, ordered sometimes orally and sometimes in writing, held not too general.

In owner's action on building contractor's bond, finding that failure of plaintiff and contractor to agree on prices of extras or allowance for omissions was not caused by plaintiff's fault, but that contractor failed to submit prices or agree on manner of determining them before proceeding to complete extra work or omit work, as instructed sometimes in writing and sometimes orally, held not too general, though not specifying which extras and deductions were made orally and which in writing; judgment being properly the same as to each class.

4. Principal and surety $\hookrightarrow$ 113—Damages for building contractor's delay and defective work held properly deducted from balance of price in owner's hands before discharging liens.

Amount of damages allowed owner for building contractor's delay in completing work and uncorrected defective work held properly deducted from balance of contract price in owner's hands, as against contention that such balance should be used first to discharge liens, in view of provision specifically authorizing owner to retain enough money due contractor to pay such damages.

5. Principal and surety $\hookrightarrow$ 113—Surety on building contractor's bond cannot object to deduction of damages for delay and defective work from balance of price in owner's hands before discharging liens.

Surety on building contractor's bond cannot object to deduction of damages, allowed owner for contractor's delay in completing work and uncorrected defective work, from balance of contract price in owner's hands, on ground that such balance should be used first to discharge liens; that being matter for lien claimants to object to.

6. Principal and surety $\hookrightarrow$ 113—Surety on building contractor's bond held not injured by deduction of damages for delay and defective work from balance of price in owner's hands without first deducting amount of mechanics' liens (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Surety on building contractor's bond was not injured by, and hence could not complain of, deduction of damages, allowed owner for contractor's delay in completing work and uncorrected defective work, from balance of price in owner's hands without first deducting amount of mechanics' liens, as in latter case money judgment would result in favor of contractor against surety in amount of such liens and owner could recover judgment against surety for such damage; bond being answerable to lien claimants under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183.

7. Mechanics' liens $\hookrightarrow$ 240—Building contractor, not owner, held chargeable with interest on unpaid mechanics' liens.

Building contractor not paying mechanics' liens, as required by contract before payment of price, held properly charged with interest thereon; owner not being obliged to pay such interest from balance of price in his hands in order to save contractor expenses of lien foreclosure suits.

8. Damages $\hookrightarrow$ 189—Evidence held to warrant allowance of \$6,000 damages to owner for building contractor's failure to wire-brush front concrete surface according to specifications.

In owner's action on building contractor's bond, plaintiff's testimony that building was worth $15,000 less than if front concrete surface had been wire-brushed according to specifications, evidence that such brushing could be accomplished even if building inspector did not permit removal of forms until after five days, contractor's express agreement to observe city building ordinances, and evidence that owner, after directing contractor to experiment with other means of finishing front, changed his mind, held to warrant allowance of $6,000 damages to owner for failure to do such work.

9. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 234—Deduction of \$6,041.20 from building contract price for omitted work, which owner, claiming deduction of \$9,150, let to another contractor for \$5,900, held proper.

Deduction of $6,041.20 from building contract price for glass and metal work, which owner, as permitted by contract, directed contractor to omit, and subsequently let to another contractor for $5,900, which surety on contractor's bond conceded was proper deduction, held proper as against contention that owner was guilty of bad faith in claiming deduction of $9,150, which was contractor's preliminary estimate of cost, where both owner and contractor claimed too much and conceded too little.

10. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 232(2)—Contractor's right to allowance for extra work and material depends on whether they are included in contract price, not on validity of liens therefor.

Whether building contractor is entitled to allowance for extra work and material depends on whether they are included in contract price and specifications, not on validity of liens therefor.

11. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 232(2)—Allowance to building contractor for extra labor and material, for which liens were allowed, held properly refused, in absent showing they were not included in contract price.

Refusal of allowance to building contractor for extra labor and material, for which recovery was permitted to certain lien claimants, held not error, in absence of showing that such liens were not for labor and material, which contractor was obliged to supply for contract price, under terms of contract, and specifications.

12. Attorney and client $\hookrightarrow$ 140—Court may fix amount of attorney's fees with or without expert testimony and need not award all fees asked merely because attorney was only witness on subject.

Court may fix amount of attorney's fees, with or without expert testimony as to value of attorney's services, and is not bound to award all such fees asked for by attorney merely because he was only one who testified on subject.

13. Contracts ⚡322(4)—Evidence that cement floor broke because of contractor's admitted failure to comply exactly with specifications held to warrant allowance of damages therefor.

Testimony that breaking of cement floor was caused by contractor's admitted failure to comply exactly with specifications of contract as to tamping and settling of earth before laying floor held to warrant allowance of damages for failure properly to execute such portion of contract.

14. Trial ⚡404(1)—Finding that exhibit annexed was true copy of contract held not equivalent to finding that agreement for liquidated damages was valid.

Court's finding that exhibit annexed thereto was a true and correct copy of parties' contract held not equivalent to finding that agreement therein for liquidated damages was valid.

15. Appeal and error ⚡1033(8)—Assessment of actual, instead of larger liquidated, damages for building contractor's delay, was not injurious to surety.

Error, if any, in assessing actual, instead of liquidated damages for contractor's delay in completing building, was not injurious to surety on contractor's bond, where liquidated damages for number of days' delay before filing of notice of completion by owner exceeded amount of actual damage allowed.

16. Damages ⚡85—Tenant's payment of rent for portion of time before delayed completion of building did not suspend liquidated damage clause of building contract.

Rule of liquidated damages for building contractor's delay in completing work should be applied up until day of completing building, though tenant paid rent during portion of such time; provisions for such damages being either entirely valid or void when contract was made and at all times thereafter.

17. Damages ⚡85—Validity of liquidated damages covenant is not affected by amount of actual damages.

Validity of covenant for liquidated damages is not affected by fact that actual damages subsequently ascertained are less or more than amount agreed on.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by H. D. Bowman against the Maryland Casualty Company, Earl B. Newcomb, and another, in which named defendants filed cross-complaints. From the judgment rendered, defendant casualty company appeals. Affirmed.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and H. F. Prince, all of Los Angeles (Homer D. Crotty, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. This was an action brought by Bowman, plaintiff, the owner, against defendant Newcomb, the contractor, and defendant Maryland Casualty Company, surety company, upon the faithful performance feature of a bond given under Code of Civil Procedure, § 1183, for the construction of the Westinghouse building in the city of Los Angeles. The action was consolidated with many mechanics' lien foreclosure suits. The liens were determined in amount, paid or provided for by the judgment, and none of the lien claimants are appellants herein. The judgment determined many points of dispute between the owner and contractor, and was in a general way like an accounting between the owner and contractor. The full contract price was $330,000. In the settlement made by the judgment, compensation for extra work and material was allowed to the contractor in the sum of $5,441.66, and deductions from the contract price on account of work and material omitted were allowed in the sum of $15,285.40. These extras and deductions changed the total contract price named in the contract to $320,156.26. The amount of progress payments which had been paid to the contractor at the time of suit was $285,150. The balance of the reduced contract price remaining in the hands of the owner was by the judgment distributed as follows: Allowed to the owner attorneys' fees, $2,500; damages for defective performance of work on front of building, $6,000; damages due to delay in completing the building, $12,041.25; damages for defective performance of work on first floor, $4,000. The balance then remaining in the hands of the owner, being $10,465.01, was ordered distributed amongst the lien claimants pro rata. The lien claimants for the unpaid part of their claims were given liens against the owner's property and judgments against appellant surety company by virtue of the lien feature of the bond.

The points presented by the appellant on this appeal are as follows: First, it is claimed that the extras and deductions agreed upon between the owner and contractor and in some instances even the breaches of contract by the contractor amounted to such a change of and departure from the terms of the written building contract as to release and discharge the surety from its obligation upon the faithful performance bond. Second, objection to deducting owner's damages for breaches from the contract balance before all liens were paid out of that balance. Third, certain objections to the specific items of extras, deductions, and damages. Fourth, objection to the allowance by the court of actual damages for delay instead of liquidated damages provided for by the contract.

[1-3] The main point of appellant is that the extras and deductions verbally agreed upon between the owner and contractor, and not in writing as provided for by the written contract, constituted such a change in the contract as to release the surety. This point has been disposed of by the case of Roberts v. Security Trust & Savings Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 238 P. 673, which was decided after appellant's opening brief was filed herein. It was there held that the failure of the owner and contractor to comply with procedural requirements with regard to deductions and extras was not such a change in the contract as would release the surety company on its faithful performance bond. We think the action of the owner and contractor in the instant case in verbally agreeing to the extras and deductions instead of in writing as contemplated by the contract amounts only to a failure to comply with procedural requirements, and, under the authority referred to, does not have the effect of releasing the surety company upon its bond. The building contract, article 4, and paragraph 22 of the specifications, expressly provided for extras and deductions and consequent modification of the total contract price, without expressed limit in amount, although it also provided that this should be done in writing. The contract in specifying the full contract price also says, "$330,000, subject to additions and deductions as herein provided." Therefore the building changes were not changes in the contract nor departures from the contract, but, on the contrary, they were expressly contemplated and provided for in the building contract upon which appellant became surety. Such action was only a breach of procedure provided by the contract, which consisted of following a different method of doing the things which the contract provided might be done. In addition to this, there is a further reason why such failure to comply with the procedural requirements of the contract does not release the surety. The court expressly found, in finding No. 53, that it was through no fault or neglect of the owner that such procedural requirements were not followed, but was due entirely to the fault and neglect of the contractor. It was not so much a change then as a breach and that breach was made by the contractor of the very contract for the faithful performance of which by him the surety company had agreed to become liable. This finding (No. 53) is attacked as being too general and not specific enough to respond to the pleading of appellant. We quote it for this reason, and also because of the facts which it sets forth:

"That during the progress of said work in the construction of said building it became necessary to add certain extra work not included in the original plans and specifications; or to omit certain work therefrom; that when said extras or omissions were desired the plaintiff, H. D. Bowman, instructed the contractor, Newcomb, to submit estimates for the price of said extras, or reductions for omissions, some of said instructions being in writing and some of said instructions being oral; that in certain cases said contractor, Newcomb, submitted prices for proposed extras or deductions before said extra work was commenced or omissions made, and in other instances the extra work was done by said contractor, Newcomb, or omissions made before he had submitted the price therefor to the plaintiff, H. D. Bowman; that the failure of said H. D. Bowman and Earl B. Newcomb to agree upon the price of all or any of said extras or the method of determining the price of all or any of said extras before the said extra work was done or the allowance for omissions, was not caused through any fault or neglect of the plaintiff H. D. Bowman; that the said H. D. Bowman was at all times ready and willing to take up with the defendant Earl B. Newcomb the price of said extras or omissions, but that said Earl B. Newcomb failed and neglected to submit prices or agree upon the manner of determining the price therefor with said H. D. Bowman, but proceeded to complete said extra work or omit work in a number of cases prior to the price therefor or the method of determining the price therefor being fully agreed upon; that said H. D. Bowman and Earl B. Newcomb did not at any time enter into any contract, written or oral, modifying the written contract of March 1, 1922, or waive any provisions thereof, and that any departure from the method provided in said contract, plans, and specifications for the doing of extra work, or omitting work called for by said contract, plans, and specifications, was not caused by the fault or neglect of said H. D. Bowman, and said departures were not material and did not prejudice or affect the liability of the Maryland Casualty Company as surety or hinder or delay in any manner the construction or completion of said building."

This finding correctly sets forth the material ultimate facts in respect to the subject-matter treated, having regard for the fact that the issue was presented for the purpose of showing alleged changes of the contract by the owner of a nature to discharge and release the surety. True, the court might have specified which extras and which deductions were made orally and which in writing, but it is immaterial which ones were and which were not in writing, because the judgment is properly the same as to each class.

The amount in value of all the extras and deductions, added together, whether made pursuant to writing or not, is not great in proportion to the price of the entire contract. Considering the extras, $5,441.66, allowed by the court and claimed by the appellant in its pleading, whether in writing or not, as offsetting in part the total amount of deductions, $15,285.40, the net amount of change in contract price would be less than $10,000 or only about three per cent. of the contract price. Of the total amount of deductions allowed, the appellant and contractor conceded a large proportion to be proper deductions to be made.

[4] It is claimed that it was error to deduct from the balance of the contract price remaining in the hands of the owner the amount of the several items of damages allowed. It is claimed that the balance of the contract price should be used first for the discharge of liens. Roberts v. Spires, 195 Cal. 267, 232 P. 708, 37 A. L. R. 763, is cited as authority for this contention. In that case it was held to be unfair to lien claimants to thus reduce the contract price without any notice given to them in the contract as recorded because the contract price balance was a fund for the protection of lien claimants. It was there said, however, that—

"The owner might well have protected herself against the failure of the contractor to complete the work on time by the insertion of the requisite stipulations in the contract."

Here the contract (article 6) specifically authorized the owner to retain sufficient of any moneys due the contractor remaining in the owner's hands to pay damages caused by the contractor's failure to complete the entire work on time. This disposes of the contention in so far as the item of damage for delay is concerned.

Now, as to the other items of damage. Article 20 of the specifications reads as follows:

"Deductions for Uncorrected Work.—If the superintendent deems it inexpedient to correct work injured or not done in accordance with the contract, the difference in value, together with a fair allowance for damage, may be deducted."

This provision is an express warrant for deducting from the balance of the contract price damages for uncorrected defective work.

[5, 6] These contract provisions may not embrace all of the four items of damage deducted, but there are further reasons why appellant is not injured by this method: First, this is a matter for the lien claimants to object to, but they are not objecting. They are evidently content with their liens upon the owner's real property and personal judgments against the contractor and surety. Second, it does not injure the appellant, because, had the court followed the method contended for by appellant and first deducted mechanics' liens and only applied the balance of the contract price to the owner's damages, a money judgment would result in favor of the contractor against the surety company in exactly the same amount as the lien claimants' liens and judgments against the surety company would be thereby reduced. In other words, if the contract balance of his contract and as a condition precedent which he must perform before payment lien feature of the bond would be reduced to that extent; but, on the other hand, if the owner was not thus permitted to offset his damage against the contract balance in his hands, but was required to turn that balance over to the lien claimants, he would recover a judgment against the surety for such damage upon the faithful performance feature of the bond. Inasmuch as we have held that the surety is not released from liability upon the faithful performance features of the bond, we need only inquire whether a money judgment in favor of the owner for damages would be more welcome or less onerous to appellant than a judgment in the like amount in favor of lien claimants. Appellant has suggested no reason, and we can think of none, indicating any difference between the two. On the contrary, the judgment as given is more in keeping with the spirit of the contract and bond. The contract expressly required the contractor to pay and discharge all liens and supply proof of that fact as a condition precedent for each progress payment and the final payment; the bond, of course, was by its terms and by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1183, expressly and directly answerable to the lien claimants.

[7] What we have just said is applicable to a contention of appellant that the owner and not the contractor should have been charged with the interest allowed lien claimants upon their liens. It was the duty of the contractor to pay the liens as a part of the performance of his contract and as a condition precedent which he must perform before payment of the contract price became due to him. Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307. If the contractor wished to avoid paying interest to lien claimants, he should pay them as he had agreed to do in the contract. In this case, had the contractor paid lien claimants, he would have recovered a judgment against the owner for so much of the unpaid contract price as was by the court awarded to the lien claimants. Such judgment could have carried interest. It has been held that the owner is not obliged to pay liens out of the contract balance in order to save the contractor the expenses of a lien foreclosure suit. Covell v. Washburn, 91 Cal. 560, 27 P. 859, Clancy v. Plover, 107 Cal. 272, 275, 40 P. 394. The same rule applies to interest.

[8] The $6,000 item of damage is objected to by appellant. This item represents the amount of damages allowed to the owner on account of the failure of the contractor to wire-brush the concrete surface on the front of the building as provided for by the specifications. This operation was intended to remove part of the cement from the surface and leave pebbles and stones protruding, thus producing a special surface finish. This item is objected to upon the grounds: First, that the brushing out was rendered impossible by the action of the building inspector in preventing the removal of the concrete forms before the expiration of five days; second, that the owner consented to a change of this part of the contract or at least waived performance of this provision; third, that the evidence is insufficient to support this amount of damages. All of the objections to this item go to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence. The record shows that there is substantial evidence to support this finding in face of each objection. The owner testified that the value of the building when completed without this work was $15,000 less than if it had been completed according to specifications. There was also evidence that the brushing of the surface to the effect desired could be accomplished, even though the forms were not permitted to be removed by the building inspector until after five days. The contract was entered into with the city building ordinances in view. The contractor expressly agreed to observe them while prosecuting the work. While there was some evidence that the owner, upon first learning of the action of the building inspector, directed the contractor to experiment with other means of finishing the front of the building, he subsequently changed his attitude upon learning additional facts. The evidence on this point is also sufficient to support the court's finding or implied finding. After making this deduction, the court, on the one hand, refused to allow the contractor an extra of some $1,200 for attempting to "bush hammer" the front of the building, an attempted substitute for brushing out; and, on the other hand, refused the owner a further deduction of some $1,100 for finish coating the concrete exterior surface, also a substitute for brushing out.

[9] An item of $6,041.20, allowed by the court as one of the deductions from the contract price and forming a part of the total deductions of $15,285.40, is also objected to by appellant. This item differs from other items of deduction only in being larger in amount. The owner, as permitted by the provisions of the contract, directed the contractor to omit the performance of that part of the contract providing for glass and metal work on the front of the building. The owner thereupon let this part of the work to another contract or for the price of $5,900. The owner claims in his complaint that for the omission of this work he was entitled to deduct $9,150, because that was the preliminary estimate of the cost of this work by the contractor. On the other hand, the contractor claimed that the owner was entitled to a deduction of only $5,900, because that was the amount the contractor paid a third party to do the work. The amount allowed by the court for this deduction was $6,041.20. The small difference between this sum and the $5,900 is not explained in the briefs, but the amount of the allowance is not attacked.

Appellant's briefs are vague in presenting its objections to this $6,041.20 deduction item. Appellant states that the owner was guilty of bad faith in claiming $9,150 for a deduction when he relet this work to another contractor for $5,900. The owner's testimony that his claim was the same in amount as the contractor's preliminary estimate of the cost of this work seems a sufficient answer to this charge, but it is by no means an uncommon thing for a litigant to claim too much. In this action both owner and contractor did so. A column of the deductions claimed and extras conceded by the owner, compared with a second column of the extras claimed and deductions conceded by the contractor, and the two columns compared with a third one of the extras and deductions allowed by the judgment show that the trial court was of the opinion that both parties had claimed too much and conceded too little, as its decision on nearly all items lay in the mean between the two extremes of the claims and concession of the two parties.

It is also stated that the deduction of this $6,041.20 from the contract price constituted such a change in the contract as to release the surety. The point is without merit, in view of the express provisions of the contract permitting this very thing to be done. The appellant can hardly claim that this deduction is not a proper one in principle, because it was conceded at the trial and in the pleadings that $5,900 was a proper deduction to be made for this item.

[10, 11] Error is claimed in the court's refusal to allow the contractor an extra for certain labor and material for which recovery was permitted to certain lien claimants. This argument is based upon the assumption that, if certain work and material made a valid lien, it should for that reason alone form the basis for an extra for the contractor. Obviously this is not true. Whether or not the contractor is entitled to an extra depends upon whether or not the work and material claimed as an extra is included in the contract price and specifications. For aught that is said in appellant's brief, the liens referred to might very well be for labor and material which the contractor was obliged to supply under the general and special terms of his contract and for the contract price. Appellant does not discuss the subject-matter of these liens in a way to compare it with the extras refused the contractor so as to indicate whether the subject-matter of these liens was of the nature of extra work and material not provided for in the specifications and within the contract price.

Three other points raised by appellant deserve passing notice. The record shows no lack of evidence to support the court's finding that the owner and contractor had not entered into a partnership agreement supplanting the building contract.

[12] The court allowed the appellant surety company $2,500 attorney's fees as against the contractor. The only point stated with respect to this item is that "there is no evidence to support the finding that the surety company is only entitled to $2,500 attorney's fees." It is well settled that the court may fix the amount of attorney's fees with or without expert testimony as to the value of such services. Freese v. Pennie, 110 Cal. 467, 42 P. 978; Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 281; Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 307, 104 P. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49. The court was not bound to award all the attorney's fees asked for by the attorney merely because he was the only one who testified upon the subject.

[13] The court allowed $4,000 damages for failure of the contractor to properly execute that portion of the contract which required tamping and settling of the earth of the ground floor before laying the cement floor thereon. This work admittedly was not done exactly as required by the specifications, and there was testimony to the effect that the breaking of this cement floor was caused by the failure of the contractor to comply with the specifications in this regard.

[14, 15] Finally, the appellant claims the court erred in allowing damages for the contractor's delay in completing the building upon the basis of actual damages instead of upon the basis of liquidated damages as provided for in the contract. Plaintiff's amended complaint pleaded that the contractor had agreed to pay $100 per day for delay in completing the building and in this connection set forth the part of the contract providing for liquidated damages and then added an additional allegation to the effect that plaintiff had been actually damaged equal to or in excess of the amount of the liquidated damages provided, "but that the extent of such damage is incapable of being approximated or estimated." The complaint also alleged that the building, instead of being completed on the 31st of July, 1922, was not completed until the 4th of December, 1922, which was alleged to be a delay of 126 days. In the appellant's answer the contract provisions were admitted. The answer denied the amount of the delay, and denied that the extent of damage was incapable of being approximated or estimated. The court found that the parties had agreed as set forth in the written contract. The court did not make an express finding upon the statement in the complaint, "but that the extent of said damage is incapable of being approximated or estimated." The evidence showed that the owner had entered into a lease in 1921 by which the tenant should take possession on the 1st of August, 1922, but, owing to the delay in completing the building, the tenant did not take possession until the 4th of October, 1922, with the exception of a small portion of the basement, for which a small amount of rent was paid. The actual amount of rent lost to the owner by the delay was the amount which the court allowed the owner as delay damage. The court also found that the building was not completed until January 15, 1923, notwithstanding that the owner filed a notice of completion on December 4, and also in spite of the evidence that the tenant paid rent under his lease from the 4th of October, 1922. This finding is not attacked by appellant.

[16, 17] Plaintiff and respondent, who came into court upon a complaint apparently declaring for liquidated damages now defends the judgment for delay which is based upon actual damages. On the other hand, the appellant, which denied plaintiff's allegation that the damages were incapable of being approximated or estimated, is now claiming that the court erred in applying the rule of actual damages instead of liquidated damages. Appellant claims that the finding of the court, that an exhibit annexed to the findings is a true and correct copy of the contract between the parties, amounts to a finding that the agreement for liquidated damages therein is valid. The finding simply finds that the copy of the contract annexed was a true and correct copy, and does not find to be true all the statements in the contract (including the statement therein "that the said damages of $100 per day are liquidated because it is impossible to approximate or estimate the damage * * *"). But even granting appellant's claim that the court did find the liquidated damage provision of the contract to be valid, the judgment for damage for delay would be thereby increased against appellant instead of diminished. If the court erred in assessing actual instead of liquidated damages, the error was injurious to respondent and not to appellant. Considering the building as having been completed on December 4, 1922 (instead of later, on January 15, 1923, as found by the court), a delay of 126 days occurred. At $100 per day this amounts to $12,600. This amount is in excess of the amount of actual damage allowed for delay by the court ($12,041.25). It seems to be the position of appellant that the rule of liquidated damages should be applied up until the day, but not further than the day, the tenant began to pay rent. This, of course, cannot be done. Whatever uncertainty there may be in this record on this point, one thing at least is certain, and that is that either the one or the other rule must be applied to the exclusion of the other straight through to the completion of the building. Appellant, who insists upon the liquidated damage provision, must necessarily pay $100 per day until the day of completion of the building, regardless of the fact that the tenant paid rent during a portion of that time. The fact that the tenant paid rent before the building was completed was a fortuitous occurrence. It must be regarded as a piece of good fortune for the owner, but it did not have the effect of suspending the liquidated damage clause of the contract. That clause was either entirely valid or void at the time the contract was made and remained either valid or void at all times thereafter. Hanlon

Drydock, etc., Co. v. McNear, 70 Cal. App. 204, 232 P. 1002. Once granting a covenant for liquidated damages to be valid, it is equally valid whether actual damages subsequently ascertained be either less or more than the amount agreed upon.

The amount of damage for delay allowed by the court being equal to the actual damage and less than the liquidated damages, appellant has no substantial grievance to urge in respect to this item of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. SCHAFFNER
et al. (Civ. 5008.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 18, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇐907 (3)—Appellate court on appeal submitted on judgment roll alone was required to accept finding of trial court.

On appeal from judgment for plaintiff in action on bail bond submitted on judgment roll alone, court was required to assume that finding of absence of defendant and counsel at time of arraignment under Pen. Code, § 977, was supported by evidence.

2. Bail ⇐75—Presence of defendant's counsel at arraignment held no defense, in action on bail bond, where no appearance was made at date to which arraignment was postponed.

Where defendant failed to appear, either in person or by counsel, at date to which hearing on arraignment was postponed, it was no defense to sureties on bail bond that defendant's counsel may have been present and ready for arraignment when case was originally called.

Action by the County of Los Angeles against Fannie Schaffner and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Judgment and order denying new trial affirmed.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, Arthur T. George, Mortimer A. Kline, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Deputies Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff rendered in an action to recover on a bail bond. The case comes up on the judgment roll alone.

It appears from the complaint that one Dan Dubreville was arraigned on a charge of violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79). He waived preliminary examination and was bound over for trial to the superior court, at which time the committing magistrate fixed his bond at $1,000. The defendants qualified as sureties on this bond, and Dubreville was released from custody pending trial. The bail bond in this action is in the usual form, the sureties undertaking that Dubreville would hold himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, etc.

It further appears from the complaint that after his release the district attorney of Los Angeles county on October 5, 1923, filed in the superior court an information charging him with the offense for which he was bound over. The complaint further alleges that on October 8, 1923, the case of People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. Dan Dubreville, Defendant, being No. 20877, was duly and regularly called in department 12 of the superior court for the arraignment of the defendant, and that at the said time and place the defendant did not appear and was not present; that the court duly and regularly continued said cause for arraignment until the 15th day of October, 1923, and that on said date the case was again called for arraignment, and that at the said time and place the said defendant did not appear and was not present to answer said charge pending against him and did not render himself amenable to the orders and process of said court; that thereupon the court ordered the bail of said defendant forfeited, and that such order was duly entered in the minutes, and that such order of forfeiture has not been set aside.

The amended answer filed by the defendants admits the execution of the bond, but denies that Dubreville did not render himself amenable to the order and process of the court. The amended answer contains the further allegation that on the occasions when the case in question was called for arraignment, namely, on October 8, 1923, and October 15, 1923, the defendant Dubreville was "present by counsel, ready and willing to proceed with such arraignment, and present to answer said charge, * * * and to abide the order and process of the court." The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for.

Two grounds are urged by appellants for reversal of the judgment: First, that the charge in the information against Dubreville was a misdemeanor, and under section 977 of the Penal Code Dubreville was not required to be in court personally for the arraignment, but he had the right to appear for arraignment by counsel, and that he did so appear by counsel. Hence the court had no legal right to forfeit the bond; second, that the findings in the case do not cover all of the material issues raised by the pleadings.

[1] The first point may be readily disposed of by pointing out that in the findings by the court appears the following finding of fact:

"That on the 15th day of October, 1923, the said case of the People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. Dan Dubreville, Defendant,' No. 20877, was duly and regularly called in department 12 of said superior court, and at said time and place the said Dan Dubreville did not appear and was not present in person or by counsel to answer said charge pending against him as hereinabove set forth, and did not render himself amenable to the order and process of said court."

We must assume, inasmuch as the case is here on the judgment roll, that there was abundant evidence to support this finding.

[2] As to the second point, that the court failed to find on material affirmative issues in the amended answer, appellants urge that the court failed to find on his allegation that he was present in court by his counsel on October 8th, the first time the case was called for arraignment.

While it is true the findings are silent on the question of whether or not counsel for Dubreville was present and ready for the arraignment of his client on October 8th when the case was called, it becomes wholly immaterial for the reason that it clearly appears from the findings that there was no such appearance for him on October 13, 1923, at which time the bail was forfeited for nonappearance.

There is no merit in the appeal, and the judgment and order of the court denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed. It appearing to the court that this appeal, being devoid of any merit, was taken for the purposes of delay, it is further ordered that the appellants pay to respondent as damages the sum of $100, which amount shall be included in the costs to be allowed respondent on this appeal.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. GRANNIS et al.
(Civ. 5009.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 18, 1928.

1. Bail $\S$ 74(2)—Justice's continuance of preliminary examination in felony case on account of defendant's absence held authorized, permitting recovery against sureties on forfeited bail bond.

Where defendant did not appear at hearing of preliminary examination in felony case, justice had authority to continue hearing and to declare forfeiture of bond on failure of defendant to appear at continued hearing, and continuance was therefore no defense to sureties sued on forfeited bail bond.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 731(2)—Where particular omitted issues were not pointed out, court was not required to review alleged failure to make findings.

Alleged failure of court to make specific findings as to denials in answer and affirmative matter set up therein was not required to be reviewed, where particular issues on which court failed to find were not pointed out.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ralph H. Clock, Judge.

Action by the County of Los Angeles against E. W. Grannis and another. From the judgment for plaintiff defendants appeal. Judgment and order denying new trial affirmed.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, Arthur T. George, Mortimer A. Kline, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Deputies Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants in an action on a bail bond. The case comes here upon the judgment roll alone.

It appears from the complaint that on August 20, 1923, the defendant H. S. Leonard, who was charged with the offense of forgery and in custody, appeared in the justice court of Los Angeles township for arraignment for the purpose of preliminary examination. At said time and place, the preliminary examination was set for August 29, 1923. On August 21, 1923, the justice of the peace before whom the arraignment was to take place fixed a bond for the defendant in the sum of $2,000, and that both of the defendants in this action executed said bond and qualified thereon as sureties. Upon the filing of the bond the defendant Leonard was released from custody. On August 29, 1923, the date upon which the preliminary examination was to take place, the court duly and regularly continued the hearing of the preliminary examination to September 4, 1923, at which time and place the preliminary examination was again "duly and regularly continued" until September 5, 1923. On September 5, 1923, when the case was called for preliminary examination, the said defendant did not appear and was not present to answer the charge pending against him and he did not render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court; that thereupon the court declared the bail forfeited and entered such order in the minutes of the court.

The answer does not deny the execution of the bond by the defendants, but does deny all of the other allegations of the complaint and in addition set forth, under what is designated as a separate and distinct defense, allegations that on August 29th, the defendant Leonard was in court, but that on September 4, 1923, to which date the preliminary examination was continued, the defendant Leonard was not personally present in court, but that notwithstanding his absence the court continued the hearing until 2 o'clock of the afternoon of that date, at which time the defendant again was absent, and the court continued the hearing until September 5th, at 2 o'clock p. m.; that on September 5th, the defendant still not appearing, the bail was forfeited. The answer furthermore alleges that there was a stipulation whereby the forfeiture was stayed for some 30 days, but we do not consider this a matter of importance in the case.

[1] The reasons for the reversal urged by appellants are based upon two grounds: First, that the justice court did not have the right or power to continue the hearing of the preliminary examination in a felony case without the presence of the defendant; and, second, that the trial court failed to find specifically upon certain material allegations set up in the defendant's answer.

We find no merit in either of the points urged. There is no allegation in the answer that any one of the continuances was made without the consent of the defendant or his counsel, nor is there anything in the findings to support such a conclusion. The findings in fact specifically declare that the postponement was duly and regularly made. Furthermore, it appears from the answer filed by the defendants, that on September 4th, when the case of People v. Leonard was called for preliminary examination in the justice court, the defendant was not present either in person or by counsel, and the continuance was had until the following day, presumably to give the defendant an opportunity to appear. The defendant Leonard failing to appear on September 5th, there was no error committed by the court in declaring a forfeiture of the bond. People v. Boren, 139 Cal. 210, 72 P. 899.

Appellant has cited no authority to support his contention that, under circumstances similar to those as they appear in the record in the instant case, it has been held that the court has lost jurisdiction of the case of the defendant.

[2] As to appellants' contention that the court failed to make specific findings as to the denials in the answer and the affirmative matter set up in the answer, counsel for appellants do not point out any particular issue upon which the court has failed to find. Under the circumstances, we feel the matter does not merit any extended discussion in this opinion.

The judgment and order denying a motion for new trial are affirmed. It appearing to the court that this appeal, being devoid of any merit, was taken for the purposes of delay, it is further ordered that the appellants pay to respondent as damages the sum of $100, which amount shall be included in the costs to be allowed respondent on this appeal.

(Civ. 5010.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 18, 1928.

1. Bail ⚡61—Bail bond held not void as to sureties because approved by court commissioner instead of by judge (Code Civ. Proc. § 259).

Bail bond was not rendered void because approved by court commissioner instead of by judge of circuit court, in action against sureties, since Code Civ. Proc. § 259, permits court commissioner to examine sureties and approve bonds.

2. Bail ⚡60, 61—Examination of sureties and approval of bail bond is not part of sureties' contract (Code Civ. Proc. § 259).

Examination of sureties on bail bond and formal approval of bond by judge or court commissioner, under Code Civ. Proc. § 259, is not a part of the contract entered into by the sureties.

3. Bail ⚡74(2)—Sureties held not released from liability on bail bond by continuance without their knowledge or consent.

Continuance of trial of case in which bond was given without knowledge or consent of sureties held not to release them from their obligation on bail bond.

4. Appeal and error ⚡731(2)—Findings attacked as too general held not reviewable, where particular issues not covered were not pointed out.

Alleged insufficiency of findings to sustain judgment because of generality held not reviewable on appeal, where particular issues not covered by findings were not specifically pointed out.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ralph H. Clock, Judge.

Action by the County of Los Angeles against E. W. Grannis and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Judgment and order denying new trial affirmed.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, Arthur T. George, Mortimer A. Kline, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Deputies Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendants in an action against them as sureties on a bail bond and from the order of court refusing a new trial. The case comes here upon the judgment roll alone.

Three points are urged by appellants: First, that the bail bond in question was void because approved by a court commissioner and not by a judge of the superior court; second, that the sureties were relieved from their obligation on the bond in question because the trial of the case in which the bond was given was continued several times without the knowledge or the consent of the sureties; and, third, that the findings are "insufficient because of the generalness to sustain a judgment."

[1, 2] There is no merit in any of the points urged. Section 259, Code of Civil Procedure, specifically provides for the examination of sureties and the approval of bonds by a court commissioner. Moreover, the examination of sureties or formal approval of a bond is not a part of the contract entered into by the sureties. 3 Cal. Jur. 1059; Carpenter v. Furrey, 128 Cal. 666, 61 P. 369.

[3] There is no provision in the statute that entitles the sureties on a bond to notice of a continuation of the case. No cases are cited by appellant in support of this contention, and we know of no statute or rule of court procedure that sustains this point.

[4] As to the third point, inasmuch as appellants do not specifically point out the issue which the findings do not cover, this court will not give consideration to the point.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed. It appearing to the court that this appeal, being devoid of any merit, was taken for the purposes of delay, it is further ordered that the appellants pay to respondent as damages the sum of $100, which amount shall be included in the costs to be allowed respondent on this appeal.

Evidence that defendant carried concealed bayonet, part of which was filed off, held to support conviction for carrying "dagger" or "dirk," which are synonymous terms, meaning straight knife primarily fitted for stabbing.

2. Indictment and Information $\S$ 128—First count of information for carrying concealed "dirk" and second count for carrying concealed "dagger" held to describe same offense.

First count of information for carrying concealed "dirk" described same offense as second count for carrying concealed "dagger," since such terms are synonymous, and mean straight knife, primarily fitted for stabbing.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1173(1)—Where first count charged carrying concealed "dirk" and second count carrying concealed "dagger," constituting same offense, refusal to submit instructions under both counts and to supply verdicts for each was not prejudicial.

In prosecution under information charging carrying concealed "dirk" and carrying concealed "dagger," since only one offense was alleged, refusal to submit instructions under both counts, and failing to supply verdicts for each count, was not prejudicial, especially in view of fact that, after defendant was convicted under second count, first count was dismissed.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 829(3)—Refusal of instruction to acquit, if concealed weapon was not "dirk" or "dagger," as alleged, held proper, in view of giving similar instruction.

In prosecution for carrying concealed "dirk" or "dagger," refusal of instruction that, if jury found weapon taken from defendant was one other than dirk or dagger, to acquit, was not error, in view of fact that court in effect gave such instruction.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 829(3)—Refusal to instruct that, if defendant was carrying weapon outside clothing, to acquit, held not error, in view of instruction given.

In prosecution for carrying concealed "dirk" or "dagger," refusal to instruct that, if defendant carried weapon outside his clothing, it was not concealed on his person, and to acquit, was not error, in view of instruction that one of material elements of offense was whether weapon carried by defendant was concealed on his person.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 829(1)—Refusal of instruction is not error, if court's instruction given fully covers point.

In criminal prosecution, refusal of requested instruction is not error, if instruction given fully embraces point involved in court's own language.

7. Weapons $\S$ 17(6)—In prosecution for carrying concealed dirk or dagger, instruction that statute did not use "dagger" in narrow or technical sense held proper.

In prosecution for carrying concealed "dirk" or "dagger," instruction that word "dagger" was not used in statute in narrow or technical sense held proper.

Louis Ruiz was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Willard W. Shea, Public Defender of Alameda County, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. [1] Defendant was prosecuted by information for the crime of felony. It contained two counts. The first charged him with unlawfully carrying upon his person a dirk or dagger, in that at the time and place stated he carried concealed upon his person a dirk. The second count charged that he was carrying concealed upon his person at the same time and place a dagger. It is alleged that the second count is a different statement of the offense described in the first count. It was further alleged that, prior to the commission of the offense, defendant had suffered two prior convictions; one for the crime of forgery, the other for petit larceny. Defendant was convicted upon the second count, and sentenced to the State Prison. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. This appeal is from the order and judgment. As grounds for reversal, it is claimed that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence, and that the court erred in the giving, and refusing to give, certain instructions to the jury. The evidence shows that defendant was placed in custody on the morning of September 2, 1927, by a police officer employed by the Southern Pacific Company as he was carrying a large bundle wrapped in paper. The bundle contained copper wire, which defendant claimed was taken from the dumps at Niles, but which the prosecution contended was obtained from the railroad yards. On the way to police headquarters defendant stopped and removed the bundle of wire from his shoulder, at which time the weapon in question, inclosed in a metal sheath, was found in his possession. Defendant testified that it was wrapped in the bundle with the wire; the arresting officer testifying that it was drawn from underneath defendant's trousers. It appeared in evidence that the weapon in question was a bayonet with part of it filed off, which could be worn on the body; that it resembled a British bayonet; that there was no such thing as a British dirk; that the weapon resembled a dagger in every particular, except that a dagger is more pointed, and not quite so heavy. Under the first point raised, namely, that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence, it is claimed that it was not shown just what the real character of the weapon was. The objection is without merit. As above indicated, there was evidence to show that it resembled a dagger.

[2, 3] The information charged under the first count that defendant was unlawfully carrying a dirk and in the second the weapon was described as a dagger. It was one and the same offense. A dagger has been defined as any straight knife to be worn on the person which is capable of inflicting death, except what is commonly known as a "pocket knife." "Dirk" and "dagger," are used synonymously and consist of any straight stabbing weapon, as a dirk, stiletto, etc. Century Dictionary. They may consist of any weapon fitted primarily for stabbing. The word dagger is a generic term covering the dirk, stiletto, poniard, etc. Standard Dictionary. Each of the names given to the weapon properly described it. The weapon itself was in evidence, and the jury was in a position to judge its character. Appellant complains that the trial court erred in failing to submit instructions under both counts, and that it likewise erred in failing to supply verdicts for each count. What we have already said disposes of this objection. Moreover, after the jury rendered the verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged in count 2, the first count was dismissed. Defendant therefore suffered no prejudice.

[4-7] Error is claimed for failure on the part of the trial court to give an instruction to the effect that, if the jury found that the weapon taken from the defendant by the arresting officer was one other than a dirk, or dagger, it was their duty to acquit. The court did in effect give this very instruction. Further error is claimed in the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that, if it found that defendant was at the time of his arrest carrying the weapon taken from him outside his clothing, it was not "concealed upon his person" and it was its duty to acquit. The court instructed the jury that one of the material elements of the crime charged was whether the weapon carried by the defendant at the time mentioned was concealed upon his person. The duty of a court in this respect is fully discharged, if the instruction given fully embraces the point involved in the court's own language. The practice of repeating instructions in a different way and thus loading the case with innumerable forms of instructions upon a particular subject is not to be commended. The instruction as given was full and fair, and covered the subject. And, finally, it is urged that the trial court erred in defining the word "dagger." The court instructed the jury that the word was not used in the statute in a narrow or technical sense. The instruction was a proper one. As above stated, the term is generic. There is no merit in the appeal.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

SMELSER v. DEUTSCHE EVANGELISCHE LUTHERISCHE GEMEINDE DER ST. MARKUS KIRCHE. (Civ. 6035.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 20, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨164(1)—In absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant, landlord is not liable for injuries to tenant from defective premises (Civ. Code, § 1941).

In absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in lease, landlord is not liable to tenant for injury due to defective condition or faulty construction of demised premises, this rule not having been changed by Civ. Code, § 1941.

2. Pleading ⇨34(4)—In construing pleading before judgment, pleader is presumed to have stated case in manner most favorable to himself.

In construing pleadings before judgment, it must be presumed that pleader stated his case in most favorable manner to himself.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨169(3)—Complaint in action by roomer against landlord for injuries from defective ladder held not to show that provisions of State Housing Act were applicable (St. 1923, p. 813, § 48).

Complaint in action by roomer and boarder against landlord for injuries from alleged defective ladder, alleging that ladder was built in court or light well and was accessible to tenants of top story, held to fail to show that such ladder came within provisions of State Housing Act (St. 1923, p. 813, § 48), relating to ladders leading to penthouse or scuttle and accessible to all tenants of building.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨124(1)—In absence of agreement or license, tenants have no easement over roof as appurtenant to tenancy other than for purpose of shelter.

The primary purpose of a roof of a building is to shelter it and its occupants, and other than for purpose of shelter tenants are given no easement thereover as appurtenant to their tenancies, unless their rights are extended by agreement with or license from owner.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨164(1)—Roomer and boarder voluntarily climbing ladder to roof to gratify his curiosity held not entitled to recover against owner for injuries from defect in ladder.

A roomer and boarder, who voluntarily climbed ladder extending to roof for purpose of gratifying his curiosity in ascertaining who was on roof, is not entitled to recover against owner for injuries from defect in ladder; any license to use such ladder, under State Housing Act (St. 1923, p. 813, § 48), arising only in case of an emergency such as imminent peril from fire.

6. Negligence ⇨2—To maintain action for negligence, existence of obligation left unfulfilled must be shown.

To maintain an action for personal injuries caused by negligence or want of due care, there must be shown to exist some obligation or duty toward plaintiff which has been left undischarged or unfulfilled.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Smelser, by George F. Snyder, his guardian ad litem, against the Deutsche Evangelische Lutherische Gemeinde Der St. Markus Kirche. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Snyder, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry Eickhoff, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence. An order was made sustaining defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint without leave to amend, and from the judgment entered thereon plaintiff appeals. The single question presented is whether the amended complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The allegations of said complaint are to the following effect: Defendant owned a three-story frame apartment house in San Francisco which contained one apartment on each story. The building was designed, built, and occupied as a home or residence for three families living independently of each other, and was provided with a stationary wooden ladder, constructed in a court or light well extending from a point near a window in the top apartment to the roof. The ladder, as the complaint alleges, "was accessible to the occupants or tenants of the third or top story and top apartment of said apartment house," and "was the only means of access to said roof." One Sophie Strasser was the lessee of the top floor, and plaintiff occupied one of her rooms as her boarder or tenant. The complaint further alleges that on the day plaintiff was injured he "heard certain sounds or noises coming from the roof of said building indicating that persons were on the roof, * * * and that when after said sounds or noises had continued for a considerable length of time plaintiff climbed to the roof of said building by means of said ladder and ascertained that said sounds or noises were being made by certain boys not living in said building who were erecting radio aerials on said building;" that thereupon he started to descend from the roof by means of the ladder when the rung he was grasping loosened and gave way, precipitating him to the pavement at the bottom of said court or light well, a distance of approximately 60 feet, as a result of which fall he was severely injured. Allegations follow showing the extent of the injuries and the damage sustained by plaintiff by reason of them. The negligent act charged against defendant was that said ladder had been attached to the building for many years, and that "the nails holding the rungs * * * had become and were rusted and rotten with age, and that the defendant negligently failed to keep said ladder in repair."

[1] Plaintiff contends that defendant's liability attaches under the rule that, where a portion of demised premises is reserved for the common use of the owner and tenants, or of different tenants, the owner is charged with the implied duty to use reasonable care to keep the reserved portions in a reasonably safe condition, and that for a failure to perform such duty he is liable for any injuries sustained by persons rightfully using the same. 36 Corp. Jur. 213. There is no disputing the existence of the foregoing rule, but in the present case it is nowhere alleged, either expressly or by implication, that at the time plaintiff was injured the defective premises were under reservation for common use of the owner and tenants, or of different tenants, the allegations being merely that said ladder extended from a point near a window in the top story to the roof, and "was accessible to the occupants or tenants of the third or top story and top apartment of said apartment house." If, therefore, the foregoing allegations be construed to mean that said ladder was a part of or appurtenant to the third or top story of the building, and as such was included in the premises leased to Sophie Strasser, defendant, as owner, was not liable, the rule in such cases being that in the absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in the lease the landlord is not liable to a tenant for the injury due to the defective condition or faulty construction of the demised premises. This is the rule at common law, and it has not been changed by section 1941 of the Civil Code. De Motte v. Arkell, 77 Cal. App. 610, 247 P. 254; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 179, 33 P. 859; 15 Cal. Jur. 704.

[2, 3] But in furtherance of his theory that the ladder in question was subject to the common use of all the tenants in the building, plaintiff claims that certain provisions of the State Housing Act (Stats. 1923, p. 813) should be imported into the transaction and considered a part thereof. Those provisions read:

"Every now existing apartment house or hotel of more than two stories in height, that is not provided with a stairway to the roof as hereinbefore prescribed shall have in the roof a penthouse or a scuttle, * * * located in the ceiling of a public hallway, and there shall be provided a stairway or a stationary ladder, leading from the top floor of such apartment house or hotel to the roof thereof. Such stairway or stationary ladder shall be made readily accessible to all the tenants of the building. No scuttle or penthouse door shall at any time be locked with a key, but may be fastened on the inside by a movable bolt or lock." Section 48.

The complaint utterly fails to show, however, even inferentially, that said ladder, either with respect to its location or type of construction, was built with the intention that it should or that in fact it did conform to the requirements of said State Housing Act, there being no allegations whatever to show that, as the statute requires, it led to "a penthouse or a scuttle, * * * located in the ceiling of a public hallway," or was "readily accessible to all the tenants of the building." On the contrary, as pointed out, it affirmatively appears from the facts alleged that the ladder was built in a court or light well and was "accessible to the occupants or tenants of the third or top story. * * *" In construing pleadings before judgment, it must be presumed that the pleader stated his case in the most favorable manner to himself (Burrowes v. Bosworth, 68 Cal. App. 117, 228 P. 667; Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 P. 29), and consequently, if said ladder had been in fact accessible to or reserved for the common use of all tenants in the building, it is fair to assume that plaintiff would have so alleged. It may be that defendant has failed to provide a common stairway or ladder in compliance with the terms of the State Housing Act, but that is a question with which we are not here concerned for the reason that plaintiff does not claim that the accident was proximately caused by such failure or neglect.

[4, 5] Furthermore, and in any event, the mandatory requirements of section 48 of the State Housing Act were obviously enacted pursuant to the state's police power as a regulation for protection in cases of emergency of the human beings residing in apartment houses, hotels, and group buildings, to provide them with safe means of access to the roof in cases of imminent peril such as fire or other disaster, and do not have the legal effect plaintiff claims of conferring upon all the tenants in the building an additional unrestricted right to go upon the roof and to use the same for any and all purposes. The primary purpose of the roof of a building is to shelter it and all of its occupants, and consequently, other than for purposes of shelter the tenants are given no easement thereover as appurtenant to their tenancies, unless their rights be extended by agreement with or license from the owner. O. J. Gude Co. v. Farley, 28 Misc. Rep. 184, 58 N. Y. S. 1036; Leuch v. Dessert, 137 Wash. 293, 242 P. 14; Keesey v. O'Reilly, 181 App. Div. 665, 168 N. Y. S. 844.

The complaint before us does not show that either plaintiff, who was merely "a tenant of a room and a boarder on the third or top floor," or any of the other tenants acquired from defendant any right, either in common or otherwise, to use the roof, and consequently they had no right, leave, or license to use the same or the ladder leading thereto except as the act contemplates in cases of perilous exigency. That such exigency did not arise is manifest from the allegations of the complaint, for it would appear therefrom that, without being requested or importuned by his landlady or any other tenant of the building so to do, plaintiff climbed out of the window of the third floor into the court or light well and ascended the ladder to the roof in order to investigate certain noises which were not alleged to be alarming, but which indicated merely, as the complaint avers, "that persons were on the roof." Clearly, the limited right conferred upon plaintiff by the State Housing Act to use the ladder if and when an emergency arose did not carry with it a license to use the same for the purpose of gratifying his curiosity; and, having thus voluntarily exposed himself to danger which resulted in his injury, there is no rule of law authorizing a recovery of damages against the owner. Kneiser v. Belasco-Blackwood Co., 22 Cal. App. 205, 133 P. 989; Lindholm v. Northwestern Pacific R. Co. (Cal. App.) 248 P. 1033; McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 26 Am. Rep. 555.

[6] As said in Landers v. Brooks et al. (Mass.) 154 N. E. 266, 49 A. L. R. 562, wherein the injuries suffered by a tenant were caused by an unauthorized use of a fire escape:

"The fire escape was intended for use in case of danger from fire. It was not to be used for other purposes. No duty was imposed on the defendant to keep it in proper repair except in case of fire. It was not designed for entrance or exit to the apartments, and it was not contemplated that it should be kept in a safe condition for all purposes and every kind of service. We decided in Eisenhauer v. Ceppi, 238 Mass. 458, 131 N. E. 184, that if the landlord agreed with his tenant to keep the place safe at all times, the promise of safety did not extend to a piazza roof or to every part of the demised premises which could be reached by going through a window; that it was not intended that all parts of the premises were to be kept in a condition of safety under the agreement, when it was apparent that the piazza was not expected to be used by the tenant in the course of his tenancy."

In other words, under the general rule, in order to maintain an action for damages on account of personal injuries caused by negligence or want of due care, there must be shown to exist some obligation or duty towards the plaintiff which the other has left undischarged or unfulfilled (Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 P. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580), and when, as here, it appears that plaintiff was where he had no right to be or was a mere licensee whose presence at the place where he was injured was brought about through motives affecting his private convenience or curiosity, the owner owes him no legal duty other than not to willfully injure him (Lindholm v. Northwestern Pac. R. Co., supra; Whitner v. Southern R. Co., 101 S. O. 441, 85 S. E. 1064; McAlpin v. Powell, supra).

Assuming, therefore, that, contrary to the fact and in the absence of appropriate allegations, the ladder in question might be deemed accessible to all the tenants in said building for the purposes designed by the State Housing Act, and that therefore defendant was charged with responsibility for its safe condition, it affirmatively appears from the complaint that plaintiff's injuries were received while he was using the ladder for purposes not contemplated by said act, and under such circumstances the owner cannot be held liable for damages resulting from such unauthorized use.

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained without leave to amend, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

PEOPLE v. McCLELLAN. (Cr. 1567.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 19, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 19, 1928.

1. Criminal law ☞1087(1/2)—Statutes in force on January 1, 1927, relative to time and manner of making up record on appeal, remain effective until promulgation of rules under subsequent repealing statute (Pen. Code, § 1246, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 1).

Pen. Code, § 1246, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 1, providing that, until rules are promulgated by judicial council, time and manner of making up and filing record on appeal in effect January 1, 1927, should govern, operated to render all statutes relating to time and manner of making record on appeal, which were in force at that time, still operative irrespective of repeal, where no rules had been promulgated by judicial council.

2. Criminal law ☞1071—Statute, requiring filing of application with trial court, stating grounds of appeal, held effective, notwithstanding repeal (Pen. Code, § 1247, and § 1246, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 1).

Pen. Code, § 1247, requiring presentation of application to trial court stating grounds of appeal and designation of portions of reporter's notes which must be transcribed, held effective, notwithstanding repeal (St. 1927, p. 1048), since amendment of section 1246 (St. 1927, p. 1047, § 1), subsequently enacted, continues in force statutes relative to time and manner of making up and filing record on appeal.

3. Criminal law ☞1071—Defendant's failure to present application to trial court stating grounds of appeal held to require dismissal of appeal (Pen. Code, § 1247, and § 1246, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 1).

Failure of defendant, on appeal to comply with Pen. Code, § 1247, by failure to present application to trial court stating grounds of appeal and points relied on, held to require dismissal of appeal, since statute, though repealed (St. 1927, p. 1048), is still effective as to time and manner of making and filing record on appeal under Pen. Code, § 1246, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; H. G. Ames, Judge.

Edward McClellan was convicted of simple assault, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Nelson & Burns, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. [1, 2] This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of simple assault and from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial. The respondent has made a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellant altogether failed to "present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies," as was required by section 1247 of the Penal Code on January 1, 1927, and thereafter until repealed (St. 1927, p. 1048), and which respondent claims is still required thereby by virtue of the saving clause which was made a part of section 1246 of the Penal Code, adopted at the same time that section 1247 was repealed. The appeal was taken subsequent to the repeal of section 1247. Section 1246 (St. 1927, p. 1047, § 1) now reads as follows:

"The record on appeal shall be made up and filed in such time and manner as shall be prescribed in rules to be promulgated by the judicial council. Until such rules are promulgated, the time and manner provided by statutes in force on January 1, 1927, shall govern."

No rules have been promulgated by the judicial council. The only fair construction of the concluding clause of section 1246 is that all those statutes which were in force on January 1, 1927, relating to the time and manner in which the record on appeal shall be made up and filed, are still in force and effect. The question then is: Does section 1247, as it existed on that date, relate to the time or manner of making up or filing the record on appeal? Like section 1246, as it formerly existed, which has been stated to have no concern with the taking of appeals, but rather with methods whereby the appeals may be heard (Garrett v. Superior Court [Cal. App.] 249 P. 871), section 1247 opens with the words "upon an appeal being taken," indicating clearly that it related not to the taking of appeals. It is there said that the appellant shall file and present the application already mentioned, which, in addition to containing a general statement of the grounds of appeal, shall "designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon." Undoubtedly this language relates to the time and manner of making up the record on appeal. This view is reinforced by the authority of Rhodes v. Sargent, 17 Cal. App. 54, 118 P. 727, where the court refused by writ of mandate to compel the trial judge to certify the transcript, where, as here, the appellant had failed to file and present the application and designation required by the section.

[3] Having concluded that section 1247 relates to the time and manner of making up and filing the record on appeal, we are compelled by a uniform line of authorities, including People v. Flaherty, 61 Cal. App. 775, 215 P. 699; People v. Hill (Cal. App.) 248 P. 714; People v. Shaw (Cal. App.) 253 P. 747; People v. May (Cal. App.) 253 P. 961; and People v. Johnson (Cal. App.) 254 P. 1118, to dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

WILLIS FINANCE & CONSTRUCTION CO.
v. PORTER. (Civ. 5035.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 23, 1928.

1. Arbitration and award ⚡50—Parties to arbitration agreement are bound by terms thereof, including provision limiting time beyond which arbitrators cannot act.

Parties to an agreement of arbitration are bound by its terms, including that fixing a time limit beyond which arbitrators cannot act.

2. Arbitration and award ⚡50—Award of arbitrators made after date named in agreement beyond which arbitrators could not act was nullity (Code Civ. Proc. § 1283).

Where agreement of submission to arbitrators provided it should be entered as order of superior court, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, and powers of arbitrators thereunder ceased on May 31st, award made by arbitrators on June 4th was a nullity.

3. Arbitration and award ⚡16(2)—Plaintiff was within rights in terminating agreement of submission, where powers of arbitrators ceased before award was made (Code Civ. Proc. § 1283).

Where powers of arbitrators under agreement of submission providing that it should be entered as order of superior court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, ceased on May 31st, plaintiff was within rights in terminating agreement of submission on June 2d before award was made or submission was filed in court on June 4th.

4. Arbitration and award ⚡50—Filing of submission agreement subsequent to plaintiff's revocation after last day for making award could not validate award or give court jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1281—1290).

Where agreement of submission provided it should be entered as superior court order, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, and powers of arbitrators under sections 1281—1290 ceased thereunder on May 31st, and June 2d plaintiff notified defendants that agreement was terminated, the filing of agreement of submission subsequent to plaintiff's revocation and subsequent to last day set in agreement for making award could not validate award or give court jurisdiction.

5. Judgment ⚡577(2)—Since court had no jurisdiction, its denial of motion to vacate award was not bar to later motion to set judgment aside (Code Civ. Proc. § 1283).

Where filing of an arbitration award after plaintiff rightly notified defendants that agreement of submission was terminated did not give court jurisdiction of subject-matter or of parties, denial of motion to vacate order did not operate as bar to presentation of later motion to set aside judgment entered on award filed with the clerk, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1283.

6. Appeal and error ⚡1074(1)—Where award was not binding, error, if any, in ordering that it and entry thereof as judgment be set aside, was harmless.

On motion to set aside a judgment entered on an award under Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, because court was without jurisdiction and judgment was void, since award was not binding on parties either as statutory or common-law award and was erroneously entered, error, if any, in judgment ordering that award and entry thereof as a judgment be set aside and proceedings perpetually stayed, was harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by the Willis Finance & Construction Company against A. D. Porter. From a judgment setting aside a judgment based on an award of arbitrators, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Newlin & Ashburn, R. L. Haight, Otto & Linn, and James H. Mitchell, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Thomas C. Ridgway and Richard F. Bailey, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Appellant and respondent entered into an agreement in writing on April 30, 1924, submitting to arbitrators certain controversies then existing between them. The agreement of submission provided that it should be entered as an order of the superior court in accordance with section 1283 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that it should be filed before the arbitrators entered upon the performance of their duties. The agreement contained the following provision:

"It is hereby mutually agreed that the award hereunder shall be made by said arbitrators at any time on or before the 15th day of May, 1924, or on or before any other day to which the parties hereto shall, by writing, indorse on this submission, from time to time enlarge the time for making the award, and it is hereby agreed that, in the event said award is not made within the time that may be agreed upon, it shall be deemed that this submission shall have failed, and the same shall be at an end, and the second party may proceed, as hereinafter specified, with the prosecution of such actions as have already been started, or such action as may hereafter be started in connection with said controversies."

The time limit was later extended to May 31, 1924, by indorsement in writing.

Respondent notified appellant in writing on June 2, 1924, that the agreement of submission was terminated on the ground that no award had been made within the time limit fixed in the submission or within the extended time. On June 4, 1924, the arbitrators made an award, which was filed on June 12, 1924. Appellant caused the agreement of submission to be filed on June 10, 1924, in the office of the county clerk. At the time the agreement of submission was filed the clerk entered in the register of actions the names of the parties, the fact that it was an arbitration matter, and the date of the filing of the submission. This constituted the entire record of the entry of submission and this record was not at any time amended. There was no entry by the clerk of the names of the arbitrators or the time limited by the submission within which the award must be made, in accordance with the requirements of section 1283, Code of Civil Procedure, as it was in force at the time of these proceedings. Respondent on June 17, 1924, served notice of motion to vacate the arbitrators' award. This motion was denied by the court on July 25, 1924, and notice of the ruling of the court was served on August 8, 1924. Appellant filed an affidavit on November 5, 1924, setting forth certain matters mentioned in section 1286, Code of Civil Procedure, and on November 7, 1924, the award was set out in full by the clerk in the judgment book as a judgment of the court. Thereafter the respondent moved to set aside the judgment entered by the clerk on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction and that the judgment was void. On November 25, 1924, the court granted respondent's motion by minute order and filed a written order and judgment, in which it was found:

"That the submission to arbitration filed herein on June 10, 1924, was filed subsequent to the time limited by the said submission and after the award had been made, and that the clerk of the court did not enter in his register of actions the names of the arbitrators, the date of the submission, and the time limited by the submission within which the award must be made, and that the above court had no jurisdiction of the above-entitled matter or of the parties, and that the award entered by the clerk as a judgment herein is void and is a nullity."

Appellant now seeks to reverse the judgment setting aside "the said award and the entry thereof as a judgment."

By the terms of the agreement of submission it was expressly agreed that the submission should "be at an end" in the event the award should not be made within the time extended, May 31, 1924. The record clearly shows that the award was dated June 4, 1924, and filed June 12, 1924.

[1, 2] Parties to an agreement of arbitration are bound by all of its terms, including that fixing a time limit beyond which the arbitrators cannot act. The powers of the arbitrators ceased on May 31st. It does not appear that respondent ever consented to the making of an award after that date, but, on the contrary, he promptly notified all concerned of the termination of the submission. It follows that the award made on June 4th is a nullity. Ryan v. Dougherty, 30 Cal. 218; In re Abrams, 2 Cal. App. 237, 84 P. 363.

[3, 4] A statutory arbitration such as the one under discussion is governed by sections 1281-1290 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As stated in Fairchild v. Doten, 42 Cal. 125:

"The proceeding is a special one, and the statutory provisions must be substantially complied with or the judgment will not be valid."

Section 1283, Code of Civil Procedure, before the amendment of 1927 (St. 1927, p. 405), provided that the submission must be filed with the clerk in order to be made an order of the court. After specifying certain steps to be taken by the clerk in making the proper entry, the section provided:

"When so entered the submission cannot be revoked without the consent of both parties. * * * If the submission is not made an order of the court, it may be revoked at any time before the award is made."

In the instant case respondent was within his legal rights in terminating the agreement of submission before the award was made or the submission filed. The filing of the agreement of submission subsequent to the revocation by respondent, subsequent to the last day set in the agreement for the making of the award, and subsequent to the actual making of the award, could not validate the award or give the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter or the parties. Kreiss v. Hotaling, 96 Cal. 617, 31 P. 740.

[5] Appellant contends that the denial of the motion to vacate the award on July 25, 1924, operates as a bar to the presentation of a later motion to set aside the judgment entered by the clerk on November 7, 1924. The court at no time had jurisdiction of the parties or the subject-matter and at no time had authority to adjudge the matters in controversy. The judgment being void upon its face, the rule of res adjudicata does not apply. In Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 342, 348, it is said:

"A judgment absolutely void upon its face may be attacked anywhere, directly or collaterally, whenever it presents itself, either by parties or strangers. It is simply a nullity, and can be neither the basis nor evidence of any right whatever."

See, also, Pioneer Land Co. v. Maddux, 109 Cal. 633, 42 P. 295, 50 Am. St. Rep. 67; Estate of Pusey, 180 Cal. 368, 181 P. 648.

[6] In its judgment the lower court used this language:

"It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said award and the entry thereof as a judgment in Judgment Book 572, at page 12, records of the above court, be set aside, held for naught, and expunged from the records in the above-entitled matter, and that all proceedings thereon be perpetually stayed."

Appellant contends that in any event the award should not be set aside, but only its entry and the judgment based thereon. Since the award is not binding upon the parties either as a statutory or common-law award, the error, if any, is harmless.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by F. O. Dalton and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Dalton Bros., against M. Gore and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Gore Bros. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hewitt, Ford & Crump, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This was an action brought by plaintiffs and respondents against defendants and appellants for money due under contract. The case was tried on the amended and supplemental complaint of plaintiffs, upon an amendment thereto, and upon the original answer of defendants stipulated to stand as answering plaintiffs' amended complaint.

The amended and supplemental complaint of plaintiffs contained four separate counts or causes of action, the first being on the contract as plaintiffs claimed it was entered into and agreed upon while the second, third, and fourth causes of action were for revision on the grounds, respectively, of fraud, mutual mistake, and mistake of plaintiffs known or suspected by the defendants.

The trial court found for plaintiffs on the first cause of action and found against the allegations of fraud and mistake pleaded in the second, third, and fourth causes of action.

The nature of the contract as found by the court is as follows:

"That heretofore, to wit, on or about April 6, 1921, plaintiffs and defendants entered into a contract for the operation of a certain theater in the city of Los Angeles known as the Burbank Theater for a period of 52 consecutive weeks, beginning May 15, 1921, under which contract plaintiffs agreed to furnish a full acting musical comedy company consisting of not less than 28 people, an assistant manager, one door man and one stage man, and the defendants agreed to furnish the building then being operated by defendants as the Burbank Theater, located on Main street in the city of Los Angeles, and agreed to provide all necessary ice, heat, light, water, janitor service, cashiers, insurance, ushers, film service, and pay all licenses—city, county, state, and federal.

"That plaintiffs and defendants contracted and agreed that the gross receipts coming from the operation of said theater as such for said period of 52 weeks should, after the deduction of the United States amusement or admission tax from said receipts, be divided equally between said plaintiffs and said defendants, with the proviso and condition, however, that the portion of the total gross receipts to go to defendants should amount to at least the sum of $130,000 for said period of 52 weeks, and said plaintiffs agreed to and did deposit with the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles the sum of $15,000 in cash as a sum from which said guaranty of a minimum of $130,000 as defendants' portion for said period of 52 weeks should to that extent be made good."

The trial court further found that:

"There is now due, owing, and unpaid from defendants to plaintiffs said sum of $4,372.85, together with interest thereon from the times and in the amounts the various sums were due to plaintiffs on weekly settlements as hereinabove shown."

The conclusions of law were of the conventional type, following and based upon the findings, to the effect that plaintiffs were entitled to a money judgment, stating the amount, and the judgment likewise was in the usual form based on the conclusions of law.

The appellants contend: (1) That the judgment is against the law, in that (a), in the absence of mutual mistake, fraud, mistake of the plaintiffs which the defendants at that time knew or suspected, ambiguity, fiduciary relationship, or subsequently executed oral agreement, the court must not admit parol testimony for the purpose of construing the agreement. In other words, that the court is confined to the four corners of the instrument. And (2) that in so construing the intent of the parties as there expressed, the court must not insert or add anything which is not necessarily and reasonably implied from the terms contained therein.

[1, 2] The appeal is taken from the judgment upon the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions. It is therefore necessarily admitted by appellants that no errors were committed in the admission or rejection of evidence, and that the evidence sustains and justifies the findings. Mock v. City of Santa Rosa, 126 Cal. 330, 340, 58 P. 826. There is therefore no merit in appellants' first contention that the trial court committed error by the admission of parol testimony.

[3] Nor do we see that there is any force in appellants' second contention, that in so construing the intent of the parties the court must not insert or add anything which is not necessarily and reasonably implied from the terms contained therein. As a mere statement of an abstract proposition it may be true, but appellants make no attempt by specification, argument, nor authority to justify its application here. Hastaran v. Marchand, 23 Cal. App. 126, 137 P. 297.

[4-8] We adopt the following from respondents' brief as a correct and concise statement of the law applicable on this appeal:

"There is no bill of exceptions showing the evidence, and we must upon this appeal take the findings of fact as absolutely true, and presume that the evidence necessary to sustain them was presented to the court below. Estate of Brown, 143 Cal. 450, 454, 77 P. 160, 162. Also, Los Angeles, etc., Land Co. v. Marr, 187 Cal. 126, 200 P. 1051; Robben v. Benson, 43 Cal. App. 204, 213, 185 P. 200; Hastaran v. Marchand, 23 Cal. App. 126, 137 P. 297.

"Error is never presumed. All intendment is in favor of the judgment. Estate of Autfret, 187 Cal. 34, 200 P. 946; Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 135 P. 970; Hastaran v. Marchand, 23 Cal. App. 126, 137 P. 297.

"Errors of law in the admission of evidence are not available on appeal, if no objection was made to the reception of the evidence.

"A point raised for the first time on appeal will not be considered. Morrison v. Land, 169 Cal. 580, 147 P. 259; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 141 P. 217.

"A judgment will not be reversed unless error is shown and the burden is upon appellant to show the error. Kellogg v. Kellogg, 170 Cal. 84, 148 P. 518.

"It can avail nothing to argue that Exhibit A to plaintiffs' amended and supplemental complaint is contrary to the court's finding. If this court should so conclude, it would then simply presume there was other evidence that did support the finding.

"Appellants are precluded from claiming any alleged variance between the allegations of the pleadings and the proof to support the findings. This court will presume sufficient evidence was before the lower court to support the findings, whether a variance or not, and if deemed variance, it will be presumed no objection thereto was made and that such variance was waived. Calif. Portland Cement Co. v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 16 Cal. App. 692, 699, 118 P. 103, 113."

[9, 10] Therefore, it affirmatively appearing that evidence was introduced in the court below and there being no bill of exceptions before this court, it will be conclusively presumed that the evidence supports the findings and that all objections to the introduction of evidence were and are waived.

Judgment affirmed.

COHN v. VALENTINE et al. (Civ. 3381.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 19, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 19, 1928.

1. Evidence ⇨598(1)—Trial court is not bound to decide according to greater number of witnesses.

Trial court is not bound to decide in conformity to declarations of greater number of witnesses.

2. Auctions and auctioneers ⇨8—On purchasers depositing price with auctioneers, money became vendor's property less auctioneers' charges and commissions.

When vendor delivered deed to purchasers' escrow holder conveying good title and had complied with terms of sale, money deposited by purchasers with auctioneers selling property became vendor's property less auctioneers' charges and commissions.

3. Interpleader ⇨35—Auctioneers asserting right to retain deposit as against vendor held not mere stakeholders, and vendor entitled to costs of suit to recover purchase money against auctioneers (Code Civ. Proc. § 1022).

Where money deposited by purchasers with auctioneers selling property had become vendor's property less auctioneers' charges and commissions, and auctioneers alleged that purchasers had demanded return of money, and court was asked to determine to which claimant it belonged, auctioneers were not mere stakeholders, where they asserted as against vendor right to retain greater part of the money in their custody, and hence vendor suing to recover money was entitled to costs against auctioneers under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022.

4. Auctions and auctioneers ⇨9—Where part of money deposited with auctioneers to which vendor was entitled was readily ascertainable, auctioneers refusing to pay it over held chargeable with interest.

Where part of deposit money paid by purchasers to auctioneers to which vendor was entitled was readily ascertainable by computation, and auctioneers refused to pay it over on ground that vendor had not paid them for services, on finding against auctioneers as to amount due for their services, interest was properly allowed against auctioneers.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨274(1)—Vendor delivering deeds to escrow holder could enforce vendor's lien despite defense that no title passed.

Where vendor, pursuant to contract of sale, delivered to escrow holder deed conveying property to vendor and his own deed conveying to purchasers, he was entitled to enforce vendor's lien as against objection that no title had passed to purchasers or was ever delivered or tendered to them, especially where purchasers refused to complete transaction because mortgage did not contain release clause, which was not required by agreement.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨75—Where no time for conveyance was mentioned in agreement or announcement by auctioneers, vendor had reasonable time to convey.

Where parties' written agreement or announcement by auctioneers of terms of sale fixed no time for conveyance of title, vendor had reasonable time within which to convey.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨148—Trial court held warranted in finding conveyance offered January 8 following sale December 6 was within reasonable time.

In action to foreclose vendor's lien, trial court held warranted in finding that conveyance offered January 8, following sale December 6 was within reasonable time, in view of fact that parties' agreement or auctioneers' announcement of terms did not specify time for conveyance.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⇨107—Vendor's requiring escrow holder to obtain receipt for purchasers' payment to auctioneers held not to warrant cancellation of agreement by purchasers not performing or offering to perform.

Vendor's instructing escrow holder to obtain receipt for money paid by purchaser to auctioneers, not expressly made condition precedent to delivery of deed to purchasers, did not warrant cancellation of agreement by purchasers not having performed or offering to perform agreement.

9. Vendor and purchaser ⇨270—Vendor held entitled to foreclose lien for purchase money on purchasers' refusal to perform by seeking to incorporate in escrow instructions unauthorized agreement.

Vendor held entitled to foreclose lien for purchase price in accordance with agreement, where purchasers in effect refused to perform by requiring in their escrow instruction that mortgage should contain a release agreement where agreement between parties did not provide for such release clause nor provide for deliveries in escrow by either party.

10. Vendor and purchaser ⇨285(5)—Money judgment against purchasers not performing, requiring in effect purchasers to pay vendor's debt to auctioneers, held excessive by such amount.

In action to foreclose vendor's lien, in which auctioneers selling property were made parties, and judgment as against them was reduced by amount which plaintiff owed them, judgment against purchasers for price of property less amount of mortgage assumed and judgment against auctioneers was excessive, since it in effect required purchasers to pay plaintiff's debt to auctioneers.

11. Vendor and purchaser ⇨172—Vendor suing to foreclose lien held entitled to interest from date when he was ready, able, and willing to convey.

In vendor's action to foreclose lien, vendor was entitled to interest on purchase price from date when court found he was ready, able, and willing to convey title to purchasers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by M. B. Cohn against George H. Valentine and others, a partnership doing business under the firm name and style of Charles H. O'Connor & Son, and another, to foreclose a vendor's lien and for other relief. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants, members of named partnership, appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Phillip Cohen, J. B. Irsfeld, and Douglas Fawcett, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Newby & Palmer, of Los Angeles (Dee Holder, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. In November, 1923, the plaintiff was in possession, under an agreement of purchase, of certain lots in the city of Los Angeles, together with the dwelling house thereon and its "furniture and furnishings." The agreement provided for the payment of $1,000 on the purchase price at the time of the execution of the contract, $19,000 on or before January 10, 1924, and the execution by the plaintiff of his promissory note for $60,000, payable on or before three years after November 15, 1923, secured by a mortgage on said real property. The pleadings, which cover nearly a hundred pages of the typewritten transcript, are too lengthy to be given even in substance, but the findings of the court sufficiently indicate the issues in controversy. The court found:

That "the defendants Charles H. O'Connor and William C. O'Connor were copartners, * * * and at all times herein mentioned * * * were duly and regularly licensed auctioneers"; that the plaintiff employed them to sell said property at public auction, they to pay half the cost of advertising the sale and to receive as compensation for their services "one-half of all money derived from the sale of the furniture and furnishings in excess of $10,000, and * * * one-half of all money derived from the sale" of the real estate "in excess of $90,000"; that at the auction sale, held December 6, 1923, the furniture and furnishings were sold for the total sum of $10,332.35; that the real estate was sold to defendants Valentine and Kane for $90,000; that "Mrs. Marie Hummel was the duly appointed and acting clerk of said auction sale, and as such clerk * * * she then and there duly and regularly entered a memorandum of said sale in the said auctioneers' books of sales * * * and the said memorandum * * * specified as the name of the person for whom said auctioneers sold the said real estate, the name of M. B. Cohn, the plaintiff herein, and described said real estate * * * and the price at which the same was sold, * * * and the terms of the sale upon which said real estate was sold, and the name of the buyers of said real estate, to wit, the defendants George H. Valentine and William Kane; that, at the time said real estate was so offered for sale, by said auctioneers, the terms of the sale were duly and regularly announced by said auctioneers; it being announced that 15 per cent. of the purchase price thereof should be paid by the purchaser immediately upon the closing of said sale * * * and that said property should be taken by the purchaser, subject to a mortgage of $60,000, which the purchaser should assume and agree to pay, and that the balance of the purchase price of $16,500 was to be paid within thirty days from the date of the sale, and it was announced at said time that a party in the crowd was willing to take a second trust deed for $10,000 on the * * * property as part of the purchase price thereof"; that the plaintiff was present and was aware of the facts in connection with the sale and made no objection thereto; that, "immediately after said real estate was knocked down and sold to the defendants Valentine and Kane, the said Valentine and Kane signed and executed a certain deposit receipt * * * wherein the terms of the sale of said real estate as above set out, and announced by the auctioneer were duly entered and written, and at said time and place they paid to the said auctioneers * * * as a part of the purchase price of said real estate * * * the sum of $13,500"; that "on the 8th day of December, 1923, the defendants Valentine and Kane deposited with the defendant Guaranty Building & Loan Association the sum of $6,500 as an additional payment on the purchase price of said real estate, and stated in writing that they would execute a note and trust deed for $10,000 upon said real estate as and for the balance of the purchase price of the same; that on the 9th day of January, 1924, and within a reasonable time after the said auction sale of said real estate, the plaintiff M. B. Cohn was ready, able, and willing to execute a deed, conveying the said real estate to the defendants Valentine and Kane, and to furnish a certificate of title therefor showing the title to be merchantable and to fully carry out the terms of the sale of said real estate as above set forth; that on said 9th day of January, 1924, the said Valentine and Kane undertook to cancel the said sale, and refused to execute the said note and trust deed, and refused to proceed with said transaction and * * * thereafter demanded the repayment to them of the $6,500, paid by them to the defendant Guaranty Building & Loan Association upon the purchase price of said land and the $13,500 paid by them to the defendants O'Connor as a part payment of the purchase price of said land, and said defendants Valentine and Kane have refused and now refuse to proceed to close the said sale and pay the moneys for said land, although the same has been demanded of them by plaintiff; that the plaintiff made and executed a deed conveying the said real estate to the defendants within a reasonable time after the said real estate had been sold to the said defendants Valentine and Kane and delivered the same to the said defendants' agent, the Guaranty Building & Loan Association, on the 8th day of January, 1924, for the said defendants Valentine and Kane; * * * that the defendants O'Connor have retained, and now have in their possession and control, the said sum of $13,500 that was paid to them by the said defendants Valentine and Kane as a part of the purchase price of said real estate; that the defendant Guaranty Building & Loan Association received on the 8th day of December, 1923, from the defendants Valentine and Kane the sum of $6,500 as a payment for the plaintiff upon the purchase price of said real estate, which sum was to be held for the plaintiff, and the said defendant loan association has ever since kept and retained said money."

Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff against Valentine and Kane for $30,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from December 6, 1923; against Charles H. O'Connor and William C. O'Connor for $13,500, less $722.08 as commissions and expenses, with interest for the same period and at the same rate as in the judgment against Valentine and Kane; and against the Guaranty Building & Loan Association for $6,500. The judgment provides that the said amounts for which judgment is rendered against Charles H. and William C. O'Connor and the Guaranty Building & Loan Association "be credited upon the judgment against the said defendants Valentine and Kane, and that the balance of said amount adjudged to be due from the said defendants Valentine and Kane to the said plaintiff, to wit, * * * the sum of $11,876.89 * * * be, and the same is hereby declared to be, a vendor's lien upon the property, * * * and that the said vendor's lien be, and the same is hereby, foreclosed, and the said property be sold as other lands are sold under execution, subject to the $60,000 mortgage upon said property which the said defendants Valentine and Kane assumed and agreed to pay." The usual provision is made for entry of a deficiency judgment against Valentine and Kane in the event of the proceeds of the sale proving insufficient to satisfy the judgment for $11,876.89, with interest and costs and the expense of making the sale. The O'Connors and Valentine and Kane filed separate notices of appeal.

[1] In the O'Connor appeal it is said in appellants' opening brief:

"The plaintiff testified that the contract between him and the auctioneers was that the auctioneers were to receive one-half of all the real property brought at auction over and above $90,000. * * * On the other hand, C. H.

O'Connor, W. C. O'Connor, and Mrs. Hummel * * * each gave evidence that the contract * * * was that the auctioneers should receive one-half of what the real property brought at auction over and above what the same had cost the seller."

It is then argued that it is improbable that the O'Connors would have entered into a contract on the terms stated by the plaintiff. This is an argument upon the weight of the evidence rather than its insufficiency to support the findings. The conflict in the evidence is substantial, and it is elementary that a trial court is not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of the greater number of witnesses.

[2, 3] It is urged that the judgment against the O'Connors for interest and costs is erroneous. "The authorities are practically uniform in holding that an auctioneer receives a deposit of earnest money in the capacity of a stakeholder." 2 R. C. L. 1153; Montgomery v. Pac. C. L. Bureau, 94 Cal. 284, 290, 29 P. 640, 28 Am. St. Rep. 122. When the plaintiff delivered his deed to Valentine and Kane's escrow holder, conveying a good title to them, and had complied with the terms of the sale on his part to be performed, the deposit money became a portion of the cash payment and the property of the plaintiff, less the charges and commissions of the auctioneers. Montgomery v. Pac. C. L. Bureau, supra. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff demanded payment to him of the deposit money and that the O'Connors refused to pay any part thereof. The only defense set up in their answer reads as follows:

"Admit that they have refused to pay the plaintiff the said sum of $13,500, for the reason that said plaintiff has refused to pay these defendants the amount due by plaintiff to them for services rendered, as will be more specifically set forth hereafter."

Nothing further is set forth except by way of counterclaim, in which it is alleged that the plaintiff agreed to pay the auctioneers one-half of the proceeds of the sale over and above $80,000; that, in accordance with the terms of that agreement, the plaintiff was indebted to the O'Connors in the sum of $10,231.42, for which sum judgment was demanded. It was further alleged in the counterclaim that Valentine and Kane had demanded the return of the deposit money, and that the O'Connors had not sufficient information to enable them to determine to whom such money belonged, and the court was asked to determine to which claimant it belonged. "Where both vendor and vendee are adverse claimants to the deposit money, the auctioneer may file a bill of interpleader, except where he himself claims an interest therein." 2 R. C. L. 1154. "The plaintiff in interpleader must be a disinterested stakeholder." Conner v. Bank of Bakersfield, 183 Cal. 199, 203, 190 P. 801, 802. The O'Connors were not mere stakeholders, but, as against the plaintiff, they asserted the right to retain the greater part of the money in their custody. The award of interest is based on their own allegation that they refused to pay over the deposit "for the reason that said plaintiff has refused to pay these defendants the amount due" them for their services. The court found against the O'Connors as to the amount due them from the plaintiff. The portion of the deposit money to which the plaintiff was entitled was readily ascertainable by mere computation and, therefore, under the circumstances stated, interest was properly allowed thereon. The plaintiff was clearly entitled to his costs of suit against the O'Connors. Code Civ. Proc. § 1022.

[4, 5] Appellants Valentine and Kane make the following contentions:

"That no title passed to the purchasers at the auction sale or by the contract entered into directly after the sale.

"That no title was ever delivered or tendered to the purchaser by the seller or by any person for him.

"That the seller defaulted in not obtaining a guaranty of title vesting the property in the purchasers and in requiring delivery to him of the purchaser's copy of the contract showing payment of $13,500 to the auctioneers.

"That the seller had no title within 30 days after the auction sale to convey to the purchasers.

"That the seller, not having performed or tendered performance, cannot maintain this action.

"That, no title having passed to the purchasers and the record before the court showing title to the property in the plaintiff, the plaintiff cannot foreclose a vendor's lien on the premises."

In their closing brief it is said:

"The contention of the purchasers is that the parties made and entered into a written agreement immediately after the fall of the hammer, * * * and this agreement measures the rights and duties of the parties."

The court found that such agreement was so entered into, "wherein the terms of the sale of said real estate * * * were duly entered and written." In so far as material to the questions raised by the appellants, the agreement reads as follows:

"Received from George H. Valentine and W. L. Kane the sum of $13,500 as a deposit on account of the purchase price of the following described property (describing it), for the purchase price of $90,000. The balance of the purchase price is to be paid within thirty days from date hereof, as follows, to wit: $16,500, assume $6,000 mtge, due 3 yrs, interest 7% per annum, payable quarterly. It is understood that seller will place a second trust deed for $10,000 on above property, int. 7% per annum, payable quarterly, 2½ yrs. * * * In the event said purchaser shall fail to pay the balance of said purchase price or complete said purchase as herein provided, the amounts paid herein shall, at the option of the seller, be retained as liquidated and agreed damages. * * * In the event the title to said property shall not prove merchantable and said seller shall not perfect, or be able to perfect, the same within a reasonable time from this date, the purchaser shall have the option of demanding and receiving back said deposit and shall be released from all obligation hereunder. * * * The evidence of title is to be in the form of a continuation of present title, issued by a responsible title company and to be furnished and paid for by the seller. * * * Time is of the essence of this contract."

The receipt was signed, "C. H. O'Connor & Son by W. C. O'Connor, Real Estate Agent." Following this signature there is indorsed:

"I agree to purchase the above-described property on the terms and conditions herein stated. George H. Valentine and W. L. Kane, purchaser."

In a case involving a similar state of facts it was said:

"The vendors have retained the legal title, and evidently as security for the purchase money. Their position is, in some respects, similar to what it would have been had they executed a conveyance to the vendee and taken from him a mortgage upon the property. * * * A vendor retaining the title may * * * sue at law for the balance of the purchase money, or file his bill in equity for the specific performance of the contract, and take an alternative decree that if the purchaser will not accept the conveyance and pay the purchase money, the premises be sold to raise such money, and that the vendee pay any deficiency remaining after the application of the proceeds arising upon such sale. * * * The plaintiffs tendered their deed under the contract, and as its acceptance was declined, they pray a sale of the premises, and such sale was decreed. * * * The decree is not, as it should be, in the alternative. We do not, however, deem it necessary to direct a modification of the decree, as the defendants can still, at any time, arrest a sale and take a conveyance, upon payment of the amount adjudged due of the purchase money, interest thereon and the costs of this suit." See, also, Gessner v. Palmateer, 89 Cal. 89, 92, 24 P. 608, 26 P. 789, 13 L. R. A. 187; Amaranth Land Co. v. Corey, 182 Cal. 66, 67, 186 P. 765; Maltby v. Conklin, 50 Cal. App. 201, 205, 195 P. 280. The foregoing cases furnish a sufficient answer to the first two and the last of appellants' contentions.

The escrow clerk of the Guaranty Building & Loan Association testified that on January 8, 1924, he had a report on the state of the title, signed by one of the officers of the Title Insurance & Trust Company; that Valentine and Kane made no objection that the title was not good, but refused to complete the transaction because "the mortgage did not contain a release clause." The agreement contained no provision for such a release clause. The witness further testified that on January 8, 1924, he "could have furnished them (Valentine and Kane) at that time a guaranty of title, or a continuation of a guarantee of title, * * * showing the title vested in them, or vested in any one whom they might order," that the practice in such cases is to order the "Title Insurance & Trust Company to bring down the title" after both parties have made the necessary deliveries in escrow, and that disbursements are made and the transaction closed when a proper certificate of title is received. This is in harmony with the holding in Neher v. Kauffman, 197 Cal. 674, 682, 242 P. 713. The plaintiff had performed his part of the contract up to the time the purchasers refused to proceed further. He had delivered to the escrow holder a deed conveying the property to the plaintiff and the plaintiff's deed conveying it to Valentine and Kane. The latter refused to execute the necessary instruments to complete the transaction and attempted to rescind without any just cause therefor.

[6-9] The plaintiff was not required by the terms of the sale or of the said agreement to convey title within thirty days. No time for such conveyance was mentioned in such agreement or in the announcement by the auctioneers of the terms of the sale. The plaintiff therefore had a reasonable time within which to convey title, and the court was warranted in finding that he had performed the agreement on his part within a reasonable time. In his letter of instructions to the escrow holder, the plaintiff directed the former to "obtain receipt for $13,500, signed by C. H. O'Connor & Son in favor of George H. Valentine and William L. Kane, assigned to M. B. Cohn." This direction was not expressly made a condition precedent to the delivery of the deed to the purchasers, and it is not clear whether it was so intended. It need not be determined whether the plaintiff was justified in demanding the assignment to him of this so-called receipt, which constituted the agreement between the parties hereinbefore mentioned. The condition, if such it was, did not warrant the cancellation of the agreement by the purchasers; they not having performed or offered to perform the agreement on their part. In their escrow instructions they stated, "Mortgage to contain release clauses of $333.33 a front foot on Argyle." The agreement between the parties did not provide for such a release clause, nor did it provide for deliveries in escrow by either party. The escrow instructions of the purchasers were such as to prevent the delivery of the deposit of $6,500 to the plaintiff without violation of such instructions. Under such circumstances, the purchasers having refused to perform, the rights of the parties must be determined in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Under the authorities cited the judgment entered in favor of plaintiff against Valentine and Kane is proper except in the amount thereof.

[10, 11] The judgment against those defendants is for $30,000, less the amount of the judgments against the other defendants, and interest. Since the judgment against the O'Connors was reduced by the sum of $772.08, which the plaintiff owed them, the net sum for which judgment was given against Valentine and Kane was increased in a like amount, thus in effect giving the plaintiff judgment against them for the amount of his indebtedness to the O'Connors. The plaintiff is entitled to interest only from the 9th day of January, 1924, when, as the court found, he was ready, able, and willing to convey title to the purchasers. In his complaint he prays for interest at 7 per cent. per annum from January 8, 1924. He was given judgment for interest against the O'Connors on the deposit of $13,500. This leaves only $16,500 on which the purchasers were liable for interest. Judgment was rendered November 19, 1924. Interest on the $16,500 up to that time amounted to $994.58. This sum added to the remaining $10,000, which the purchasers owed the plaintiff on the principal, makes a total of $10,994.58, for which sum the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, instead of $11,876.89, for which net sum the court entered judgment.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom "$11,876.89" wherever the same appears in the judgment and substituting in place thereof "$10,994.58." As so modified the judgment is affirmed, the respondent to recover costs of appeal incurred by him in the appeal of the O'Connors, and the appellants Valentine and Kane to recover their costs of appeal against the respondent.

WESTERN LITHOGRAPH CO. v. VANOMAR PRODUCERS et al. (Civ. 6135.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 24, 1928.

I. Attachment —337—Amended complaint alleging sale and promise to pay for merchandise, for which original complaint alleged defendant's indebtedness, held not to exonerate sureties on undertaking to release attachment (Civ. Code, §§ 2819, 2840, 2844).

Amended complaint, alleging that plaintiff sold and delivered certain merchandise to defendant on latter's order, instance and request, that defendant promised and agreed to pay stated sum therefor, with interest, and that certain amount remained due, held not to exonerate sureties on undertaking to release attachment, under Civ. Code, §§ 2819, 2840, 2844, where original complaint alleged that defendant became indebted to plaintiff in certain sum for merchandise sold and delivered to defendant at latter's special instance and request, and that defendant promised and agreed to pay therefor; amended complaint not changing or adding any new parties, stating new cause of action or different facts, altering or impairing debtor's original obligation, nor prejudicing any rights of sureties.

2. Attachment ⚡336—Sureties may stand strictly on express terms of undertaking to release attachment.

Sureties on undertaking given to release attachment may stand strictly on the express terms of their contract.

3. Attachment ⚡345—Undertaking to release attachment held enforceable, though sureties qualified as freeholders instead of holders of real estate; "holder of a freeholder estate" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1057).

Undertaking given to release attachment held not unenforceable as not in proper form because sureties, in their affidavits, qualified as "residents and holders of real estate," instead of "residents and freeholders," as prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1057, holder of real estate or real property being "holder of a freeholder estate."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Freeholder.]

4. Attachment ⚡337—Sureties on undertaking, given to release attachment before sheriff filed writ, held not exonerated, though certificate of proceedings was dated earlier (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 540, 554, 555).

Sureties on undertaking to release attachment held not exonerated on ground that sheriff took undertaking after making return on writ of attachment without court order required by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 554, 555, where sheriff filed writ, with certificate of his proceedings on attachment, on day after undertaking was given him and property released, as authorized by section 540, though such certificate was dated on day writ was placed in his hands; date of certificate not controlling fact of return as found by court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by the Western Lithograph Company against the Vanomar Producers, a corporation, Harry Chandler, and M. H. Sherman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant individuals appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. A. Lane, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELCH, Justice pro tem. Action on an undertaking given to release an attachment on personal property.

On the 7th day of May, 1919, respondent commenced an action in the superior court in Los Angeles county to recover against the defendant the sum of $9,525.70 for labels, stationery, and merchandise sold and delivered by respondent to the defendant. On the same day a writ of attachment was issued out of said court and action. The sheriff of the county, pursuant to said writ, levied on the property of the defendant on said May 7th. On the next day the undertaking herein involved was given for the release of the property. The sheriff thereupon, on May 8th, released the property from attachment. On the next day, May 9th, he filed with the county clerk the writ with a certificate of his proceedings on attachment. No other proceedings were filed in the original suit until August 11, 1919, when the plaintiff therein, respondent herein, filed an amended complaint, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant or of the appellants. After various proceedings had, which are unnecessary to be recited here, a judgment was obtained on June 13, 1922, in favor of the respondent and against the defendant for the sum of $9,335 and costs.

A writ of execution was issued upon said judgment and placed in the hands of the sheriff for levy. Said execution was returned by the sheriff wholly unsatisfied. Demand for payment of said judgment was thereupon duly made upon the judgment debtor and also upon the sureties on the undertaking, which demand in each case was refused.

This action upon the undertaking resulted in a judgment against the principal and sureties from which the sureties appealed on the judgment roll and on a stipulation of facts of the parties.

In the court below and here appellants made and make three defenses to the cause of action against them on the undertaking: (1) That by amending its complaint without the knowledge or consent of the sureties the plaintiff and respondent thereupon altered the obligation of the sureties in such respect as to release them from obligation on their undertaking; (2) that the undertaking so given was not in form a compliance with statutory requirements; (3) that the sheriff had no authority to accept the undertaking and release the property without an order of the court.

These contentions will be taken up in the order made.

[1, 2] 1. What was appellants' contract of surety? They recited in their undertaking that plaintiff had begun an action against the defendant Vanomar Producers, claiming that there was due plaintiff the sum of $9,525.70 or thereabouts; that an attachment had been issued against the property of the defendant as security for the satisfaction of any judgment which might be recovered therein; that certain property and effects of the defendant had been attached by the sheriff under and by virtue of said writ, and that the defendant was desirous of having said property released from attachment.

The obligation of the bond is to the effect that appellants, "in consideration of the premises, and also in consideration of the release from attachment of the property so attached, * * * do hereby jointly and severally undertake in the sum of eleven thousand five hundred and no/100 ($11,500.00) dollars, and promise that, in case the plaintiff recover judgment in the action, we will on demand pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment may be recovered in said action, together with percentages, interest, and costs."

The original complaint in the action in which the undertaking was given alleges that, within the two years last past, the defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $9,525.70 for labels, stationery, and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant, at their special instance and request, and that the defendant promised and agreed to pay for the same.

Under sections 2819, 2840, and 2844, Civil Code, did plaintiff's amended complaint exonerate the bondsmen? A comparison of the allegations of the amended complaint with those of the original complaint answers the question in the negative. The amended complaint alleges that within the two years last past the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant certain labels, stationery, and merchandise on the order, instance, and request of said defendant; that the defendant contracted, promised, and agreed to pay for said labels, stationery, and merchandise so sold and delivered, the sum of $10,897.14, with interest amounting to $558.83; that nothing has been paid on account thereof except $2,000; and that there now remains due, owing, and unpaid principal and interest in the sum of $9,445.97.

The amended complaint did not change or add any new parties to the action. The cause of action set forth in the amended complaint is based upon the same cause of action set forth in the original complaint. The two causes of action in the two pleadings are based on the same facts. Each cause of action is for the recovery of money alleged to be due and unpaid for the sale of the same identical "goods, stationery, and merchandise." The slight difference of phraseology in the wording of the two pleadings does not alter the obligation of either the principal or the sureties in the slightest respect.

After affirming the principle that a surety may stand upon the strict terms of his contract, the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Turner v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 187 Cal. 76, 200 P. 959, says:

"The weight of authority, however, seems to sustain the rule that unless the amendments are such as to substitute new or different parties, or to state a new and independent cause of action, the sureties or guarantors are bound by the judgment."

We hold on this branch of the case that the amended complaint in the original action did not alter or impair in any respect the original obligation of the debtor, nor did it prejudice any rights of the sureties. The sureties may stand strictly on the express terms of their contract, as they have a right to do, and yet they are liable. They undertook and promised to pay "the amount of whatever judgment may be recovered in said action," not exceeding $11,500. The amount of the judgment was $11,490.

[3] 2. The contention that this undertaking is nonenforceable because it is not in proper form is not well taken. Instead of the sureties in their affidavits to the undertaking qualifying as "residents and freeholders," as the law prescribes, they qualified as "residents and holders of real estate." The undertaking itself recites: "We, the undersigned, residents and freeholders in the county of Los Angeles." A holder of real estate or real property is a holder of a freeholder estate. Section 1057, Code of Civil Procedure, has been substantially complied with. The court finds it unnecessary to consider or decide whether or not the undertaking may be enforced as a common-law bond.

[4] 3. The third point made by appellants to exonerate them from the obligation of their undertaking is that the sheriff took the undertaking after he had made his return on the writ of attachment without an order of the court, as required by sections 554 and 555, Code of Civil Procedure. Here are all the dates and facts: On May 7, 1919, the writ of attachment was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff for levy, on the same day levy was made, and, in accordance with the custom and routine business of his office, the sheriff immediately made a certificate of his proceedings on attachment, dating the same May 7, 1919, but did not at that time return the writ and certificate to the court or file the same with the clerk. On May 8th the undertaking herein sued upon was given to the sheriff whereupon the sheriff, as he had a right to do under section 540, Code of Civil Procedure, released the attached property, and noted the fact on his certificate of his proceedings on attachment, which was still in his possession and under his control. On May 9, 1919, the sheriff filed with the clerk the writ of attachment, indorsed thereon or attached thereto his certificate of his proceedings on attachment. His return then was not made before May 9th, and therefore the sheriff had the authority under section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure to receive and accept the undertaking on May 8th, without order of the court. The court below found that the return of the writ was made on May 9th, and not on May 7th, as contended by appellants. The date of the certificate cannot control the fact of the return.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by W. H. Hooper against C. R. Wickes and others, Trustees of the Glenn County High School District. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. W. McGowan, of Willows, for appellants.

W. T. Belieu, of Willows, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 2d day of June, 1923, the plaintiff was employed by the defendants, acting as trustees of the Glenn County high school district, to serve as principal in the schools of said high school district. The written instrument evidencing such employment and the acceptance by the plaintiff thereof is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Notice of Employment.

"To the Superintendent of Schools: You are hereby notified that the board of trustees or city board of education of Glenn County high school district, in the county of Glenn and state of California, held a regular meeting on June 2, 1923, and employed W. H. Hooper, who holds a certificate of the secondary grade, which is on file in our office, to serve as principal in the schools of this high school district. The board agrees to pay him a salary of three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) per year, payable as follows: In ten equal payments of $300.00, each payable at the end of each school month. The term of service agreed upon is ten months, and the time set for the opening of school is August 20th, 1923. The board reserves the right to change the date of opening school. J. W. Birch, Trustee or Member City Board of Education. Lulu West, Trustee or Member City Board of Education. S. W. Chaney, Clerk or Secretary.

"Dated June 2, 1923.

"I hereby accept the conditions stated above and agree to serve as principal for the term specified above, unless released under the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 1609 of the Political Code. [Signed] W. H. Hooper, Principal or Teacher. Witness, signature of principal or teacher: Lola Wolcott."

Thereafter, and on the 3d day of December, 1923, said defendants, as the board of trustees of said high school district, entered an order dismissing the plaintiff from his employment and position as such principal. This action is for the recovery of the unpaid portion of the salary agreed to be paid the plaintiff as damages suffered by him on account of such dismissal.

After setting forth a number of preliminary matters, the plaintiff in this action alleges his employment as principal of the Glenn County high school district for the school year mentioned in the instrument in writing hereinbefore set forth; that pursuant to said contract and agreement plaintiff accepted and entered upon this employment as principal of said school and proceeded to discharge the duties incumbent upon him as principal thereof until dismissed by the defendants as herein stated. It is then further alleged that the defendants, acting as the board of trustees of said high school district, wrongfully and unlawfully breached said contract of employment, and without reason or cause, dismissed plaintiff as principal of said school, and thereafter refused to permit the plaintiff to resume the discharge of his duties under said contract as principal of said high school. The complaint then asks for damages in the sum of $2,100, being the unpaid portion of the salary mentioned in the contract or agreement of employment.

As a defense to this action the defendants, after admitting all the preliminary matters set out in the plaintiff's complaint, deny the employment of the plaintiff for the school year embraced within the notice of agreement herein set forth, and further deny that the defendants, as trustees of said high school district, or otherwise, unlawfully breached the contract of employment with the plaintiff, or without reason or cause dismissed the plaintiff as principal of said high school district, and by amended answer the defendants set forth that there was no lawful contract of employment between the plaintiff and the defendants, and, further, that on the 21st day of November, 1923, written charges were filed with said defendants as the board of trustees of said high school district charging the plaintiff with unprofessional conduct, incompetence, evident unfitness to teach, and persistent violation and refusal to obey the school laws of the state of California and the reasonable rules prescribed for the government of public schools; that notice of the filing of said charges was served upon the plaintiff according to the law, and that thereafter a hearing was held upon said charges at which hearing plaintiff was represented by counsel, witnesses were sworn and examined, and at the conclusion of such hearing the defendants, as trustees of said district, found the plaintiff guilty on all of said charges and dismissed him as principal of the said Glenn County high school district, and duly notified him thereof.

Upon the hearing of this cause before the trial court the plaintiff introduced testimony showing his employment as principal of said high school beginning with May or June, 1920, and that he had continued as such principal until the time of his dismissal as hereinbefore stated. Considerable testimony was introduced as to the number of teachers employed in said schools which is not material to be considered herein. The testimony further shows that the plaintiff assumed his duties as principal under the contract of employment hereinbefore mentioned, during the latter part of August, 1923. The contract or notice of employment was introduced in evidence. The amount of money which had been paid the plaintiff on account of his salary of $3,000 per year, and the amount still remaining unpaid thereon was likewise proven. It was further shown by the testimony that the plaintiff was at all times ready and willing to resume his duties as principal of said school during the time covered by the notice or agreement of employment. Upon cross-examination it was shown that the plaintiff, during the school year covered by the notice of employment, had earned a sufficient sum of money by reason of other employment to reduce his damages to the sum of $1,398.75 on account of the unpaid portion of the salary agreed to be paid to him in the event the court held plaintiff was entitled to recover. Judgment was entered in plaintiff's favor for said sum. Upon cross-examination and also as a part of the defendants' defense, the defendants introduced in testimony the following charges against the plaintiff filed with the defendants as the trustees of Glenn County high school district, to wit:

"Board of Trustees of Glenn County High School District, Willows, California—Gentlemen: The undersigned hereby charges W. H. Hooper, the principal of the Glenn County high school at Willows, Cal., with unprofessional conduct, incompetence, evident unfitness for teaching, and persistent violation of the reasonable rules prescribed for the government of the schools by the state board of education and by the board of trustees of the Glenn County high school. That said unprofessional conduct consists in the following acts on the part of the said W. H. Hooper: * * * in making erroneous statements in his report to the superintendent of public instruction and to the county superintendent of schools, during the month of October, 1923, and also in making the statement to the board of school trustees of Glenn County high school district that the accounts of the student body had been audited by Mr. E. O. Talbott and himself, and that no indebtedness, except for a moving picture machine, existed, when as a matter of fact the accounts had not been so audited and numerous other debts are charged to said student body. That the persistent violation of the reasonable rules prescribed for the government of the schools by the state board of education and the board of trustees of the Glenn County high school consists in his failure and refusal to be at the schoolhouse of said Glenn County high school district at the times specified and provided for in the rules of the state board of education, and the rules and instructions of the board of trustees. That the commission of the acts as charged above on the part of the said W. H. Hooper render him unworthy, incompetent, and unfit to hold the principalship of the school."

[1] These charges were filed against the plaintiff with said board of trustees by C. R. Wickes, one of the members of said board of trustees, and one of the defendants herein. Other charges were filed against the plaintiff relating to acts of the plaintiff during a previous year, but neither such charges nor the action of the board of trustees taken thereon were admitted in evidence. As the charges just referred to and the action of the defendants as the board of trustees of said high school district related to a period not included within the contract of employment involved in this action, we think that there was no error on the part of the court in excluding the same. The defendants also introduced in evidence the minutes of themselves while acting as a board of trustees passing upon the charges set forth herein, finding the plaintiff guilty.

No evidence whatever was introduced or offer made to introduce any evidence showing the truth of the charges preferred against the plaintiff, nor was any testimony whatever introduced to show that the defendants, as the trustees of said high school district, had just, or any, cause to dismiss the plaintiff from his position and employment as principal of the high school of said district. The cause was submitted to the court simply upon the record showing the filing of charges and the verdict or conclusion of the defendants as the board of trustees of said school district acting thereon. Upon this state of the record the trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff as stated, and the defendants appeal.

[2] The employment of plaintiff having been shown, his readiness to fulfill his part of the contract, and the breach of the defendants having been established by their dismissal of the plaintiff during the school year, does the simple offering in testimony of the charges preferred against the plaintiff, notice of the time of hearing, the fact of hearing, and the conclusion of the defendants acting as the board of trustees of said district constitute any defense to the action? Subdivision (j) of section 1609 of the Political Code empowers the trustees of a school district to dismiss a principal for one or more of the following causes, after a fair and impartial hearing, to wit: Immoral or unprofessional conduct; incompetence; evident unfitness for teaching; persistent violation of, or refusal to obey the school laws of California or reasonable rules prescribed for the government of public schools. This subdivision of the section is followed by others relating to procedure not material here for the reason that no question is raised as to the procedure in this cause. We come then to the subdivision pertaining to this action, which reads:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed in such manner as to deprive any teacher of his rights and remedies in a court of competent jurisdiction on a question of fact and law."

This subdivision of section 1609 of the Political Code was under consideration by this court in the case of Alexander v. Manton Joint Union School District, 73 Cal. App. 252, 238 P. 742, and this court, speaking through Mr. Presiding Justice Finch, said:

"It would be difficult to give the provision quoted any meaning other than that, upon the discharge of a teacher for any alleged cause, he is entitled to maintain an action in court to determine the truth or falsity of the charges preferred against him. The reasons which may have actuated the Legislature in giving a teacher such right are well illustrated by the facts in this case. The trustees, as the representatives of one party to the contract, preferred the charges against plaintiff."

In this particular the circumstances of the case at bar are exactly parallel with the circumstances presented in the Alexander Case. One of the trustees preferred the charges, and also acted in the capacity of a trustee to determine their truth or falsity. Further considering the circumstances in the Alexander Case, it appears that the respondent, the Manton school district, after offering the charges in evidence, offered to prove the truth of the charges preferred against the plaintiff by independent testimony without reference to the decision of the school board. To this offer the plaintiff objected. While the form of the offer in that case was not as clear and definite as might have been made, this court held that the trial court was in error in refusing to admit testimony to show the truth of the charges preferred against the plaintiff, and that the trial court committed reversible error in excluding such testimony. The trial in the Alexander Case proceeded upon the theory that the decision of the board of trustees upon the charges preferred was final and conclusive. The substance of the holding in the case of Alexander v. Manton, supra, is that upon an action such as is being presented to us upon this appeal, the trial court is vested with authority to hear all pertinent testimony relative to the support of the charges preferred against the plaintiff as principal of the high school district, to show the propriety, correctness and justness of the action of the board of trustees in ordering his dismissal. The holding in the Alexander Case, as we read it, is also further to the effect that subdivision 5 of section 1609 of the Political Code lays the whole matter open before the trial court for inquiry and investigation as to the truthfulness of the charges, as though no testimony had been taken before the board of trustees and no action had thereon. The very wording of the subdivision seems to necessitate such holding in providing that "nothing in this act shall be construed in such manner as to deprive any teacher of his rights and remedies in a court of competent jurisdiction on a question of fact and law." That is equivalent to saying that none of the provisions contained in section 1609 of the Political Code shall be so construed as to prevent a teacher from bringing an action for a violation of a contract held by him with a board of school trustees which necessitates the further holding, as would be the case in any ordinary action, that all that is necessary for a plaintiff to do is to prove the contract of employment, his readiness to perform and the breach by the opposite party. That is one of the rights included and referred to in subdivision 5 of said section 1609, because it is one of the rights given to a teacher just the same as to any other party to maintain an action for a violation of contract. The language of said subdivision of said section is also equivalent to saying that in such an action it is incumbent upon the party disavowing the contract to show that he is justified in such disavowal, as the rights guaranteed by said subdivision give to the teacher the same rights that are vouchsafed to other parties occupying contractual relations.

The form of the action does not appear to us to be at all decisive of the rights of the parties or as to proofs sustaining the action of either of the parties to the contract. That is to say, in any case a party breaching a contract must show good cause therefor. This is further illustrated in the case of Goldsmith v. Board of Education, 66 Cal. App. 157, 225 P. 783, where the subject-matter of the dismissal of a school teacher was elaborately considered by this court in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Hart. A consideration of that opinion shows that while the action was one praying for a writ of mandate, the trial court had before it not only the charge preferred against the teacher, but also all the evidence upon which the decision of the board of education was based, and it was upon this evidence that the trial court held that the action of the board of education was amply supported, and upon appeal to this court it was held that such evidence supported the charge filed against the teacher, and the acts referred to in the testimony constituted acts condemned by the statute and affirmed the judgment of the trial court. While in form an action for a writ of mandate, all the testimony bearing upon the truthfulness of the charges preferred against the teacher was placed before the trial court just as we hold it should have been done in this case. It is not incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove a negative. As we have stated, occupying a contractual relation, all he was called upon to do in the first instance was to introduce proof showing employment, the term of the employment, his readiness to perform, and the breach on the part of the defendants, or their refusal to permit performance, and the burden of showing justification or excuse for such refusal was then cast upon the defendants. In other words, it was their duty to introduce testimony showing the truth of the charges upon which they had acted. The simple introduction of the charges and of their action thereon did not, under the subdivision of the section of the Political Code which we have referred to, tend to establish any defense, as the charges in and of themselves and the action of the defendants thereon prove nothing. It may be that the very fact that boards of school trustees frequently act in the capacity of complaining witnesses, prosecutors and judges induced the legislature to write into section 1609 of the Political Code the subdivision which gives a teacher a right to prosecute his action for the violation of contract where the justification of the action of the board in dismissing a teacher and disavowing its contract must be established.

By reason of the fact that the two cases from the District Court of Appeal which we have cited refer to practically all of the California cases relating to the dismissal of teachers, further citations are not herein given. It is sufficient to say that in whatever form the question has arisen, the facts appear to have been inquired into by the trial court, and we think such would have been the proper procedure in this case. We do not think that the appellants' contention that no contract of employment existed by reason of the action of the board of trustees on June 2, 1923, and the acceptance thereof by the plaintiff, is tenable, and therefore will not be discussed herein.

No attempt having been made to introduce any testimony showing that the defendants, as the board of trustees of said high school district, were justified in their disavowal of their contract with the plaintiff and ordering his dismissal, it follows that the judgment of the trial court awarding damages suffered by the plaintiff must be and the same is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WESTWOOD. (Cr. 1434.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 21, 1928.

1. Burglary $\S$ 41(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for burglary.

In prosecution for burglary of wholesale drug house by one entering through rear and taking articles not paid for, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction as against claim that defendant had no intent to commit larceny at time of entry.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 115(2)—Conviction supported by some evidence is not disturbed on appeal.

Where there is some evidence from which jury could find crime was committed, conviction will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James G. Conlan, Judge.

Charles Westwood was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Milton T. U'Ren, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging him with the commission of the crime of burglary. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, also a motion in arrest of judgment. The motions were denied, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial.

[1, 2] The defendant presents the point that the prosecution absolutely failed in its endeavor to prove that the defendant entered the premises with the intent to commit larceny. A consideration of the point involves at least the following facts:

Coffin-Redington Company conduct a wholesale and retail drug business, at 401 Mission street, in the city and county of San Francisco. Between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock the employees of this company go to lunch, and a sign "Closed between 12 and 1" is hung on the front door, and the shades are drawn. There is a back door which, at the time the defendant entered the premises, was closed but unlocked. During the lunch hour on July 13, 1927, William Mahoney, a salesman in the employ of the company, was in the store and seated at a place in the salesroom at a spot from which he could not readily be seen. While seated there he heard a person coming down the floor from the shipping room, which is in the back part of the premises. Later he saw the defendant put a comb and brush into his pocket. The defendant commenced going through more goods. When the defendant saw Mahoney seated in the room near by, defendant asked him if he had awakened him. The defendant then stated that he had come into the store to buy some adrenalin. He was told that he could make no purchases during the noon hour. He said that he would come back at 1 o'clock and started out. At first he turned toward the back door and then turned toward the front door. At the front door he was arrested by Mahoney. Later the police officer came and upon taking the defendant into custody he was searched and the comb and brush, the property of the company, were taken from the defendant's inside pocket. The police officer testified that the defendant asked him what he was going to charge him with, and, upon being informed that the charge would be burglary, the defendant said, "Charge me with petit larceny." At the same time the defendant gave him the name of Charles Wilson. He admitted that he had not bought the articles taken from his pocket.

The defendant contends that in the charge of burglary intent is a necessary element. Thereupon he argues that the record contains no evidence to the effect that the defendant entered the premises 401 Mission street with intent to steal, but that the evidence is such that the intent to steal may have been formed after the entry, and that the offense, if anything, was petit larceny and not burglary. The defendant cites State v. Carroll, 13 Mont. 246, 33 P. 688; State v. Moore, 12 N. H. 42, 48, 49; People v. Barry, 94 Cal. 481, 484, 29 P. 1026; People v. Lowen, 109 Cal. 381, 42 P. 32. Conceding the rule of law is as contended by the defendant, we think that the facts do not support the defendant's contention. True it is that no witnesses saw the defendant enter the back door. Nevertheless, he was heard to come from that direction, and the record does not disclose how he could have entered any other door. The fact that at the time of his arrest he made a false statement as to his name was at least some evidence of guilt. The fact that he inquired as to what charge would be placed against him would seem to imply that he was conscious of having committed at least two offenses, burglary and petit larceny. In other words, the record presents some evidence showing the intent with which the defendant entered the premises, and the implied finding of the jury was that he had entered the building with an unlawful intention. Under these circumstances, this court may not disturb the judgment based on that verdict. We think the conclusion which we have reached is supported by, rather than questioned by, the authorities cited by the defendant, and that it is further supported by People v. Brittain, 142 Cal. 8, 75 P. 314, 100 Am. St. Rep. 95, and People v. King, 4 Cal. App. 213, 87 P. 400.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. EDENBURG. (Cr. 1557.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 24, 1928.

Collective examination of jurors by trial judge under Pen. Code, § 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, with denial to counsel of right to ask questions covered by judge, held not prejudicial error, where it did not affirmatively appear that counsel was precluded from asking questions not theretofore covered, or that any juror who served was prejudiced, and defendant did not exhaust his peremptory challenges.

Real question in determining whether a law is ex post facto is whether accused was deprived of substantial right.

3. Constitutional law ☞197—Law is "ex post facto" as to acts already committed, where it makes innocent act criminal, or aggravates crime, or inflicts greater punishment, or authorizes different or less testimony.

Law is "ex post facto" where (1) it makes act criminal which was done before passing of law and was innocent when done, (2) it aggravates crime or makes it greater than when committed, (3) it inflicts greater punishment than was annexed to crime when committed, or (4) it authorizes less or different testimony than was required when offense was committed.

Pen. Code, § 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, providing that it shall be duty of trial court to examine prospective jurors, thus casting duty of examination on court in first instance, instead of parties, as theretofore under said section, held not ex post facto as to offenses committed before it took effect, in view of sections 1081, 1082, since change does not deprive defendant of any substantial right.

Pen. Refusing instruction, in prosecution for child stealing, that, when specific intent is element of offense, no presumption of law can arise to decide it, held not error, where covered by given instructions.

8. Criminal law ☞829(9, 13)—Refusing instruction on presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt held not error, where covered by given instructions.

Refusing instruction that presumption of innocence is not only sufficient on which to base acquittal, but is of such importance that jury must acquit, unless convinced beyond reasonable doubt of guilt, held not error, where covered by given instructions.

John G. Covert, of Hanford, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie and Warner I. Praul, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendants Oscar Edenburg and Guy Watley were jointly charged and convicted of the offense of child stealing, a crime denounced by section 278 of the Penal Code. The appellant, Oscar Edenburg, prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction.

It appears from the testimony that Mr. and Mrs. Lockhard, the parents of Ruby and Leona, 14 and 15 years of age, respectively, were operating a restaurant at Corcoran, Cal., and required the help of their daughters in its operation very early in the morning and late into the evening. For some little time prior to June 28, 1927, the daughter of Mr. Lockhard's first cousin, by name Ida May Wilson, apparently in years of about the same age as Ruby and Leona, had been visiting at Corcoran, and was anxious that the two girls should return with her to Los Angeles. A few days prior to June 28th the appellant suggested to the girls that he was going to Los Angeles, and that they should come with him and the defendant Guy Watley. He promised them a good time, no work, and the privilege of going to dances and other places of amusement. He promised Ruby that they would get married, go to Phoenix, Ariz., then to some little town where they could stay until everything was over with, when they could return to Los Angeles, and make their home. He arranged to get the girls after everybody was asleep, and accordingly, at about 3 o'clock in the morning, he helped them to escape out of the window of their room, from which the screen had been cut for the purpose, and the four of them started. On arriving in Los Angeles Wednesday afternoon Ruby was sent to the door of the home of Ida May Wilson, with oral instructions from the appellant not to let them know who she was. Ida May was not at home, and the girls were taken to a place designated as "Mother Houston's" on Forty-Seventh street. Later in the day they succeeded in getting into communication with Ida May, and the two defendants and the three girls attended a dance that evening. The four of them stayed at "Mother Houston's" that night. On the following day the two men and the girls went to Watts for the purpose of enabling the appellant to borrow money to continue their trip to Phoenix. On the way they stopped some distance from the home of Ida May while the defendant Guy Watley went to the house and got Ida May to accompany them to Watts. The girls were told by the appellant not to go to the house with Watley. They did not secure the needed funds at Watts, and on the return to Los Angeles appellant, according to the testimony of the Lockhard girls, threatened "to beat hell out of" them if they went to the home of Ida May Wilson. However, Leona did go, and stayed there that night, while the appellant and Guy Watley, together with Ruby, stopped overnight at a place designated as "Bessie's," where the three of them slept in the same bed, and where the appellant had sexual intercourse with Ruby. The next day the appellant was arrested in the back yard of this same house behind a chicken coop; he and Ruby having gone out the back door when the father and officers approached the front door. There was also testimony tending to show that the two places mentioned where the appellant and defendant stopped in Los Angeles did not bear good reputations.

[1] In the selection of the jury to try the cause the prospective jurors were examined by the trial judge, and he refused to permit counsel to ask any questions which had been covered by him in his examination. The trial judge, after cautioning each of them to answer candidly, asked the prospective jurors collectively concerning whether they had any prejudice against the defendants because of the nature of the charge, or of their arrest, also concerning their relationship with the attorneys, and acquaintance with either of the defendants, whether they had heard anything concerning the case, whether they were biased or prejudiced by any fact, if there was any reason they could not give the defendants a fair trial, concerning their sympathy, with the usual instruction that the jurors are the sole judges of the facts, and the one concerning the presumption of innocence and the requirement that the state must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt, and whether they would follow all of the instructions of the court. In each instance the question was so worded that it might be answered by raising, or failing to raise, the hand, and, if no hand were raised, the judge announced "no hand is raised," or some equivalent statement. After this examination, the judge remarked to counsel, "The attorneys for the defendant may ask the jurors, or any one of them, any questions that are not covered by the court," which ruling was consistently followed to the extent that the trial judge sustained an objection to a question propounded by counsel for the defense asking the prospective jurors if they understood that "it requires the joint operation" of "the intent and the act" to constitute a crime, on the theory that this question was covered by the question concerning whether they would abide by all of the instructions of the court. This sufficiently states the manner of selecting the jurors to understand the objections of appellant thereto, which are that "he was deprived of the right to question the prospective jurors for the purpose of determining whether or not they were unbiased and properly qualified to give him a fair and impartial trial," and that the amendment of section 1078 of the Penal Code, providing for the examination of prospective jurors by the judge, violates the constitutional inhibition against ex post facto laws in its application to trials for offenses committed prior to the time it took effect.

Undoubtedly, appellant was entitled, as he avers, to a fair and impartial trial by jury, and, if this was denied him, it would constitute reversible error. It does not appear from the record, however, that he was deprived of this right. We said recently in the case of People v. Riordan (Cal. App.) 250 P. 190:

"It has repeatedly been decided that, in jurisdictions where no statutory limitation or restriction of such examination to individual jurors exists, a judgment will not be reversed unless it shall affirmatively appear that the defendant was precluded from interrogating the jurors upon matters not theretofore covered, or that any juror who served was prejudiced or not qualified. Nichols v. State, 97 Tex. Cr. R. 174, 260 S. W. 1050; Murphy v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 7 F.(2d) 85; State v. Munch, 57 Mo. App. 207; Johnson v. State, 29 Wyo. 121, 211 P. 484."

In addition to the fact that it does not appear that counsel was precluded from asking questions "not theretofore covered," or that "any juror who served was prejudiced," we are confronted by the situation that the defense did not exhaust its peremptory challenges, and therefore it rather appears from the record that those who did serve were neither prejudiced nor lacked the necessary qualifications. Somewhat pertinent to the instant case is the statement in People v. Craig, 196 Cal. 19-26, 235 P. 721, 723:

"By all of the authorities of this state touching like situations the rule is that an erroneous disallowance of a challenge for cause is not prejudicial even though the defendant finally exhaust his peremptory challenges if it does not appear that he had occasion to or desired to use an additional peremptory challenge or that the jurors finally accepted were not entirely satisfactory to him."

While we do not care to affix the stamp of approval to the method of collectively examining prospective jurors, on account of the dangers which beset its course, nevertheless the examination in this instance seems to have been quite comprehensive, and we are satisfied no prejudicial error is made to appear, and that defendant was not deprived of a fair and impartial trial by jury.

[2] We now turn to the claim of appellant that the amendment of section 1078 of the Penal Code violates the constitutional inhibition against ex post facto laws in its application to trials for offenses committed prior to the time it took effect. As amended (St. 1927, p. 1039), it reads as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the trial court to examine the prospective jurors to select a fair and impartial jury. He shall permit reasonable examination of prospective jurors by counsel for the people and for the defendant."

Prior to the amendment the section read:

"Trial of challenge. If the facts are denied, the challenge must be tried by the court."

By this section and sections 1081 and 1082 of the Penal Code it would seem that the Legislature assumed that the challenge for cause and the denial of the fact asserted as the foundation thereof should precede the examination of a juror. It is stated in People v. Edwards, 163 Cal. 752, 754, 127 P. 58, 59, that:

"In practice, however, it usually saves time and promotes justice to allow the party to first elicit the facts by questioning the juror, and this course is generally followed. People v. Reynolds, 16 Cal. 131. There is no other provision for the examination of jurors either to prepare for or to prove the basis for a challenge to an individual juror."

It will be seen, therefore, that the change consists in casting the duty upon the court of examining the jurors in the first instance to determine whether or not there exists a reason for a challenge for cause. The respondent asserts that the change relates to a procedural change, and therefore is not ex post facto in an objectionable sense. It is an insufficient answer to appellant's contention to say that the amendment involves a procedural change. Not all procedural changes are outside the inhibition. The real question to be framed is whether the person accused has been deprived of a substantial right by reason of the change. Illustrative of this we quote from the case of Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 2 S. Ct. 443, 27 L. Ed. 506:

"Can the law with regard to bail, to indictments, to grand juries, to the trial jury, all be changed by state legislation, after the offense committed, to the disadvantage of the prisoner, and not held to be ex post facto, because it relates to procedure, as it does according to Mr. Bishop?"

"And can any substantial right which the law gave the defendant at the time to which his guilt relates be taken away from him by ex post facto legislation, because, in the use of a modern phrase, it is called a law of procedure? We think it cannot." (Italics ours.)

[3] And from the same case, quoting from Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. Ed. 648, we find a statement of four distinct classes of laws which violate the constitutional guaranty, two of which may involve changes in procedure. They are as follows:

"1. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action. 2. Every law that aggravates the crime or makes it greater than it was when committed. 3. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than was annexed to the crime when committed. 4. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense * * * to convict the offender."

[4] Viewing the complaint of appellant in the light of these enunciations from the United States Supreme Court, we conclude that the amendment relates to a procedural change of such a character as not to deprive him of any substantial right, and does not fall within any of the four classes enumerated. Nor was he deprived of a fair and impartial trial by a jury of twelve men, nor was less or different testimony sufficient to convict. The change falls within the same bounds as those found not to violate the constitutional provision in People v. Mortimer, 46 Cal. 114; People v. Campbell, 59 Cal. 243, 43 Am. Rep. 257; People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 165 P. 555; People v. Gibson, 39 Cal. App. 202, 178 P. 338; and People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 P. 1042.

[5] The appellant next assails the judgment for errors which he claims the trial judge committed in refusing and giving instructions. First he asserts that the court erred in refusing to give a requested instruction as follows:

"You are instructed that the offense charged in the information pertains to and is restricted to children under the age of twelve years; and if you find that the children, alleged to have been taken or enticed away from their parents, were over the age of twelve years, then you are instructed to acquit the defendants."

Section 278 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

"Every person who maliciously, forcibly, or fraudulently takes or entices away any minor child with intent to detain and conceal such child from its parent, guardian, or other person having the lawful charge of such child, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding twenty years."

Counsel bases his argument upon the fact that section 784 of the Penal Code, which states that the jurisdiction of certain criminal actions shall be in the county in which the offense is committed, etc., provides in subdivision 2 thereof as follows:

"2. For decoying, taking, or enticing away a child under the age of twelve years, with intent to detain and conceal it from its parent, guardian, or other person having the lawful charge of the child."

He argues that the offense mentioned in this section is the same as that denounced by section 278 and hence must be construed as a limitation upon it. It will be noted that section 784 merely fixes the jurisdiction for certain offenses, and that by section 777 of the Penal Code, where the jurisdiction is not otherwise provided, "the jurisdiction * * * is in the county wherein it is committed." We see nothing necessarily inconsistent in sections 278 and 784, and, in accordance with the well-recognized rule of statutory construction that all parts and phrases shall be construed so as to give each and every part thereof a meaning, we can arrive at no conclusion other than that section 278 was intended to guard all minor children against those who would entice them away from their natural guardians, their parents, or from their legal guardians. As a possible aid to this construction, it should be noted that in the next case to which reference is made, People v. Black, infra, the child there was of the age of 16 years.

[6] The next instruction complained of was one given by the court as follows:

"You are instructed that in order to convict the defendants it is not required that the prosecution prove that the defendants actually concealed or detained Ruby Lockhard or Leona Lockhard from their parents."

[7] Appellant relies upon the authority of People v. Black, 147 Cal. 426, 81 P. 1099, which holds "that the gist of the offense consists of the taking and enticing away of a minor child 'with intent to detain and conceal such child' from its parent, guardian, or other person having lawful charge of it. In a prosecution under this section it is not enough to show that there was an intent to conceal the minor, but the intent must be accompanied with an intent to detain, and both must exist and be found by the jury in order to constitute an offense under the statute." We garner from counsel's argument and his objection to the instruction that his construction upon the language just quoted is that there must be an actual concealment and detention, but we do not so understand that case. It simply means, and the instructions are in accord, that the intent to conceal and the intent to detain must be proven as a fact in the case. It does not say that the intent needs necessarily to be accompanied by an actual concealment and actual detention. We do not repeat the instructions of the court upon the subject of intent for the reason that the next objection of counsel is to the refusal of the court to give the following instruction:

"When specific intent is (an) element of offense no presumption of law can arise that will decide this question of intent."

The jury were very fully instructed upon this phase of the trial in not less than five instructions, and it will be sufficient for the purposes of this opinion if we point out that the court elaborately conveyed to them the substance of the law announced in People v. Black, supra, and in addition stated that:

"* * * When a specific intent is an element of the offense it presents a question of fact which must be proved like any other fact in the case. All the circumstances surrounding the act furnish the evidence from which the presence or absence of the specific intent may be inferred by the jury; and no presumption of law can ever arise that will decide it."

It will therefore be apparent that the subject of the requested instruction was amply covered.

[8] Appellant also complains because the trial court refused to give an instruction requested by him to the effect that the presumption of innocence is not only sufficient upon which to base an acquittal, but is of such importance that the jury must acquit, unless, after hearing the evidence, the jury is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt. In other instructions the court fully covered the law on the subject of presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt, and the jury, as reasonable men, could not have failed to understand the law upon this phase of the case.

[9-11] The last assignment of error asserts that the court improperly received evidence showing that appellant had sexual intercourse with Ruby Lockhard during the night that she remained with him and the other defendant at the place designated as "Bessie's." Concededly it is the general rule, as counsel contends, that testimony of a separate and distinct offense may not be introduced. A well-recognized exception to this general rule, however, is where proof of the distinct offense has a direct tendency to prove the intent with which the act was done for which the defendant is on trial. People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 P. 43; People v. Ratledge, 172 Cal. 401, 156 P. 455; People v. Lopez, 135 Cal. 23, 66 P. 965. It cannot be gainsaid that proof of intercourse with the girl by the appellant while they were in Los Angeles tended directly to show the intent with which she was enticed from her parents.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PLUM et al. (Cr. 1009.)*

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 21, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 22, 1928.

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 119—Words "steal and carry away" in information, otherwise in statutory form, for grand theft may be treated as surplusage, in absence of prejudice to defendants (Pen. Code, $\S$ 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, $\S$ 1, and $\S$ 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Words "steal and carry away" in information, otherwise in precise form prescribed by Pen. Code, $\S$ 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, for grand theft in violation of section 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, $\S$ 1, may be treated as surplusage, in absence of any possible prejudice to defendants.

2. Indictment and information $\S$ 110(18)—Statute merges crimes of larceny, embezzlement, and obtaining property by false pretenses into crime of theft, charge of which substantially in statutory form is sufficient (Pen. Code, $\S\S$ 870, 925, and $\S$ 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, $\S$ 1, and $\S$ 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Pen. Code, $\S$ 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, $\S$ 1, merges former crimes of larceny, embezzlement, and obtaining property by false pretenses into one crime of theft, charge of which substantially in form prescribed by section 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, is sufficient, especially in view of sections 870, 925, requiring that transcript of testimony at preliminary examination or before grand jury be furnished defendant in event of commitment for trial or indictment.

3. Larceny $\S$ 43—Defendant meat inspector's report for September held immaterial in trial for larceny of cattle inspected by him in August.

In trial of city meat inspector and slaughterhouse owner for grand theft of cattle by falsely representing that they were condemned as tubercular after their sale and delivery to latter defendant, former defendant's official report for September, showing condemnation of three of latter's cattle in that month, was immaterial, where witnesses for both prosecution and defendants testified that cattle sold were inspected in August.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1120(3)—Supreme Court cannot determine whether excluded bill of sale, not made part of record, was material.

Where excluded bill of sale, offered in evidence by defendants, was not made part of record and it does not appear when or by whom it was executed or what were its contents, appellate court cannot determine whether it was material in trial for larceny of cattle.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 772(2)—Ordinarily, instruction should be given in language of statute defining crime.

Ordinarily, it is best to give an instruction in the language of the statute defining the crime charged.

6. Larceny $\S$ 68(1)—Whether cattle were taken by trespass from owner's possession, fraudulently converted while in wrongdoer's possession, or obtained by criminal false pretenses held for jury (Pen. Code, $\S$ 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, $\S$ 1).

In trial for grand theft of cattle, in violation of Pen. Code, $\S$ 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, $\S$ 1, it was for jury to determine from facts proved whether taking thereof was by trespass from possession of owner, fraudulent conversion while in wrongdoer's possession, or by criminal false pretenses.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 779—Instruction on conspiracy held unnecessary, in view of instructions at defendant's request not to consider codefendant's admissions and declarations as evidence against former defendant.

Where court repeatedly instructed jury at one defendant's request that admissions and declarations by codefendant could not be considered as evidence against former defendant, it was not necessary to instruct jury on subject of conspiracy.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 956(10)—Affidavit as to juror's statement before examination that she would hang defendant held not to warrant new trial, in absence of showing of diligence.

Affidavit that one summoned as juror told affiant before her examination that she would hang defendant because convinced that he was guilty held insufficient to warrant new trial, in absence of showing as to when defendants first discovered such juror's bias or whether testimony as to her qualifications showed bias or put defendants on further inquiry, or of any steps by defendants to make their affidavit that they had no knowledge of such facts a part of record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Fred Plum and R. S. Christman were convicted of grand theft, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Ray Manwell and W. E. Davies, both of Marysville, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information charges the defendants with the crime of "grand theft, committed as follows: The said Fred Plum and R. S. Christman on or about the 29th day of August, A. D. 1927, at the county of Yuba, in the state of California, then and there being, did willfully and unlawfully take, steal, and carry away the property of one J. B. Dalby, consisting of 5 head of cattle, of the value of $200." Neither defendant demurred to the information, and each of them entered a plea of not guilty. They were both convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

At the time of the alleged crime Christman, who is a veterinary surgeon, was meat inspector and health officer of the city of Marysville. Plum owned a meat market in Marysville and a slaughterhouse near Ostrom station, about midway between Marysville and the town of Sheridan. J. B. Dalby was a farmer, residing near Sheridan.

August 19, 1927, Dalby called Christman to the farm to treat a sick cow. Christman "looked at the cow" and "said it was a bad case of tuberculosis and there could be nothing done for her." Dalby then requested Christman to test the other cattle on the place, and on the following day Christman "injected the cattle with tuberculin, 11 head." He returned on August 23 and "said that out of the 11 there was 9 that reacted." Dalby testified:

"He advised us to sell the cattle and take a new start. I told him I would sell them to the Pleasant Grove butcher. * * * He said, 'If I was you, I would sell them to Fred Plum. I am inspector. I will do the inspecting and see you get a square deal. * * * If you sell the cattle anywhere else, there will be chances of loss.' I said, * * * 'I don't want anything to do with Fred Plum. * * * I sold him beef cattle and he owes me $30 or $40 that he has owed the last 6 or 8 years.' He says, 'There is plenty of money behind the business now, and you are safe in selling the cattle there.' * * * I says, 'All right. If that is the case, Fred Plum can have the cattle.'"

August 25 Christman again went to the farm and there branded the 9 head of cattle with the letter T on the left jaw. At that time he gave Dalby a written estimate of the weights of the condemned cattle and stated that they should bring 1 cent a pound below the San Francisco market. On August 27 Plum appeared at the farm and purchased 7 head of the cattle at the estimated weights and price suggested by Christman. He gave Dalby a check for $50, on the back of which was indorsed, "Subject to inspection. Balance to be paid after cattle are inspected and passed." Later, on the same day, 6 of the cattle were taken to Plum's slaughterhouse. The seventh one was taken August 29, about the middle of the afternoon. Dalby testified that he saw the 6 head of cattle in Plum's corral at the slaughterhouse a "little after" noon on Monday, August 29; that on August 31 he saw Christman in Marysville, who stated that he had inspected 2 of the cattle, 2 calves; that they "passed all right," and that he "would go down that Wednesday evening and inspect the balance and notify us by mail on September 1st as to the result of the inspection"; and that on September 3 he received a letter from Christman reading as follows:

"Dr. R. S. Christman, D. V. M. Phone 334.
"Office of City Health Officer. City Hall.

"Marysville, California, September 2, 1927.

"Mr. J. B. Dalby, Sheridan, California—Dear Sir: The first of the month has kept me exceedingly busy, hence the delay in my promised note to you, but will say I regret very much the fact that I had no alternative other than to condemn all of the cattle delivered by you to Mr. Plum's slaughterhouse, excepting the first two veal slaughtered.

"Out of my seven years' experience as a meat inspector I have never encountered such a virulent type of tuberculosis. They were lesionized throughout, which means generalization. Yours very truly, City of Marysville, R. S. Christman, Meat Inspector."

Clarence J. Dalby, a son of the witness last mentioned, gave testimony to the same effect as that stated.

Lester Mitchell testified that he had been "following the trade of butcher" for about 20 years; that he had worked for 2 years under federal inspection and 2 years under state inspection; that he had charge of Plum's slaughterhouse from August 10 to the latter part of September; that during that time he lived at the slaughterhouse with his family; that he butchered all of the Dalby cattle on August 30 and put the carcasses in the ice-box, hanging them separately in accordance with instructions given him by Plum; that he is "acquainted with the signs of tuberculosis in cattle, that is, butchered stuff"; that there were no signs of tuberculosis in the carcasses of the Dalby cattle; that he saw Plum in Marysville during the evening of the same day, at which time Plum "asked me how the cattle butchered out, the Dalby cattle. I said, 'All right.' He said they were reactors. I said, 'No; they were all right.' * * * He said, 'Don't you see what I mean? They are reactors. They are supposed to go down.' And I said, 'You can't get away with those calves,' and he says, 'Maybe I can't get away with the calves, but the other 5 are supposed to go down,'" that Plum there stated "that the cattle were to be sold and the Dalbys to be told they were destroyed;" that the witness sold the carcasses on Plum's instructions on September 1, some of them in Sacramento and some in Roseville; that in the evening of that day he delivered to Plum "the receipts, or tags, for the weight and price that I had sold to the different shops"; that Plum said, "It is too much to split with Dr. Christman;" that Plum then "deducted from $8 to $15 a head off of that" and said, "That looks better now, it is too much money for Mr. Christman to split;" that three or four days later "Plum came out with Dr. Christman" and "Plum called me off to one side and whispered to me that Dalby was making an investigation of his cattle, and if he came there and asked me if I tanked them to tell him yes;" that on August 31 Christman appeared at the slaughterhouse and stamped the carcasses of the Dalby cattle, "Marysville health department, inspected and passed," stamped them "with seven stamps on each side"; that at that time Christman "asked me, * * * 'Are these the Dalby cattle?' * * * I said, 'Yes;'" and that there were no "cattle tanked or destroyed" during the time he was working for Plum.

The defendants and their witnesses gave testimony to the effect that the cattle in controversy were butchered by Mitchell on Sunday, August 28; that the carcasses were inspected and condemned by Christman on the following day, at which time he cut them down, "sliced them across" and poured coal oil over them to make them unfit for human food; and that they were then placed in the steam tank and cooked, the tallow then being drawn off and the meat fed to the hogs. There is other testimony corroborating or discrediting the testimony of one side or the other. Enough has been stated to show that the evidence is substantially conflicting on every contested issue.

[1] Appellants contend that under the provisions of section 484 of the Penal Code theft "may be committed in four different ways"; that the information charges "theft by asportation"; and that "the crime proved is that of obtaining property under false pretenses, which, under section 484, * * * is the third method, or mode * * * of committing theft." Section 484 was amended at the last session of the Legislature (St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1) for the purpose of avoiding such contentions as appellants make. In so far as applicable to the facts of this case it reads as follows:

"Every person who shall feloniously steal, take, carry, lead, or drive away the personal property of another, or who shall fraudulently appropriate property which has been intrusted to him, or who shall knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defraud any other person of money, labor, or real or personal property, or who causes or procures others to report falsely of his wealth or mercantile character and by thus imposing upon any person, obtains credit and thereby fraudulently gets or obtains possession of money or property or obtains the labor or service of another, is guilty of theft."

At the same session section 952 was amended (St. 1927, p. 1043) to provide:

"In charging theft it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant unlawfully took the property of another."

[2] If the words "steal and carry away" were omitted from the information, it would be in the precise form prescribed by the statute. It is not perceived that the defendants have suffered any possible prejudice from the use of those words in the charge, and they may be treated as surplusage. Under similar provisions of the statutes of Massachusetts it is said that:

The effect "is to put it beyond a doubt that the former crimes of larceny, embezzlement, and the obtaining of property by false pretenses, are now merged into the one crime of larceny. * * * This legislation was intended to do away with the possibility of a criminal indicted for one of the three crimes mentioned escaping punishment by reason of its being afterwards found that his crime was technically one of the other two mentioned. A typical case of this kind is Commonwealth v. O'Malley, 97 Mass. 584. In that case the defendant had obtained by a trick possession of the money of an ignorant woman for a temporary purpose, and had fraudulently converted it to his own use. He had been prosecuted for larceny, but had obtained an acquittal because the judge before whom he was tried believed his crime to have been embezzlement. He was then indicted for embezzlement, and was convicted. But it was held by this court that his offense was really larceny and not embezzlement, and he was thus enabled wholly to escape punishment. It was the object of the Legislature to prevent for the future similar scandals in the administration of justice, by doing away with the merely technical difference between three cognate and similar offenses. The only way in which this reformatory intent can be effectuated is to allow the jury, upon the material facts which are the ground of a charge of larceny, to consider whether these facts show a taking of money or other property, by trespass from the possession of its owner, a fraudulent conversion of it while properly in the possession of the wrongdoer, or an obtaining of it by criminal false pretenses, * * * and in either of these cases to convict of the larceny." Commonwealth v. King, 202 Mass. 379, 388, 88 N. E. 454, 458.

Adapting the language of the King Case, the effect of section 484 of the Penal Code is that the former crimes of larceny, embezzlement, and obtaining property by false pretenses are merged into the one crime of theft. A statutory form of charging such crime of larceny, substantially as provided by section 952, was upheld in Commonwealth v. Farmer, 218 Mass. 507, 106 N. E. 150, and Commonwealth v. Carver, 224 Mass. 42, 112 N. E. 481. In the Farmer Case, where the defendants had obtained property by false representations, it is said:

"The indictments in all counts followed the short forms set forth in the criminal pleading act, R. L. c. 218. The constitutionality of the statute in this respect has been sustained in several decisions. It now is unnecessary to do more than summarize the conclusions reached. The word 'steal' used in the indictment for larceny has become a term of art and includes the criminal taking of personal property either by larceny, embezzlement or false pretenses. * * * The provisions of R. L. c. 218, par. 39, require a bill of particulars setting out adequate details where the indictment alone does not sufficiently inform the defendants, and this as matter of right."

In People v. Hanaw, 107 Mich. 337, 65 N. W. 231, it is said:

"We think that it is within the power of the Legislature to prescribe the form of indictments, keeping in view the constitutional right asserted in this case; and where, as in embezzlement, a defendant has a right to have the charge made certain by examination or by bill of particulars, it cannot be said that he is not informed of the nature of the charge."

See, also, Commonwealth v. Bennett, 118 Mass. 443, 452; Commonwealth v. Wakelin, 230 Mass. 567, 120 N. E. 209, and State v. Hodgson, 66 Vt. 134, 28 A. 1089. Sections 870 and 925 of the Penal Code require that the testimony in a criminal case taken at a preliminary examination or given before a grand jury be taken down by a stenographic reporter and, in the event of the commitment of the defendant for trial or his indictment, that he be furnished with a transcript thereof. Such transcript, together with the indictment or information, certainly informs the defendant of the nature of the charge against him as fully as would a bill of particulars.

[3] The defendants introduced in evidence Christman's official report as meat inspector for the month of August, showing that on August 29 he condemned as tubercular 5 beeves belonging to Plum. They also introduced, over the objection of the district attorney, a similar report for September, which showed that 3 of Plum's cattle were condemned September 14, but none on any other day during that month. In admitting the latter report in evidence the court said, "I don't think it is material." The statement of the court is correct. The witnesses for the defendants testified that the cattle in question were inspected by Christman on August 29, and those for the prosecution testified that they were inspected on August 31. In either case the results of the inspection would naturally be contained in the August report and the report for September therefore was immaterial.

[4] Plum testified that on August 30 he purchased a bull calf. It may be conceded that this testimony was material. The defendants then offered in evidence a bill of sale of the calf to Plum, but objection thereto was sustained. The alleged bill of sale was not made a part of the record. It does not appear when or by whom it was executed or what were the contents thereof. It cannot be determined on this appeal, therefore, whether the instrument was material.

[5, 6] The court instructed the jury in the language of section 484 of the Penal Code, defining the crime with which the defendants are charged. "Ordinarily it is best to give an instruction in the language of the statute defining the crime." 8 Cal. Jur. 326. It was for the jury to determine from the facts proved whether the taking of the property was "by trespass from the possession of its owner, a fraudulent conversion of it while * * * in the possession of the wrongdoer, or an obtaining of it by criminal false pretenses." Commonwealth v. King, supra.

[7] The appellants complain of the court's refusal to give four of their proposed instructions on the subject of conspiracy. Three of these proposed instructions are indorsed as refused because first proposed during or after the argument, a court rule requiring that proposed instructions must be in the judge's hands prior to the argument. The instructions are framed on the erroneous theory that proof of a conspiracy was necessary to warrant a conviction of either defendant, and one of them expressly so states. The defendants were not on trial for conspiracy. Certain admissions and declarations made by Plum were proved as evidence of his guilt, but the court repeatedly instructed the jury, at Christman's request, that such admissions and declarations could not be considered as evidence against Christman. Under such circumstances it was not necessary to instruct the jury on the subject of conspiracy. The case is unlike that of People v. Geiger, 49 Cal. 643, 649, where it is said:

"We think there was sufficient evidence of the conspiracy between Alexander and the defendant to justify the court in admitting in evidence the declarations of the former, made previous to the alleged killing. The question of conspiracy was then submitted to the jury, with instruction to disregard the declarations of Alexander, unless the conspiracy was satisfactorily proved. This was the proper practice."

See, also, People v. Fehrenbach, 102 Cal. 394, 398, 36 P. 678, and People v. Dixon, 94 Cal. 255, 257, 29 P. 504. The court instructed the jury fully, and as favorably to the defendants as the law warrants, on the law applicable to every element of the crime charged, including an instruction that:

"Every single fact which is necessary for drawing the deduction of guilt must be proved by evidence which satisfies the mind and consciences of the jury to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt."

The usual contention is made that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in his argument to the jury. The remarks of which complaint is made are so clearly within the bounds of legitimate argument that it is deemed sufficient to so state.

[8] At the hearing of their motion for a new trial the defendants read into the record and offered in evidence an affidavit in which the affiant stated:

"That Viola M. Downing was one of the jurors who sat as a trial juror in the above-entitled case; that on the 15th day of October, 1927, and after the said Viola M. Downing had been summoned as one of the jurors in the above-entitled case, but before her examination, the said Viola M. Downing was present at her place of business, 402½ D street, Marysville, and in the presence of affiant said Viola M. Downing stated that if she was summoned to appear on said jury and if she was called, she would hang Fred Plum, one of the defendants herein, because her mind was made up that Plum was guilty."

The record does not show when the defendants first discovered the alleged bias of the juror, or whether testimony as to her qualifications was such as to show bias or to put the defendants upon further inquiry. The minutes of the trial show that the defendants did not exercise all of their peremptory challenges. Counsel for defendants stated that their own affidavit shows that they "had no knowledge of such a state of facts," but they did not take any steps to make such affidavit a part of the record, and it is not contained in the transcript on appeal. Under the circumstances stated, the affidavit quoted is wholly insufficient to show that the court erred in denying a new trial.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. O'CONNOR. (Cr. 1003.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 24, 1928.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 576(3)—Refusal to dismiss for delay in second trial, based on ground that there was "good cause," held not error, where second trial was had 66 days after remittitur (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13; Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382).

Refusal to dismiss prosecution for delay in second trial, based on ground that there was "good cause" for such delay, held not abuse of discretion, under Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, and Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382, where defendant was brought to trial 66 days after filing of remittitur certifying reversal of conviction had on first trial, and there was change of district attorneys, and judge was engaged in another part of state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good Cause.]

2. Courts $\S$ 90(1)—Decision that refusal to dismiss prosecution for delay was not abuse of discretion held conclusive in case with like facts (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13; Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382).

Decision of Court of Appeal that refusal of trial court to dismiss prosecution for delay in second trial was not abuse of discretion, under Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, and Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382; where second trial was had 64 days after filing of remittitur, held conclusive on Court of Appeal in subsequent case as to whether refusal to dismiss prosecution for delay in second trial was abuse of discretion, where defendant was brought to trial 66 days after filing of remittitur and other facts were same.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 576(1)—Trial court has discretion as to dismissing prosecution for delay, but discretion must be based on facts (Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13; Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382).

Trial court has some discretion as to whether it should dismiss prosecution for delay in bringing defendant to trial, under Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13, and Pen. Code, $\S$ 1382, but this discretion cannot be exercised arbitrarily, and must be based on all circumstances and facts presented to account for delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County: W. A. Anderson, Judge.

James O'Connor was convicted of burglary and of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Bruton and J. H. Laugenour, both of Woodland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Yolo county of two offenses set forth in two separate counts in the information, to wit: The crime of burglary, and the crime of robbery. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The present appeals are the outgrowth of a second trial of the defendant for the two distinct charges set forth as stated.

At the first trial of the case the defendant was jointly charged with one Fitzgibbons for the crimes named and the two were jointly tried with certain other parties charged in a different information with participation in the commission of the same crimes; all the accused, except one, who pleaded guilty, being found guilty. Each of the convicted defendants appealed to this court from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial to each. This court in an opinion by Justice Plummer, reversed the judgment and the order entered in the case of O'Connor (the appellant here) and Fitzgibbons, and remanded the cause for a trial de novo. People v. O'Connor et al. (Cal. App.) 254 P. 630.

[1] The single point submitted here for determination involves the proposition, advanced by defendant, that the trial court committed error in its refusal to grant the motion of defendant to dismiss the prosecution on the ground that the defendant was not brought to trial within 60 days after the remittitur from this court, certifying to the reversal by this court of the judgment and the order, was filed with the clerk of the court below. The motion was founded on section 1382 of the Penal Code. Said section provides:

"The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases:

"1. When a person has been held to answer for a public offense, if an indictment is not found or an information filed against him, within thirty days thereafter.

"2. If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information."

A motion similar to the one with which we are here concerned was made in behalf of Edward Brock, who, though not proceeded against in the same information in which the defendant herein was informed against, was nevertheless charged with precisely the same offenses—that is to say, that the two defendants named were accused of having committed, jointly with certain other parties, the two offenses above mentioned—but by two different and distinct informations. The appeals growing out of the second trials of both Brock and O'Connor were submitted to this court for decision at its December, 1927 term. In the Brock Case an opinion by Justice Plummer, affirming the judgment and the order, was handed down by and filed in this court on December 15, 1927. People v. Brock (Cal. App.) 262 P. 369. The papers, files, affidavits, and other documentary evidence introduced and used at the hearing of the motion to dismiss the prosecution against the defendant here and upon which the court below predicated its order denying the motion to dismiss as to said defendant were exactly the same as those introduced and used in the case of Brock and upon which the refusal to dismiss the prosecution as to him was based. In the case of Brock, it may be stated, there were questions involved and passed upon by this court in the opinion by Justice Plummer besides the single question presented here, viz. whether the court below erred in making the order refusing to dismiss the prosecution on the ground heretofore stated. In the opinion by this court in the case of Brock, on his second or last appeal, the facts alleged in the affidavits and disclosed by other documentary evidence thus presented by the people to show "good cause" for the delay in bringing said defendant to trial, and which affidavits and other documentary evidence were used at the hearing of the said motion in both cases, are comprehensively set forth. It is, therefore, not necessary to repeat in detail herein the facts which were brought out at the hearing of said motion on behalf of O'Connor for the purpose of the showing of "good cause" for the delay in bringing him to trial within the time which it is claimed section 1382 of the Penal Code contemplates in such a situation as is presented here. A mere skeleton statement of the facts, however, as they are fully stated in the Brock opinion may well be given herein.

The remittitur from this court certifying to the reversal of the judgment on the first appeal of the cases of the defendants was filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court on the 2d day of May, 1927. Brock was not brought to trial until the 6th day of July, 1927, or 4 days beyond the 60 days after the filing of the remittitur in the office of the clerk of the court below. The defendant here was not brought to trial until the 8th day of July, 1927, or 6 days beyond the 60 days after the date of the filing of the remittitur below. So far as the facts are concerned, the only difference between the two cases is in the fact that Brock was brought to trial 2 days earlier than was O'Connor. This circumstance, it may be explained, was due to the fact that, as seen, the two defendants, although charged with the commission of the same two offenses of which they were adjudged guilty by the jury, were, for some reason, proceeded against by two separate and distinct informations and were separately tried, and necessarily so under our law. People v. O'Connor et al. (Cal. App.) 254 P. 630. Referring now in somewhat of a general way to some of the facts developed at the hearing of the motion, it appears that Neal Chalmers, Esq., a practicing lawyer at Woodland, the county seat of Yolo county, was one of the lawyers who defended in court the defendants at the first trial of their case; that, subsequently to said trial, said Chalmers was elected to and inducted into the office of district attorney of the county of Yolo; that he was the incumbent district attorney when the defendants were brought to trial for the second time or after the conviction of the accused at the first trial was reversed by this court. Under those circumstances, Mr. Chalmers conceived, and, of course properly so, that he was, by reason of his official position, disqualified from either defending or prosecuting the defendants.

The situation thus arising naturally called for the interposition of the Attorney General of the state, he having been informed thereof, to the end that he might make preparation or arrangements for the trial of the cases on behalf of the people. Upon being apprised of the disqualification of the district attorney to prosecute the cases against the defendants, the Attorney General immediately took steps looking to the employment of a member of the Yolo county bar to act in the place and stead of the district attorney and take charge of the prosecution of the cases on behalf of the people. After considerable correspondence between the Attorney General and Mr. Chalmers, and also between the Attorney General and Arthur B. Eddy, Esq., an attorney and a resident of Woodland, Yolo county, the services of the latter as the prosecutor of the cases were obtained. The correspondence referred to and the negotiations between the Attorney General and Mr. Eddy for the retention of the latter to act as the legal representative of the people in the trial of the cases required considerable time and necessarily contributed materially to the delay in bringing the cases to trial. Mr. Eddy, upon accepting the appointment by the Attorney General to appear and prosecute the cases for the people, not being familiar with the facts of the cases, was required to look into and examine the evidence introduced in the former trial of the cases, and this required time.

It further appears that, beginning in the month of May, 1927, and continuing through the month of June of that year, the regularly elected judge of the superior court in and for the county of Yolo, Hon. W. A. Anderson, was, by order of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and chairman of the state judicial council, exercising the power conferred by law on that judicial officer, under assignment to preside and hear and try cases in certain departments of the superior courts in and for the counties of San Diego, Los Angeles, and Sacramento; that during that period of time Judge Ernest Weyand of the superior court of Colusa county and Judge Malcolm C. Glenn of the superior court of Sacramento county were assigned to the Yolo county court at different times, the record disclosing that a large volume of legal matters came before and were disposed of by them. The opinion of Justice Plummer, in disposing of the second appeal in the case of Brock, sets forth the various proceedings coming before and heard by Judges Weyand and Glenn during the period mentioned, and the approximate time required and consumed in disposing thereof with sufficient fullness to show that the time of the Yolo court was then occupied with a large volume of important work, and also that said judges were required in the intervals of time between the dates on which they presided therein to attend to certain like duties in the courts of their own respective jurisdictions. For more specific details regarding those matters, we refer to the said opinion.

In view of the full examination of the record in the opinion in the Brock Case disclosing the showing of "good cause" for the delay in bringing the two defendants to trial within the 60-day period mentioned, we have now proceeded herein in that particular as far as it is deemed necessary for the purposes of the decision herein.

[2, 3] Undoubtedly, the showing of "good cause" for the delay in bringing the defendant O'Connor to trial within the 60-day period beginning with the filing with the clerk of the court below of the remittitur certifying to the reversal on the first appeal of the judgment and order is such as to require this court, as in the Brock Case, to leave the decision below on the motion to the discretion of the trial court. Indeed, we may rest the decision here on the decision in the Brock Case, since upon the same record or the same facts the motion in each case was heard and determined. In the Brock Case it is pertinently said:

"Under these circumstances, as stated in the case of People v. Farrington, 140 Cal. 656, 74 P. 288, the trial court was called upon to exercise its discretion as to whether good cause had or had not been shown for the delay of 5 days after the 60-day period had expired, in bringing the defendant to trial, and, as stated in the case just cited, some discretion must be given to the trial court in its decision relative to the motion to dismiss. This discretion, however, cannot be exercised arbitrarily, but is to be based upon all the circumstances and facts presented to the court to account for the few days' delay."

The opinion cites a number of cases in which it is held, upon a showing of good cause for the delay no stronger than that presented herein and in the Brock Case, that the trial court's denial of the motion represented a proper exercise of its discretion in such matters.

What has been said herein is not to be taken to imply an expression of an opinion by us upon the question whether the provision of section 1382 of the Penal Code prescribing the period of time within which a defendant in a criminal case must be brought to trial after the date of the finding of an indictment or of the filing of an information against him is to be accepted as fixing the period of time within which the defendant, having been once convicted and the conviction set aside on appeal, must be brought to trial after the remittitur from a reviewing court, certifying to the reversal, is filed with the clerk of the trial court. This statement is made because the Attorney General, claiming that under our decisions there is much uncertainty as to what the correct rule is in a situation such as is presented here, has asked for a consideration of the proposition here, and advances what we regard as a very forceful argument that, in such a case as this, the time limit should not, by analogy to the provision of section 1382, be definitely fixed at 60 days after the remittitur has been filed with the clerk of the court below; that in such case the decision of the question whether the delay in bringing the defendant to trial after the remittitur has been filed with the clerk of the trial court is such as to offend the mandate of the Constitution (article 1, § 13) that "in criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial," should rest in the sound legal discretion of the trial court upon the facts and circumstances of each case. There are decisions upon the proposition both ways. In People v. Giesea, 63 Cal. 345, and People v. Lundin, 120 Cal. 308, 311, 52 P. 807, it was held that the provision of section 1382 of the Penal Code requiring an accused to be brought to trial within 60 days after the finding of an indictment or the filing of an information against him "does not apply to cases where a defendant has appealed to this court and had his case sent back for a second trial." See, also, Ex parte Newell, 188 Cal. 508, 206 P. 61, which, while not directly passing upon the question, discusses the principle involved therein. The latest case in which the question was considered and a conclusion reached that section 1382 in so far as it relates to the time within which an accused must be brought to trial, applied to such a situation as is presented here, is In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 349, 65 P. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178. In that case Justices McFarland and Garoutte dissented from the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the court, while Justice Harrison did not participate in the decision. So, as is said in People v. Walker, 76 Cal. App. 192, 244 P. 94, by Presiding Justice Finlayson:

"Whether section 1382 can have any possible application after there has been a judgment of reversal and a second trial has been ordered is a question respecting which there possibly may be some room for doubt under the language of some of the decisions of our Supreme Court."

The question should, of course, be definitely and definitively settled, in a proper case, but, as shown above, it is not necessary to pass definitely upon the proposition in this case; hence we do not undertake so to decide it here or intend the remarks made in this opinion respecting the question to be construed as reflecting the views of this court thereon.

For the reasons first hereinabove given, the judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 6094.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 23, 1928.

1. Master and servant §419—Evidence of recurrence of disability held to authorize award increasing compensation (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, subd. [d]).

Evidence held to authorize award made by Compensation Commissioner of increase in compensation on ground of recurrence of disability on petition made under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, subd. (d) (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749).

2. Master and servant §417(7)—Court cannot weigh evidence on certiorari to review compensation award.

In certiorari to review increase in award made by Compensation Commissioner, appellate court has nothing to do with weight of evidence, which is matter solely within jurisdiction of commissioner.

Proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act by John Mulhern by his guardian, Mary Casey, opposed by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, employer. Claimant procured an award, which was paid. Subsequently petition was made for an increased award and order was made granting claimant temporary total disability. Rehearing was granted and further hearings had, and from last order granting award, employer petitions for certiorari to review proceedings. Award affirmed.

John J. Briare and L. H. Susman, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. The petition discloses the following facts: Respondent John Mulhern, while employed by petitioner Pacific Gas & Electric Company, sustained an injury to his foot which necessitated the amputation of one of his toes. The accident happened August 18, 1925, and it is admitted that it occurred in the course of and arose out of his employment. Mental illness followed in consequence of the injury, and Mulhern was on December 1, 1925, committed to the Napa State Hospital for the Insane. On January 8, 1926, an application was filed with the respondent Industrial Accident Commission by Mulhern through his guardian, Mary Casey. On March 15th Mulhern was paroled from the State Hospital. Proceedings were had before the respondent commission, culminating in findings and award, whereby it was definitely found that Mulhern's left great toe was fractured by a blow from a machine falling over, requiring amputation; the shock of the accident and loss of the member caused the development of a mental illness, and also that "said injury caused temporary total disability, continuing from August 18, 1925, to June 15, 1926," entitling the employee to the sum of $700.14. This finding of causal relation between injury and disability and the award made thereon were accepted by petitioner and the award was paid, and no question in regard thereto is here involved. On December 21, 1926, a petition for the payment of further compensation was filed by the employee through his guardian on the grounds that there had been an increase or recurrence of his disability. The petition was made under section 20 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749).

In the petition it was alleged "that since the findings and award of July 22, 1926, the mental illness found in findings of fact No. 1, of said findings and award, has increased and recurred and has caused the increase in disability, with the result that the injured man has not worked for more than a few days since the date of said award." Hearings were held upon this application and an order made on March 21, 1927, annulling findings and award and granting to the employee temporary total disability from June 29, 1926, to February 22, 1927. A petition for rehearing was filed by petitioner herein, and upon a showing that the employee had worked part of the time during the period of this last found disability, the order of March 21, 1927, was set aside and a rehearing granted. Further hearings were then had, and on August 26, 1927, the order, now sought to be reviewed, was made. In the last order the commission found that partial disability recurred October 29, 1926, and lasted until the employee returned to work for petitioner on February 23, 1927, entitling the employee to the sum of $138.04.

[1, 2] The contention is made that there is no evidence whatsoever to establish the fact that disability had increased or recurred, for which reason the commission had no power to amend the original findings. We cannot agree with petitioner in this contention. There is evidence to show that from the time he was paroled from the State Hospital in March, 1926, the employee was mentally unbalanced and remained so up to February 23d, when he returned to work for petitioner. His brother-in-law, John Casey, testified that during that period Mulhern, due to his condition, was unable to secure or retain employment; that he, the witness, had endeavored to have him returned to the asylum, as he feared injury from his hands; and that he no longer wanted him to reside in his home as his condition was becoming worse all the time. His sister, Mary Casey, testified that he was unable to retain employment as he was incapable on account of his condition to do work. There was also medical testimony to the effect that during the period in question Mulhern was still insane, in consequence of which he was unable to procure or perform labor. Counsel for petitioner claims that the testimony of John Casey and his wife is unreliable as evidenced by their cross-examination. With the weight of the evidence we have nothing to do, as that is a matter solely within the jurisdiction of the commission.

There being evidence to sustain the finding, it follows that the award must be and it is hereby affirmed.

WOOD et al. v. HENLEY et al. (Civ. 3359.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 19, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 18, 1928.

1. Taxation ⚡734(9)—Where sale to state was void for want of notice by tax collector, sales by state and state's grantee were also void.

Where sale of interest in land to state was void because notice of proposed sale by tax collector was not given as required by law, purported resales of same interest by state to abstract company and by company to defendant were also void.

2. Tenancy in common ⚡13—Tenants in common hold land by unity of possession, and no one of them can claim determinate portion of common land (Civ. Code, §§ 685, 686).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 685, 686, dominant attribute of tenancy in common is that cotenants hold land by unity of possession, for which reason there can be no specific or determinate portion of common land which any one of such tenants can claim as his in severalty.

3. Tenancy in common ⚡13—Tenant in common is entitled to possession of entire common property against all persons except cotenants; possession by one cotenant being possession for all.

Tenant in common of undivided interest in common property is entitled to possession of whole thereof as against all persons, except his cotenants; each tenant having right to enter on and occupy entire part of common lands, so that possession of one cotenant is possession for all.

4. Tenancy in common ⚡13—Acts of ownership by tenant in common in possession is evidence of possession of other tenants, each tenant having right to assume possession of cotenant is own possession, till informed to contrary.

Where one of several tenants in common remains in possession, his acts of ownership are construed as evidence of possession by both tenants in common, since tenant in possession is presumed to hold for himself, and cotenants and each cotenant has right to assume that possession of cotenant is his own possession, until informed to contrary by actual notice, or acts and declarations equivalent to notice.

5. Tenancy in common ⚡15(10)—Possession by cotenant is presumed amicable until contrary is shown.

Presumption is that possession of one cotenant is amicable until contrary is shown.

6. Tenancy in common ⚡15(2)—One cotenant may acquire adverse claim against other cotenants, but there must be ouster or repudiation of relation.

Relationship of cotenants in not necessarily so intimate as to preclude one cotenant from asserting and acquiring an adverse claim against other cotenant to common property, but, to acquire adverse title, there must be an ouster of cotenant, or repudiation of relation.

7. Tenancy in common ⚡15(6)—Exclusive possession of common lands by cotenant and payment of taxes for five years will not alone establish title by adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 323, 325).

Fact of exclusive possession of common lands by cotenant, claiming adverse title or payment by cotenant of taxes on common property, or both acts taken together for period of five years, will not of themselves be sufficient to establish a several title in such cotenant to common property by adverse possession, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 323, 325, since such acts are consistent with rule that possession of one cotenant is possession of all cotenants, and payment of taxes is presumptively for benefit of all.

8. Tenancy in common ⚡15(2)—Cotenant, claiming title to common property by adverse possession, must bring positive acts, indicating intention to oust cotenants, to cotenants' notice.

For cotenant to acquire title to common property by adverse possession, there must be some positive acts by cotenant claiming title which are brought to notice of other cotenant, either actually or constructively, clearly and unequivocally indicating intention by cotenant to oust other cotenants from possession.

9. Tenancy in common ⚡15(10)—Evidence held insufficient to show cotenant acquired title by adverse possession against other cotenant (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 323, 325).

In action to quiet title to land to which defendants in position of cotenant with plaintiff claimed title by adverse possession under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 323, 325, evidence that defendants were never at any time in exclusive possession of common property or any part thereof, that defendants' possession was not necessarily hostile to rights of cotenant in common land, or so intended, and that quitclaim deed acquired by defendant from state was void, was insufficient to establish title in defendant by adverse possession.

10. Tenancy in common ⚡15(1)—Cotenant could not segregate portion of land, and by possession, improvements, and payment of taxes acquire title by adverse possession against other cotenant (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

In action to quiet title to land to which defendant claimed title by adverse possession, defendant, as cotenant, could not segregate from common lands particular portion thereof, and, by occupying and improving same and paying taxes thereon for five years, claim title to such portion by adverse possession under Code Civ. Proc. § 325.

11. Tenancy in common ⚡15(10)—Improvements by husband of cotenant claiming title by adverse possession could be presumed for benefit of common property and all cotenants.

In action to quiet title to land to which defendant claimed title by adverse possession, where husband of plaintiff's cotenant had no interest in land, other cotenants had right to assume that any improvements which cotenant's husband put on common property were intended to be for benefit of common property and all cotenants, and not adverse to them.

12. Tenancy in common ⚡15(10)—Improvements by cotenant's husband are presumed to have been consented to by other cotenants, and did not raise presumption of adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

In action to quiet title to land to which defendant as cotenant claimed title by adverse possession, acts of cotenant's husband in erecting improvements on land for accommodation of tourists are presumed to have been done with consent, actual or constructive, of cotenants, in absence of proof to contrary, and were not in themselves sufficient to raise presumption of ouster or adverse possession as to other cotenants, under Code Civ. Proc. § 325.

13. Tenancy in common ⚡15(10)—Evidence held not to show continuous possession of property for five years by adverse claimant (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

In action to quiet title to property to which defendant claimed title by adverse possession, testimony that defendant stayed on property occasionally on Saturday nights, when campers would be coming in, and worked there during spare time, was sufficient to support implied finding that defendant did not actually occupy premises or any part thereof for period of five years, under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, continuously and uninterruptedly.

14. Tenancy in common ⚡15(10)—That house erected by defendant cotenant was on land which he supposed to be his own held evidence that he did not intend hostile act to other cotenant.

In action to quiet title to property to which defendants, in position of cotenants, claimed title by adverse possession, evidence that defendant, in constructing house on property, supposed he was constructing house on tract belonging to himself, was evidence that he did not intend erection of house to constitute act of hostility to rights of plaintiff.

15. Adverse possession ⚡3—Statute providing for acquiring title by adverse possession must be strictly followed (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

In action to quiet title to land to which defendants claimed title by adverse possession, under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, providing for acquiring of title by adverse possession, where land is inclosed or improved, provisions of statute must be strictly followed.

16. Limitation of actions ⚡165—Rule that acquisition of title by adverse possession presupposes grant does not apply to statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 323, 325).

Doctrine that acquisition of title to real property by adverse possession, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 323, 325, presupposes grant of such property, does not apply to statute of limitations under section 318, which has effect of cutting off owner's remedy for recovery of property or possession thereof.

17. Limitation of actions ⚡44(2)—To start running statute of limitations against owner, there must be avowed claim of ownership and substantially all elements necessary to establish title by adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 318).

To start statute of limitations, contained in Code Civ. Proc. § 318, running against legal owner of land, there must be an avowed claim of ownership by party relying on statute, and substantially all elements essential to establishment of title by adverse possession.

18. Limitation of actions ⚡44(2)—Claim of title by running of statute of limitations held to necessarily fail, where testimony failed to support claim, of title by adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 323, 325).

In action to quiet title to land, defendants' claim of title by running of statute of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 318, necessarily failed with failure of testimony to support claim of title by adverse possession under sections 323 and 325.

19. Quieting title ☞23, 29—Action to quiet title may be maintained by party out of possession, who need not proceed until there has been asserted claim of title hostile to real owner (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 380, 738).

Party out of possession of land may maintain action to quiet title under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, and is not required to proceed in such action until there has been asserted by another claim of title thereto hostile to real owner, in view of section 380.

20. Adverse possession ☞41—Title by adverse possession could not be based on deed dated within five years of suit to quiet title, and presumed to have been delivered on its date (Code Civ. Proc. § 323; Civ. Code, § 1055).

In action to quiet title to property claimed by defendant under Code Civ. Proc. § 323, by adverse possession founded on deed received by defendant, which is presumed to have been delivered on its date under Civ. Code, § 1055, defendant's claim could not be maintained, where evidence showed plaintiff brought action within five years from date on which deed was executed and delivered to defendant.

21. Adverse possession ☞43(7)—Defective written instrument under which defendants claimed title by adverse possession could not relate back to date of original entry, where there was no sufficient prior possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 318).

In action to quiet title, defendants could not claim defective written instrument, under which title by adverse possession was claimed, related back to original entry so as to bring case within five-year period required by Code Civ. Proc. § 318, where there was no such possession and occupation as would constitute element in establishing adverse possession to which color of title under instrument could relate back to.

22. Quieting title ☞51—Recovery of improvements by adverse claimant requires demand for relief in pleadings and allegation of good faith.

In action to quiet title to property, title to which was claimed by defendant by adverse possession, defendants, to be entitled to compensation for improvements placed on property, are required to make demand for reimbursement in their pleadings, and to allege that improvements were made in good faith, and enhanced value of property sought to be recovered.

23. Quieting title ☞51—Adverse claimant could not recover value of improvements against plaintiff seeking only to quiet title (Code Civ. Proc. § 741).

In action to quiet title to property, title to which was claimed by defendants by adverse possession, defendants were not entitled to recover value of improvements placed on land, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 741, providing that value of improvements must be set off against damages claimed for withholding property.

24. Improvements ☞4(1)—Value of improvements cannot be claimed in action to recover realty, except by way of set-off against damages claimed for withholding property (Code Civ. Proc. § 741).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 741, defendants, in action to recover real property, whether remedy be either legal or equitable, cannot be allowed reimbursement for improvements made by him on property, except by way of set-off against any damages which may be claimed by plaintiff for withholding property.

25. Quieting title ☞51—As affects good faith in making improvements, quitclaim deed to defendant claiming title by adverse possession held notice that title was of doubtful validity.

In action to quiet title to land, title to which was claimed by defendant by adverse possession, quitclaim deed to defendant from abstract company, conveying only such interest in dispute as abstract company acquired from state, was notice to defendant that title was of doubtful validity.

26. Quieting title ☞51—Evidence held to show bad faith by adverse claimant seeking to recover improvements (Code Civ. Proc. § 323).

In action to quiet title to property claimed by defendants by adverse possession under Code Civ. Proc. § 323, quitclaim deed, acquired by defendant from abstract company purchasing property from state, and letter by true owner, conveyed to defendant, stating that state's title was absolutely void, held to create more than suspicion of bad faith in defendant seeking recovery of improvements erected on property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Frances C. Wood and another against George J. Henley and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for appellants.

John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HART, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs to quiet their alleged title to an undivided one-half interest in a certain tract of land, consisting of 160 acres, situated in what is known as "Sespe Canyon," in the mountainous regions of Ventura county.

The complaint, which was filed on the 28th day of May, 1921, specifically describes the 160 acres, and alleges that the defendants claim and assert an interest in said property adverse to plaintiffs; that the claim so made by the defendants is "without any right whatever, and that said defendants have no estate, right, title, or interest in or to said real property above described, or any part thereof; that plaintiffs Frances C. Wood and Ira B. Wood are now and were at all times herein mentioned husband and wife; that defendants George J. Henley and Melita Henley have an undivided one-fourth interest in said real property, and hold the same jointly and as tenants in common with plaintiffs herein; that plaintiffs hereby tender all legal state and county taxes, penalties, and tax costs that defendants may have paid on said undivided one-half interest in said real property belonging to plaintiffs."

The defendants answered, specifically denying the averments of the complaint, and also filed a cross-complaint, in which they allege that the defendants, at the time of the filing of the complaint herein, and for a long time prior thereto, were, "and they still are, the owners, in possession, and entitled to the possession, of that certain undivided one-half interest in the lands described in the complaint"; that plaintiffs wrongfully and without any right whatever claim an estate or interest therein adverse to the defendants. The prayer of the cross-complaint, as is that of the complaint with respect to the defendants, is the usual one in actions to quiet title to real property.

The plaintiffs, answering the cross-complaint, admit that they claim the ownership in fee of the undivided one-half interest in controversy, and specifically deny the other averments of said pleading.

Judgment passed for the plaintiff Frances C. Wood in accord with the prayer of the complaint.

The appeal, supported by a bill of exceptions, is by the defendants from said judgment.

The defendants claim title to the undivided one-half interest in dispute by adverse possession under the terms of both sections 323 and 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They further claim that the action by plaintiff is barred by the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 318.

Section 323 of said Code provides:

"For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by any person claiming a title founded upon a written instrument, or a judgment or decree, land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases:

"1. Where it has been usually cultivated or improved;

"2. Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure;

"3. Where, although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel, or of fencing-timber for the purposes of husbandry, or for pasturage or for the ordinary use of the occupant;

"4. Where a known farm or single lot has been partly improved, the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left not cleared, or not inclosed according to the usual course and custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved and cultivated."

Section 325 reads:

"For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by a person claiming title, not founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree, land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases only:

"1. Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure.

"2. Where it has been usually cultivated or improved.

"Provided, however, that in no case shall adverse possession be considered established under the provision of any section or sections of this code, unless it shall be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously, and the party or persons, their predecessors and grantors, have paid all the taxes, state, county, or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon such land."

It appears that the undivided one-fourth interest in the 160 acres not accounted for in the complaint or the cross-complaint was owned by one Mason Bradfield, so that, prior to the claim by defendants of ownership of the undivided one-half interest in dispute was asserted, the 160 acres were owned as follows: One-fourth by defendant Melita Henley, wife of defendant George J. Henley; one-fourth by said Mason Bradfield; and the remaining one-half (the interest in controversy) by the plaintiff Frances C. Wood.

The claim by defendants that they acquired title to the undivided one-half interest in controversy by adverse possession founded upon a written instrument grows out of the sale to the state of the said one-half interest in the year 1917 for delinquent taxes for certain years preceding that of the sale of said interest to the state.

As before stated, the land described in the complaint—the entire 160 acres—is situated in a canyon in the mountains of Ventura county. It is of rock formation, and wholly useless for the purposes of farming or husbandry. It possesses value, however, as a stone quarry, where stone for building purposes is to be obtained.

[1] The interest in dispute, for a long period of time prior to the purported sale thereof to the state for the nonpayment of taxes assessed thereon, was owned by the plaintiff Ira B. Wood. At some time after said Wood acquired title to said undivided interest, he conveyed the same to his wife, who is his coplaintiff. Ira B. Wood never at any time resided on the premises, but, after he acquired the interest in dispute, he visited and inspected the 160 acres on two different occasions. Mrs. Wood, down to the time of the trial of this action, had never been on, or seen, the property. No taxes assessed against said interest were paid by Mrs. Wood or by any other person for her for the year 1911, nor for the succeeding years of 1912 and 1913. George J. Henley testified that he knew of these delinquencies in the payment of the taxes on said interest, having obtained his information regarding the same by making inquiry of the assessor of Ventura county in each of the years named. On June 22, 1917, however, the said undivided one-half interest having been previously sold, or attempted to be sold, by the county tax collector to the state, the latter sold said undivided interest to the Ventura Abstract Company, a corporation, whose principal place of business was at the city of San Buenaventura, in Ventura county. On July 6, 1917, said corporation quitclaimed said interest to the defendant George J. Henley. It was discovered at some time (the record does not show just when) that the sale of the said interest to the state was void because the notice of such proposed sale by the tax collector was not given as required by law. The sale to the state being, therefore, void, it follows, of course, that the purported sale of the interest to the abstract company and that of the latter to George J. Henley were also void and of no legal effect. It was at the trial, and it is here admitted by the defendants, that the sale to the state and the sale by the state, as explained, were and are void.

Ira B. Wood testified that, acting for his wife, he addressed a letter in the year 1916 to the tax collector of Ventura county, inquiring about the matter of the tax delinquencies on the interest in question, and asking for a statement of the taxes unpaid on the property; that he received a reply from the tax collector, informing him of the sale of the interest to the state in the year 1912, and suggesting that he communicate with the proper state department at Sacramento for further information; that, subsequently, his wife addressed a letter (witness could not remember whether to the tax collector of the county or to some state officer connected with delinquent tax matters) asking whether it would be sufficient if she would pay the taxes for the year 1916, the year in which she wrote and mailed said letter, and all back taxes. No reply was made to that letter, but later, and the day before the sale was to be made by the state, the witness received a phone message at his home (the witness said he thought it was from the tax collector) asking him (witness) if he was going "to take care of those taxes." The message was received late in the day, and the witness did not leave for San Buenaventura until the following morning, in ample time, though, to have reached that place before the hour at which the sale was noticed to take place. The train was for some reason delayed, with the result that the witness did not arrive at the county seat until some ten minutes after the sale had taken place. Wood, nevertheless, interviewed a Mr. Barnard through whom the abstract company purchased the undivided one-half interest in dispute. He testified that Barnard stated to him that it was the intention of the abstract company to sell the property to defendant George J. Henley; that he (witness) then warned Barnard that he had been given legal advice to the effect that the sale was invalid; and that a transfer of the interest by said company to said Henley would be void.

On July 2, 1917, acting for and in behalf of his wife, Wood addressed a letter to said Barnard, reading, in part, as follows:

"Your night letter of first Inst received. You doubtless have already received my telegram of 29th ultimo, and letter 30th ult.

"The people pestering you for an assignment of interest in the property of Frances C. Wood supposedly acquired by you at the delinquent tax sale held in Ventura, June 22nd, last, do not worry me.

"The fact is, you have no title to the property in question to convey, and whatever these people would pay you they would lose, for a contest of their claim would certainly ensue. For several reasons the sale referred to was invalid. * * * Any rights assumed from that sale would be promptly and successfully contested, and such contest would also establish the invalidity of all the other sales made on the same occasion. However, we are perfectly willing to deal equitably with you in remuneration for all money you may pay out in satisfaction of tax demands, for essential services in the matter, and in appreciation of the spirit of consideration shown when the writer saw you. We can get together and in a reasonable time as intimated in my previous letter. I think we both wish only what is about right."

As to his alleged possession and occupancy of the interest in controversy, the defendant testified:

"I first went up into the Sespe Canyon years ago. I went up there to go into the stone business. Between Christmas and New Year's in 1887 the first time. I went up in 1887, and came back in 1888. I had a claim up there in 1888. This claim was on this very land in question. It was up above the Devil's Gate. That was northwest of the land in question. With reference to making improvements and doing work upon this land I built a road. I broke through in 1900, that is, through the Devil's Gate, and through this land. This road was built through the Devil's Gate in 1900. * * *

"I first put a road across the property in question in 1898. This road went entirely across this property. Since that time I have kept the road up. I was living on the property north of this along in 1904 and 1905. I built the house which I have indicated on the map as soon as we broke through the Devil's Gate and got a wagon road in that country. This was prior to 1900. I am referring to my dwelling house. The Devil's Gate is on this property in question. We went around underneath the Devil's Gate. By 'Devil's Gate' I mean a tunnel and narrow gorge. The property is very mountainous, all cliffs. This house in which I was living in 1904 and 1905 was destroyed by fire. I first made improvements on the property in controversy, other than building the road, at the end of March or April, 1916."

The occupation and use by said Henley of the premises prior to and down to the year 1916 was, according to his own testimony, intermittent. He testified that, during that period, he was engaged, principally, in blasting rock, and taking out and selling stone to those desiring it for any purpose or use. "I am living on the property now," said Henley testified. "I first went on that property to live," he continued, "in 1916, right after the fire (referring to the destruction by fire of a house on the premises in which he had lived). As I remember it, the fire occurred in the month of August. I paid taxes on this half interest at Ventura. By that, I mean I paid them at the tax collector's office. I bought (referring to the purchase at the tax sale) in 1917, and paid the taxes in 1918, 1919, 1920 and 1921. At the time I entered upon this property my claim of ownership thereof was based on my possession of said property * * * I actually began work in February (of 1916), worked in March and worked in April of that year, and there hadn't been any one that had done anything on it but me for years." Henley testified that he had been informed by the county assessor that there had been no taxes paid on the property for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913; that in each of those years he would ask the assessor if the taxes had been paid for the particular year so inquired about; that the assessor was the party who informed him that the property in dispute had been sold to the state for taxes. He further testified that he owned in his separate right 40 acres of land "below" and adjoining the 160 acres. This tract of land was known as the "McIntyre land," although he purchased it from a "Mr. Keyes."

In the year 1918, some time after the month of August, he (Henley) erected on, or on land adjoining, the premises, a stone house to be used by him for residential purposes. He testified that, when he was erecting the house, he supposed, and, in fact, believed, that he was building it on the "McIntyre land" which he had purchased from said Keyes, but that, after completing its construction, a man by the name of Owen made a survey of the premises with reference to the dividing line between the 40-acre tract and the 160-acre tract involved herein, and so discovered, or at least thought he discovered, that the house was within and on the 160-acre tract, about 12 feet from said line. He stated that he erected and maintained a fence around or about the house, and a gate to afford passage to and from the house.

It appears that running through the land is a stream of water in which fish abound, and that during the summer seasons of the years persons on "camping trips" for pleasure had frequently been permitted by the defendant George J. Henley to camp for a few days on the land and engage in the diversion of "catching fish"; said Henley, so he testified, charging such persons a small fee for the privilege so granted. In fact, said Henley testified that he erected on the land several cheaply built cabins to rent to such persons as were taking a brief "outing" and desired to remain on the land for a few days during summer seasons for the purpose of fishing.

It further appears that "above" and adjoining the 160 acres, and in the Sespe Canyon, a company, known as the "Sespe Light & Power Company," and another company, known as the "Sespe Oil Company," owned a body of land, the first company maintaining a light and power plant, and the last named being engaged, as may be assumed, although as to that the testimony is indefinite, in the development of oil. There was also another company, operating near the 160 acres, known as the "Sespe Land & Water Company." Henley testified that he improved and kept in repair a road running into and partly over the 160 acres, and connecting with a road maintained by the Sespe corporations. These roads led to the properties of said companies. There was no other possible way of passage to and from the properties of said corporations than by means of the roads mentioned. Henley himself so testified. In fact, he said, there was no way of entering upon the 160 acres or into the Sespe Canyon other than by the road he improved and kept in repair.

Over objection by counsel for the plaintiffs, said Henley was allowed to testify to the value of the stone house erected by him on the premises and the value of other improvements made by him thereon, by giving an estimate of the "reasonable cost" of their construction. Thus he placed the value of the house at $6,000. On the other improvements—a barn, the "camping cabins" referred to, a house which he stated that he occupied during the interval of time between the date of the destruction by fire of the house in which he had previously lived on the premises, and the time at which the stone house was completed or ready for occupancy, and a pipe line 1,400 feet in length—he placed a value amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $1,200.

The defendant Melita Henley testified that with her separate money she purchased her one-quarter interest in the 160 acres from a Mrs. Troy; that her husband and codefendant "had and was in possession" of the one-half interest in February and March, 1916, "and right on, of 1916." She further testified:

"He was working all the spare time he had and besides that he often had help. He was brushing out and blasting rock and cutting down brush and cleaning off the place in general. He started in February, 1916. That country up there is all rocks; of course he had to blast out a lot of the rocks. He was fixing it up for campers and to live on in general, and he blasted out those rocks and chopped the brush and cleaned it up, you know. The first habitation or dwelling house which was put on there, he put this cabin, this house we are living in now, that was put on there in April, 1916, that is the two rooms—we have added onto it since. He first commenced staying on the property sleeping there in the last of April, 1916. He did not stay there continuously after that, just stayed there once in a while Saturday nights when campers would be coming in there, he did not sleep there continuously; no, he was working there whenever he had spare time."

The foregoing is a sufficient résumé of the testimony for all the purposes of the decision of this appeal.

The major question submitted here for decision is whether the findings upon which the validity of the judgment depends are afforded support by the evidence. The defendant and cross-complainant makes certain other points, the nature of which will be explained when we reach the consideration thereof.

[2-8] The dominant attribute of a tenancy in common is that the cotenants hold the common land by unity of possession, for which reason there can be no specific or determinate portion of the common land which any one of such tenants can claim as his in severalty. See Civ. Code, §§ 685 and 686. In other words, a tenant in common, by reason of the fact that he and his cotenants hold the common lands by unity of possession, cannot "know his own severalty, and, therefore, they all occupy promiscuously. * * * The only unity (in such a tenancy) is that of possession; and for this Littleton gives the true reason, because no man can certainly tell which part is his own; otherwise even this would soon be destroyed." 1 Blackstone's Comm. pp. 589, 590. It follows, therefore, that a tenant in common of an undivided interest in the common property is entitled to the possession of the whole thereof as against all persons except his cotenants. Each of such tenants has the right to enter upon and occupy the whole and every part of the common lands. This being so, such a tenant has no right to exclude his cotenant from any portion of the common lands. The logical consequence of the foregoing propositions is that the possession of one cotenant is possession for all. 7 Cal. Jur. § 13, p. 346, and cases named in the footnotes. "So long as one of several tenants in common remains in possession, as he is presumed to hold for himself and for his cotenants, his acts of ownership are naturally construed as evidence of the possession of both. Packard v. Moss, 68 Cal. 123, 8 P. 818. And each has a right to assume that the possession of his cotenant is his own possession, until informed to the contrary, either by actual notice or by acts and declarations which may be equivalent to notice. Aguirre v. Alexander, 58 Cal. 21; Tabler v. Peverill, 4 Cal. App. 671, 88 P. 994. The presumption is that the possession of one cotenant is amicable until the contrary is shown." 7 Cal. Jur. § 13, p. 346. As to the proposition last stated, see Tully v. Tully, 71 Cal. 338, 12 P. 246; McNeil v. First Congregational Society, 66 Cal. 105, 4 P. 1096; Olney v. Sawyer, 54 Cal. 379; Carpentier v. Mendenhall, 28 Cal. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 135. But it is undoubtedly true that "the relation of cotenants is not necessarily so intimate as to preclude one of them from asserting and acquiring an adverse claim against the others to the common property. As between them, there may be a subsequent adverse possession. To acquire such a title, however, there must first be an ouster of the cotenant, or a repudiation of the relation." 1 Cal. Jur. § 34, p. 542, and cases therein referred to. The mere fact of the exclusive possession of the common lands by the cotenant claiming the adverse title, or the mere payment by him of the taxes on the common property, or both acts taken together, for the period of five years, will not of themselves be sufficient to establish a several title in such cotenant to the common property under the doctrine of adverse possession, since such acts alone would only be consistent with the rule that the possession of one cotenant of such property is the possession of all the cotenants, and that such payment of the taxes is an act presumptively for the benefit of all. In such a case, to constitute an adverse possession, there must be some positive act or acts upon the part of the cotenant claiming title to the whole or a specific portion of the property by adverse possession as against his cotenants, which acts are brought to the notice of the latter either actually or constructively, clearly and unequivocally indicating an intention by such cotenant to oust his cotenants from the possession of the property. Or, as the proposition is stated in 1 Cal. Juris. § 35, p. 544:

"When a tenant in common is in possession, and exercises acts of ownership of an unequivocal character, overt and notorious, and of such a nature as, by their own import, to impart information and give notice to the other cotenants that an adverse possession and a disseizin are intended to be asserted against them, then the possession of such tenant in common is adverse. And any act of the cotenant in the exclusive possession which manifests an intention on his part to hold exclusively for himself is equivalent in law to an actual ouster. It is the intent which determines the character of the possession; but it is essential that this intent be in some mode, either by actual or presumptive notice, directly or indirectly communicated to the other cotenant. This intent is not the secret purpose of the occupant, but is the purpose which the acts themselves manifest, and the acts done must be manifested to the person against whom the ouster is directed." (See the cases cited in the footnotes of the text.)

In Humbert v. Trinity Church, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 587, cited approvingly in Colman v. Clements, 23 Cal. 245, and other succeeding California cases, it is said that the possession of the tenant claiming to hold adversely to his cotenants must be with the intent so to hold, and that it must appear that such intent has been "indicated by acts calculated to exclude the complainants from all participation as tenants in common."

In Northrop v. Wright, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 221, it was held that a possession by a tenant in common for 27 years, during which period of time "he had not recognized the right of his cotenant, was not (in or of itself) sufficient to presume an ouster." See Colman v. Clements, supra, p. 248.

The following instances of acts constituting an ouster by one cotenant, as against another or others, are found in the books: The exclusion of one tenant, by his cotenant, from the possession of any part of the larger lot, before a survey and location of the common land has been made (Carpentier v. Webster, 27 Cal. 524); the refusal of a tenant in possession on a proper demand, to let his cotenant into possession (Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 158, 34 P. 667; Greer v. Tripp, 56 Cal. 209; Miller v. Myers, 46 Cal. 535); "the making and taking and recording of deeds and mortgages by the cotenant affecting the whole of the property and the unquestioned retaining of all the rents and profits" for the statutory period, "and the placing of valuable improvements upon the property, all under a claim of exclusive ownership" (Smith v. Barrick, 41 Cal. App. 28, 182 P. 56, 58).

[9-11] Thus we have presented some of the principles of law regarding tenancies in common and the relative rights of the cotenants, for the reason that the defendant Melita Henley, admittedly a cotenant of the common property in controversy, jointly with her husband and codefendant claims in the answer and cross-complaint to have established title to the undivided interest of Frances C. Wood by adverse possession under section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or title by such possession not founded on a written instrument; and also because George J. Henley, from the very fact that he claims title to the undivided interest of Frances C. Wood, necessarily can claim nothing more than being a cotenant in the common property with Melita Henley and Mason Bradfield. Therefore, when tested by the principles above announced, it is perfectly clear that the finding of the court that the defendants acquired no title by adverse possession to the undivided interest of Frances C. Wood is sufficiently supported. In the first place, it is to be noted that the defendants were never at any time in the exclusive possession of the common property or any part thereof. They made no claim at the trial, and make none here, that the defendant Melita Henley and Mason Bradfield, if not in actual occupancy of the common property, were not entitled to the possession or the right to occupy said property as cotenants thereof. There was no particular or specific portion of the lands of which Melita Henley or George J. Henley could claim the right to the possession to the exclusion of Frances C. Wood and Mason Bradfield. The possession of Melita Henley was Bradfield's and Mrs. Wood's possession. Melita Henley could not, without the assent of her cotenants, select and segregate from the common lands a particular or a determinate portion thereof, and claim it as her interest therein. Nor could George J. Henley do likewise in attempting to establish title by adverse possession to the interest of Mrs. Wood. By this we are not to be understood as saying that a cotenant of a tenancy in common or a stranger to the title may not establish a title by adverse possession to the undivided interest in such tenancy of another cotenant. What we hold is, as above in other language it has been stated, that such cotenant or stranger cannot put his finger on a particular portion of the common property itself, and, by occupying and improving and paying taxes thereon for the statutory period, say and claim that such particular portion is that portion of the common property that the undivided interest to which it is sought to establish title by adverse possession represents. But, apart from all these considerations, the record brings to us no testimony showing that all the essential elements of adverse possession under section 325 exist. From George J. Henley's own testimony, the important and vital portions of which are in substance hereinabove reproduced, it is entirely clear that his possession of the property was not necessarily to be interpreted by Frances C. Wood as hostile to her rights in the common land, or so intended, since she could have assumed, and, indeed, presumed, that whatever acts of dominion he was exercising over the property was for and in behalf and with the consent of his wife, and that the benefits flowing from his activities in that particular would inure to her as well as to Melita Henley and Mason Bradfield, her other cotenants. In other words, in view of the fact that Melita Henley was an owner in cotenancy of an undivided one-fourth interest in the common property, and that George J. Henley owned no interest therein, the other cotenants had the right to assume that any improvements which George J. Henley put upon the common property were intended to be for the benefit of the common property, and, per consequence, for the common benefit of all the cotenants. But, as a matter of fact, in so far as this record discloses, the first acts of George J. Henley which constituted what might be construed into an open declaration by him to claim title to the property adversely to the interests of Frances C. Wood were in his acquisition by quitclaim deed, in July, 1917, of the state's void title to the interest of Mrs. Wood. The filing by the defendants of their answer and cross-complaint in this action, denying (by the first-named pleading) the rights of plaintiff Frances C. Wood, as cotenant and in the last-named pleading seeking to quiet their title to the property as against the said plaintiff, upon the theory that they had acquired title thereto by adverse possession, both under section 323 and section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, would perhaps be construed as an act of ouster. Previous to the filing of said pleadings, the defendants did nothing to indicate an intention to hold possession of the property adversely or in hostility to the rights of the plaintiff Frances C. Wood.

[12, 13] There is no testimony that either of the defendants had ever refused to permit said plaintiff to enter upon and into the possession of the common lands. There is no testimony of any declaration by the Henleys (until the time mentioned), which was communicated to said plaintiff, or to her coplaintiff, that they had any intention of claiming the undivided one-half interest of Mrs. Wood adversely to her rights. There was no express repudiation of the rights of plaintiff by the Henleys. There was no testimony that Frances C. Wood or any other person in her behalf ever made a demand, or had occasion to make a demand, upon the Henleys to be permitted to enter into the possession of the premises and participate in the enjoyment of her rights as a cotenant of the common property. There is no testimony definitely showing that, prior to the year 1917, George J. Henley or his codefendant ever paid the taxes assessed upon the property or upon the undivided interest of Frances C. Wood. As to this, George J. Henley testified: "I paid the taxes on the other half interest at Ventura. By that I mean that I paid them at the tax collector's office. I paid the taxes during the years after I bought the place," referring to the purported purchase by him of the undivided one-half interest of Mrs. Wood from the abstract company in July, 1917. If by the statement that he "paid the taxes on this half interest in Ventura to the tax collector," he meant to say that he paid the taxes on said interest prior to the year 1917, when he received the deed from the abstract company, he does not say for what years, or for how many years, or whether for years following each other consecutively, he paid said taxes. He produced no tax receipt showing the payment by him of the taxes prior to 1911 or the years intervening between 1913 and 1917. He knew that the taxes had not been paid in the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and also that the undivided interest in dispute had been sold to the state for such delinquencies. He did testify, however, although producing no tax receipts to verify his statement, that, after receiving the void deed to the interest in question in July, 1917, he paid the taxes assessed against it for the years 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921. There is no satisfactory or definite showing with regard to the time during which said Henley held actual possession of the premises. It is very clear, as stated in the early part of this opinion, that his residence upon the property prior to the date on which he received the deed from the Ventura Abstract Company was intermittent—that is to say, that he would go and remain upon the premises during very brief intervals of time. Some years before he erected the stone house, he would go to the land and take out stone from the rock quarries for commercial purposes. Again, during the summer seasons, he would remain on the premises and collect rent for the use of the cabins he erected and maintained on the common property to accommodate various pleasure seekers and other itinerants desiring, for a few days, to "fish" in the stream running through the property. So far as the record shows, all these privileges were exercised by him with the consent, actually given or quiescently, of the cotenants, particularly his wife. In the absence of proof to the contrary, such would be the presumption. At any rate, those acts were not in and of themselves sufficient to warrant the presumption of an ouster, or a holding of possession adversely to the rights of the other cotenants. As to the time during which the defendants claimed to have held sole actual possession of the common property, George J. Henley testified, as above shown, that he "went on the property to live in the year 1916, right after the fire. As I remember it," he continued, "the fire occurred during the month of August." He said, however, that he "had been working on the road previous to that," referring to some year or years previous to 1916, and, continuing, added: "I went actually to work clearing in February, 1916; then I claimed it." His wife testified, as will be noted, that "he (George J. Henley) first commenced staying on the property, sleeping there, in the last of April, 1916. He did not stay there continuously after that," she proceeded to testify. "He was just there once in a while, Saturday nights when campers would be coming in there; he did not sleep there continuously; no, he was working there whenever he had spare time." This testimony itself sufficiently supports the implied finding that George J. Henley did not actually occupy the premises or any part thereof for a period of five years continuously and uninterrupted down to the date of the commencement of this action on May 28, 1921.

[14] As to the act of erecting the stone house and the act of enclosing that structure by a fence, Henley himself supposed, when constructing the house, that he was locating it on a small tract of land of which he was the sole owner, and this fact is strong evidence that he did not intend that the erection of the house and the fence was to constitute an act of hostility to the rights of Frances C. Wood. It may be added, in this connection, that it is not clear, from the testimony, that the house is not in fact on Henley's 40-acre tract. This consideration, it must be understood, goes entirely to the question whether the erection of the house was an act or intended as an act, adverse in a legal sense to the rights of Frances C. Wood, or, in other language, whether, at the time of its erection, it was intended as the assertion by the Henleys of a claim of title to the property adversely to, and in derogation of, the title of Mrs. Wood.

[15] But it is not necessary to proceed further in an examination of the testimony to show that the findings of the trial court are amply supported. Indeed, the testimony presented by the defendants in support of their claim of title to the undivided one-half interest of Mrs. Wood is vague, uncertain, and indefinite upon every element of adverse possession prescribed by section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure which must be shown to divest a person of title to his property and vest it in another under the doctrine of adverse possession. This mode for the transference of property is, obviously, of a very delicate nature, and the Legislature has accordingly exercised meticulous care in providing the means for its accomplishment; and the courts have uniformly held that the provisions of our statutes under which such titles may be established must be strictly followed. As is said in Pyramid Land, etc., Co. v. Scott, 51 Cal. App. 634, 646, 197 P. 398, 403:

"It is safe to say that in nearly every case where title to real property is sought to be established by adverse possession or prescription, which is based entirely upon the presumption of a grant of such property to the party so claiming it or to his predecessors in interest, there has in point of fact never been a grant or conveyance to the adverse claimant or his predecessors for a consideration. Hence, no person should be deprived of his property rights upon the plea of adverse possession or prescription unless such plea is sustained by the clearest and most satisfactory proof."

To the same effect are Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 669, 66 P. 10; Niles v. Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 576, 58 P. 190, and Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 459, 12 P. 491.

[16-19] The doctrine that the acquisition of title to real property by adverse possession presupposes a grant of such property does not, of course, apply to the statute of limitations; that statute being one of repose, and the effect of its application being to cut off the owner's remedy for the recovery of the property or the possession thereof. But, to start the statute to running against the legal owner of the land, there must be an avowed claim of ownership by the party relying upon the statute and substantially all the elements essential to the establishment of title by adverse possession shown to exist. In the instant case, the claim by defendants of the running of the statute of limitations necessarily falls with the failure of the testimony to support their claim of title by adverse possession. It will not, of course, be denied that a party out of possession of land may maintain an action to quiet his title to such land under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that he is not required to proceed in such an action until there has been asserted by another a claim of title thereto hostile to that of the real owner. Code Civ. Proc. § 380; Richardson v. Williamson, 24 Cal. 299; Brusie v. Gates, 80 Cal. 462, 22 P. 284; Cobe v. Crane, 173 Cal. 116, 119, 159 P. 587; Hyatt v. Colkins,

174 Cal. 580, 581, 163 P. 1007. See, also, on subject of laches in cases of this character: Liebrand v. Otto, 56 Cal. 248; People's Water Co. v. Boromeo, 31 Cal. App. 270, 160 P. 574; People's Water Co. v. Lewis, 19 Cal. App. 622, 625, 127 P. 506. In the last-named case it is said:

"Plaintiff, having established a legal title to the property, is presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law, and the occupation of the property by defendant to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, and this presumption can only be overcome by sufficient evidence on the part of the appellant that he had held and possessed the property adversely to such legal title for five years before the commencement of the action."

In Hyde v. Redding, 74 Cal. 500, 16 P. 380, it is said:

"Where a plaintiff has been in possession of land, he cannot be guilty of laches in the bringing of a suit to remove a cloud at any time before an action has been brought to disturb his possession, or to deprive him of any enjoyment of his right."

Thus far the case has been considered upon the claim by the defendants of title by adverse possession not founded upon a written instrument, and, incidentally, upon the like claim of the bar of the statute of limitations.

[20, 21] Coming now to a consideration of the alleged claim of title by adverse possession founded on the deed received by George J. Henley from the abstract company, a conclusive answer to that claim is in the fact that the plaintiffs brought this action within five years from the date on which said company executed and delivered the quitclaim deed to the interest involved herein to George J. Henley. The deed was dated the 6th day of July, 1917, and, there being no evidence to the contrary, was presumptively delivered to Henley on that date. Civ. Code, § 1055. The plaintiffs brought this action on May 28, 1921. Thus it will be seen that plaintiffs instituted the action within less than four years after the execution and delivery of the deed to George J. Henley. The contention that the defendant George J. Henley, having acquired "color of title" under "a defective written instrument," subsequently to the time of entering into possession and occupation of the property under a claim not founded on a written instrument, "may relate his occupation under the written instrument back to the time of his original entry upon the property," is afforded no support in the record. The cases cited (Dean v. Goodard, 55 Minn. 290, 56 N. W. 1060, and Valentine v. Cooley, Meigs [Tenn.] 613, 33 Am. Dec. 166), conceding for present purposes only that they hold, as counsel for the defendants contend, are still not applicable to the situation as made here by the evidence, since, as above shown, there is no possession and occupation, in so far as "possession and occupation" constitutes an element in the establishment of title by adverse possession, for the claim of adverse possession under color of title to "relate back to."

[22, 23] The contention that the court should have allowed the defendants compensation for the improvements they put upon the property is without merit, from a legal standpoint. The first requisite for the granting of such relief is that a demand, properly set out, shall be made for such reimbursement in the pleading of the party asking for such relief. Here no claim for reimbursement for the expenditures required for the making of the asserted improvements was set up in the answer of the defendants to the complaint, or any such issue otherwise submitted or tendered. To justify such an allowance, in a proper case, it must be shown, both by pleading and proof, that the alleged "improvements" were made in good faith, and that they have enhanced the value of the property sought to be recovered. But it is clear that, under the terms of section 741 of the Code of Civil Procedure, such a plea would not be appropriate, and could not be maintained in the present case. The Code section named provides:

"When damages are claimed for withholding the property recovered, upon which permanent improvements have been made by a defendant, or those under whom he claims, holding under color of title adversely to the claim of the plaintiff, in good faith, the value of such improvements must be allowed as a set-off against such damages."

[24] It is plainly manifest that, under the terms of said section, in an action to recover real property, whether the remedy be either legal or equitable, a defendant cannot be allowed reimbursement for improvements made by him upon the property sought to be recovered except by way of a set-off against any damages which may be claimed by the plaintiff for the withholding of the property. See Ford v. Holton, 5 Cal. 320, 332; Huse v. Den, 85 Cal. 390, 401, 24 P. 790, 20 Am. St. Rep. 232; Wise v. Burton, 73 Cal. 174, 14 P. 683; Kinard v. Kaelin, 22 Cal. App. 383, 389, 134 P. 370.

In the case last named, the rule is stated, substantially, as it had been stated in previous adjudications of the proposition, as follows:

"It is the rule in actions for the recovery of real property that the value of permanent improvements made by a person holding in good faith and under a color of title adversely to the plaintiff may be allowed only as a set-off to such damages as may be claimed for the withholding of the property sued for"—citing Code of Civil Procedure, § 741; Huse v. Den, 85 Cal. 390, 24 P. 790, 20 Am. St. Rep. 232, 4 Sutherland's Code Pleading, § 6406.

[25, 26] No damages were pleaded or asked for by the plaintiffs for "withholding the property," nor, so far as her own interest was concerned, was there a "withholding of the property" by defendants. It may be added with some propriety that, if, as a legal proposition, it were permissible for defendants to claim reimbursement at the hands of Mrs. Wood for the expense to which they went in erecting the stone house, stable, fence, and road, they would find it difficult, by the evidence in this record, to persuade a court to the conviction that they acted in good faith in claiming title by adverse possession founded upon the quitclaim deed purporting to convey to George J. Henley whatever interest the state or the abstract company had acquired in the property in question, since there were circumstances from which the court could well have found that said Henley well knew, when he took the deed from the abstract company, that, in accepting the conveyance, he would not and did not thereby acquire a valid or any title to the property described in the grant. The deed itself, being a quitclaim, or conveying only such interest in the interest in dispute as the abstract company had acquired from the state, was notice to said Henley that the title thus attempted to be transferred was of dubious or doubtful validity. The letter of Ira B. Wood to the abstract company, in date anterior to the time at which the latter conveyed to George J. Henley, specifically stated that the state's title to the property was absolutely void, and that said company could convey no valid title to the parties (referring to the Henleys) to whom the agent of the company informed said Wood that said company intended to sell and transfer it. These circumstances were sufficient to create more than a mere suspicion of bad faith in George J. Henley's attempt to establish a title to said interest by adverse possession under section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But, however this all may be, we think it is perfectly clear from the record before us that the findings are amply supported, and that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

NESBIT v. MacDONALD. (S. F. 12230.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Bills and notes ☞125—Note payable "two years after date" held not demand note bearing interest from date of demand only.

A note, payable "two years after date," held not a demand note, bearing interest from date of demand only.

2. Evidence ☞422—Note, payable "two years after date," cannot be varied by parol evidence that payee never intended to enforce payment at maturity, so as to make it demand note (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, § 1625).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, and Civ. Code, § 1625, terms of note, payable "two years after date," cannot be varied by parol evidence that plaintiff never intended to enforce its payment at maturity, so as to make it a demand note, bearing interest from date of demand only.

3. Bills and notes ☞125—Interest on note, not specifying interest, is allowable from maturity date at legal rate.

No interest being specified in note payable "two years after date," interest is allowable from date of maturity at legal rate.

4. Executors and administrators ☞241, 443 (7)—One suing on decedent's note, after rejection of claim thereon, is not limited to recovery of interest demanded, though presentation and rejection of claim must be pleaded, and claimant can recover only on cause of action stated therein (Code Civ. Proc. § 1500).

While presentation and rejection of claim against decedent's estate must be pleaded under Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, to give court jurisdiction of action thereon, and claimant can recover only on cause of action set forth in claim, action to enforce rejected claim on note is really founded on note, and plaintiff is not limited to recovery of interest demanded, as court may determine true computation and allow correct amount due on note.

5. Executors and administrators ☞241—One suing on note, after executor rejected claim thereon for smaller amount than that due, is not estopped to urge maximum amount due.

Executor, having rejected as a whole a claim on decedent's note for a smaller amount than that actually due thereon, thus forcing claimant to institute action for recovery, claimant is not estopped to urge maximum amount due by terms of note.

6. Bills and notes ☞125—Interest, recoverable from maturity date of note specifying no interest, is in nature of damages for detention of debt (Civ. Code, §§ 1914, 3302).

Interest, recoverable at legal rate from maturity date of note specifying no interest, is in nature of damages for detention of debt, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1914, 3302.

7. Bills and notes ☞471—Prayer for interest on note, without specifying rate, is deemed prayer for legal interest.

A prayer for interest on note sued on, without specifying the rate, is deemed a prayer for legal interest.

8. Bills and notes ☞117—Legal interest rate in foreign state, wherein note specifying no interest was executed, does not govern (Civ. Code, §§ 1914, 3302).

Interest from maturity date of note specifying no interest being in nature of damages for detention of debt, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1914, 3302, legal rate of interest in foreign state, wherein note was executed, does not govern.

9. Evidence ☞80(1)—Court must presume that rate of interest on note in state wherein executed is same as in California, in absence of pleading or proof of former state's law.

In absence of pleading or proof as to what is law of foreign state, in which note specifying no interest was executed, Supreme Court must presume that rate of interest therein is same as in California.

10. Evidence ☞35—Courts do not take judicial notice of foreign laws.

Neither trial court nor Supreme Court takes judicial notice of a foreign law, which must be pleaded and proved like any other fact.

11. Statutes ☞281, 289—First presentation of foreign law on motion to amend findings and in brief is not equivalent of presentation by pleading or evidence.

Presentation of law of foreign state for first time on motion to amend findings and in brief of counsel cannot be considered equivalent of its presentation by pleading or in evidence.

12. Evidence ☞80(1)—California courts presume that laws of other states are same as those of California, in absence of contrary plea or proof.

In absence of plea or proof to the contrary, courts of California presume that laws of other states are the same as those of California.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Mildred Nesbit against Colin MacDonald, as executor of the will of Sara Irene Budd, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albert I. Loeb, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Lionel D. Hargis, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an action to recover upon the following promissory note:

"$5,000. Carnegie, Pa. June 1, 1919. Two years after date, I promise to pay to the order of Mildred G. Nesbit—five thousand—00/100 dollars, at Mahoning National Bank, Youngstown, without defalcation, for value received. Due —, Payable at —. Sara Irene Budd."

Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $5,000, together with interest from June 1, 1921, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Upon this appeal defendant contends, first, that the court erred in allowing interest prior to November 24, 1924, date of first demand for payment of said note, and, second, that the court erred in allowing any interest at a rate greater than 6 per cent.

It appears that plaintiff loaned the sum evidenced by said note to Sara Irene Budd, deceased, because of their close personal friendship, and, further that she never demanded payment thereof prior to the death of Mrs. Budd, as she believed it would be repaid at such time as Mrs. Budd could do so "without embarrassment." On November 24, 1924, however, following the death of Sara Irene Budd in May of that year, the qualification of defendant as executor of her will in June, and pursuant to notice to creditors, plaintiff presented and filed with said executor claim for $6,040.54, $5,000 of which represented the principal sum of the note, and $1,040.54 interest thereon at 6 per cent. from June 1, 1921, to November 18, 1924. The executor rejected the claim, whereupon plaintiff commenced this action. The note is set forth in full in the complaint, and the claim appears as an exhibit thereto. No rate of interest, however, is specified; the prayer being for the sum of $5,000, "together with interest thereon from the 1st day of June, 1921." Upon submission of the findings of fact, defendant moved that they be amended so as to allow plaintiff interest only from date of presentation of the claim, November 24, 1924, or, if the court should determine to allow interest from June 1, 1921, that said interest should be charged only at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, the legal rate appertaining in the state of Pennsylvania, where the note was made. This motion was denied, and judgment went for plaintiff as aforesaid.

[1-3] In support of his first contention appellant urges that the note is in reality a demand note, as plaintiff admittedly never intended to enforce its payment at maturity; therefore it is subject to the well-settled law that demand notes bear interest from date of demand only, in this instance, November 24, 1924. Secondly, appellant contends that, as the claim filed calls for interest at the rate of 6 per cent., and as the prayer of the complaint is silent on this subject, no higher rate may be allowed, for a judgment may not exceed the amount demanded in the complaint. He further urges that this is true because the 6 per cent. legal rate of interest obtaining in Pennsylvania, where the contract was made, is controlling.

We cannot agree with appellant in either of these contentions. The first falls before the obvious fact that the note is not a demand note, but provides in so many words that it is payable "two years after date." The terms of the writing itself may not be varied by parol evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Civ. Code, § 1625. No interest being specified therein, interest is allowable, as provided in the judgment, from the maturity date, June 1, 1921, at the legal rate of 7 per cent. per annum.

[4, 5] The fact that the claim was made an exhibit to the complaint does not affect this conclusion, as said complaint declares upon the note itself. It is true that, in an action upon a rejected claim, under section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure, presentation to, and rejection thereof, by the executor must be pleaded to give the trial court jurisdiction (Reed v. Reed, 178 Cal. 187, 172 P. 600; Morrison v. Land, 169 Cal. 580, 147 P. 259), and claimant can recover only upon the cause of action set forth in the claim (Lichtenberg v. McGlynn, 105 Cal. 45, 38 P. 541; Gallagher v. McGraw, 132 Cal. 601, 64 P. 1080; Enscoe v. Fletcher, 1 Cal. App. 659, 82 P. 1075; Etchias v. Orena, 127 Cal. 588, 60 P. 45; Brooks v. Lawson, 136 Cal. 10, 68 P. 97; Barthe v. Rogers, 127 Cal. 52, 59 P. 310; In re Dutard, 147 Cal. 253, 81 P. 519). However, where a claim on a note is rejected, the action is in reality founded upon the note and not upon the claim (Gallagher v. McGraw, supra), and, where there is a variance between the amount of the interest set forth in the claim and the amount actually due on the note, plaintiff is not limited by her interest demand, for it is properly within the province of the trial court to determine the true computation thereof and, adjusting the error, to make allowance of the correct amount. This holding is implied in the following cases: Elizade v. Murphy, 163 Cal. 681, 126 P. 978; Raggio v. Palmtag, 155 Cal. 797, 103 P. 312; Moore v. Russell, 133 Cal. 297, 65 P. 624, 85 Am. St. Rep. 166; Merithew v. Orr, 90 Cal. 363, 27 P. 295. Appellant having rejected the claim as a whole and for the smaller amount, thus forcing the claimant to institute an action for recovery, said claimant is not estopped to urge the maximum amount due on the note as per its terms.

[6, 7] In a case of this character the interest is not recoverable by virtue of any provision of the note or contract, but is in the nature of damages for detention of the debt. Furthermore, a prayer for "interest," without specifying the rate, is deemed a prayer for legal interest. 14 Cal. Jur. § 15, p. 692; Latimer v. Ryan, 20 Cal. 628; Lamping & Co. v. Hyatt, 27 Cal. 99.

This very question was before the court in the case of Puppo v. Larosa, 194 Cal. 717, 720, 721, 230 P. 439, 440, and it was there said:

"The promissory note by its terms bore no interest. The trial court allowed legal interest thereon from the date of its maturity. * * * If, * * * interest is not expressly reserved, and the paper matures at a time certain, it will draw interest from its maturity by operation of law without prior demand, and at the legal rate. In such case interest is in the nature of damages for the detention of the debt, and is not recoverable by virtue of any provision of the contract. (Civ. Code, § 3302; Gray v. Bekins, 186 Cal. 389, 399 [199 P. 767]; 8 Cor. Jur., pp. 1095, 1096, secs. 1425-1427.) * * * The fact that the contract provides for no interest has nothing whatever to do with the damages due after the breach of the condition for payment on the due date of the note. * * * The action of the trial court in allowing legal interest on the amount due was, therefore, correct."

See, also, Civ. Code, § 1914; 14 Cal. Jur. p. 678, § 5, and many cases there cited; Lockhart v. McDougall Co., 190 Cal. 308, 212 P. 1. The principle announced above is similarly stated in 15 R. C. L. § 24, p. 26, citing Roberts v. Smith, 64 Tex. 94, 53 Am. Rep. 744, and also in note to 6 Am. Dec. p. 191 (cited in 15 R. C. L. § 20, p. 23).

[8-12] The above holding that interest, after failure to pay, is given, not according to contract, but in the nature of damages, likewise disposes of appellant's contention that the 6 per cent. legal rate of interest alleged to appertain in Pennsylvania should govern. There is, moreover, another answer to this argument, to wit, that, in the absence of pleading or proof as to what the law of the state of Pennsylvania is, we are required to indulge the presumption that the rate of interest there is the same as the rate in this state. Neither the trial court nor this court takes judicial notice of a foreign law and the presentation of it for the first time on motion to amend the findings and in the brief of counsel cannot be considered the equivalent of its presentation by pleading or in evidence. Ryan v. North Alaska Salmon Co., 153 Cal. 438, 440, 95 P. 862. "Where a party seeks to either recover or defend under a foreign law, such law must be pleaded and proved like any other fact." * * * The courts of this state take notice of its own laws, and, as above stated, in the absence of plea or proof to the contrary, presume that the laws of other states are the same." Peck v. Noee, 154 Cal. 351, 353, 97 P. 865, 866. See, to the same effect, Murphy v. Murphy, 145 Cal. 482, 484, 78 P. 1053, 1054, citing Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 411, 38 P. 89, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118, where it is said:

"The law of England on the question of interest, as on every other question, will, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, be presumed to be the same as the law of this state."

Judgment affirmed.

MOORE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 12543.)★

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Divorce ⇨303(1), 309—Statute authorizing modifying divorce decree as to children's custody and support is read into decree (Civ. Code, § 138).

Civ. Code, § 138, providing that, in divorce actions, court may make such order for care, custody, and support of minor children as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time modify or vacate it, must be read into every decree of divorce which purports to deal with care, custody, and support of minor children.

2. Divorce ⇨295—Court has jurisdiction of parties after divorce decree to make orders concerning support and custody of children (Civ. Code, § 138).

Court has same jurisdiction to make orders as to care, custody, and support of minor children of parties to divorce after entry of either interlocutory or final decree of divorce as it had prior thereto as to subject-matter and as to persons, under Civ. Code, § 138.

3. Constitutional law ⇨309(1)—Defendant in divorce action must be given notice before court can require payments for children (Civ. Code, § 138).

Defendant in divorce action must be given such notice as will accord to him due process of law, before court can enter order adjudging amount which he must pay by way of support for minor children, under Civ. Code, § 138.

4. Divorce ⇨303(3), 309—Statute held applicable in determining notice necessary to modify decree as to children's custody and support (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019; Civ. Code, § 138).

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019, relating to giving and service of notice of motions in civil actions, are applicable in determining what notice must be given party to divorce action of motion to modify final divorce decree as to custody, control, and support of minor children under Civ. Code, § 138.

5. Divorce $\Leftrightarrow$ 303(3), 309—Where party is represented by attorney, notice of motion to modify decree as to children's custody and support may be served on him (Civ. Code, § 138; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019).

Where party to divorce action is no longer represented by attorney of record, notice of motion to modify decree of divorce as to care, custody, and support of minor children under Civ. Code, § 138, must be made upon him personally, if he is within jurisdiction in manner provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019, but, where he is still represented by his attorney of record, such notice may be served upon such attorney.

6. Evidence $\Leftrightarrow$ 43(1)—It is common knowledge that parties to divorce engage in controversies after decrees mainly through motions by attorneys.

It is common knowledge that parties to divorce actions frequently indulge in even more acrimonious controversies after than before entry of final decree, relating to payment of alimony or care, custody, and support of minor children, and that such controversies are mainly carried on by motions to enforce or modify previous orders and decrees, and that parties are represented by attorneys upon whom papers are served.

7. Divorce $\Leftrightarrow$ 303(3), 309—Whether party to divorce is represented by attorney on whom notice of motion to modify decree as to children's custody and support may be served is question for court (Civ. Code, § 138; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019).

Question whether party to divorce action is still represented by attorney of record, and hence whether notice of motion to modify divorce decree as to custody and support of children under Civ. Code, § 138, may be served on such attorney under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019, is question of fact for court.

8. Divorce $\Leftrightarrow$ 309—Jurisdiction to determine that party to divorce was represented by attorney on whom notice of motion to modify decree as to children's support might be served was not divested by objection (Civ. Code, § 138; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019).

Jurisdiction of court to determine whether party to divorce action was still represented by attorney of record, and hence whether notice of motion to modify divorce decree as to support of minor children under Civ. Code, § 138, might be served on such attorney under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019, was not divested by objection to jurisdiction through other counsel by so-called special appearance.

9. Divorce $\Leftrightarrow$ 312—Determination that notice of motion to modify decree as to children's support might be served on attorney held not reviewable by writ of review (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019, 1068; Civ. Code, § 138).

Error in determining whether party to divorce action was still represented by attorney of record, and hence whether notice of motion to modify divorce decree as to support of minor children, under Civ. Code, § 138, might be served on such attorney under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1003-1007, 1010-1019, is not reviewable by writ of review, under section 1068, since appeal lies; error being in exercise of jurisdiction and not in excess of it.

Application by William H. Moore for certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Hon. John J. Van Nostrand, Judge, modifying a final decree of divorce. Order affirmed.

Superseding opinion of Court of Appeal, 255 P. 852.

Stanislaus A. Riley, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

R. F. Mogan, T. W. Hubbard, and Leo A. Murasky, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein seeks, by a writ of review, to have reviewed a certain proceeding and annulled a certain order of the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, made and entered in an action for divorce, entitled Alyce Moore, Plaintiff, v. William H. Moore, Defendant. The facts upon which said application is based, and which are practically undisputed, are the following: On the 8th day of April, 1914, the said superior court made and entered its interlocutory decree in said action, wherein and whereby the care, custody, and control of the two minor children of the parties to said action was awarded to the plaintiff, and the defendant was ordered to pay to the plaintiff monthly the sum of $30 for the support and maintenance of said children, and the further sum of $12.50 at stated intervals for their necessary clothing. The final decree, which was made and entered on April 12, 1915, embodied the foregoing terms of the interlocutory decree. During the trial of said action, the defendant, who had been personally served and had appeared therein, was represented by one E. G. Ryker, Esq., as his attorney of record in said cause. In the year 1917 the defendant went to reside in Portland, Or., in which state he has since resided. On the 8th day of September, 1926, the plaintiff in said action filed in said court her notice of motion for an order amending the final decree of divorce therein so as to direct the defendant to thereafter pay to said plaintiff the sum of $60 per month for the support and maintenance of said minor children, and the further sum of $50 in January and June of each year to assist in purchasing clothing for them. The time fixed in said notice for the hearing of said motion was the 24th day of September, 1926, at the hour of 10 o'clock. Service of said notice of motion was attempted to be made and consisted in the mailing forthwith of a copy thereof to said E. G. Ryker, at the office address of said Ryker in Oakland, Cal., the said Ryker being, as the affidavit of mailing deposes, the attorney of record for the plaintiff in said action at all the times mentioned therein, and in the further mailing of a copy of said notice to the defendant himself at his Portland place of residence.

On the day fixed in said notice for the hearing upon said motion, the plaintiff appeared in court in support of said motion; the defendant also, represented by other counsel than said Ryker, made a so-called special appearance for the sole alleged purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court to make any order upon said motion and of moving the court to quash the attempted service of notice thereof. In support of said objection and motion, counsel for the defendant presented and filed the affidavit of said E. G. Ryker, who deposed that, while he had at all the times mentioned therein been an attorney and counselor at law, with his offices in the city of Oakland, he had ceased to be the attorney for the defendant at the time of the entry of the final decree therein, and had not since represented him in said action. The plaintiff, in resisting said motion, introduced the affidavit of service of the moving paper therein, wherein it was asserted that said Ryker had at all times been and still was the defendant's attorney of record in said action. The court overruled the defendant's said objection, and denied his said motion, and thereupon proceeded to hear and determine the plaintiff's motion for the amendment of said final decree; and, after taking testimony thereon, in the taking of which the defendant's counsel took no part, made and entered its order amending its final decree in said action so as to provide for the payment to the plaintiff of the sum of $50 monthly for the support and maintenance of the one of the children of the parties who still remained a minor, said sum being in addition to the sums required for clothing as required by the terms of said decree. In the body of said order, the trial court found and recited that due and legal notice of the hearing of said motion had been duly given to said defendant as required by law. Following the making and entry of said order, the defendant made application for this writ of review, wherein the petitioner averred that the trial court acted beyond and in excess of its jurisdiction in the making and entry of its foregoing orders. In making this insistence, the petitioner herein concedes that during the trial of said action for divorce, and up at least to the time of the entry of the final decree therein, the trial court had acquired full jurisdiction over both the person of said defendant and the subject-matter of said action, including the right in said tribunal to make and enter its orders embraced in both the interlocutory and final judgment therein relating to the custody, care, support, and maintenance of the minor children of the parties to said action. The petitioner also substantially admits that, in respect to the last-named content of said decrees, the trial court, by virtue of the provisions of section 138 of the Civil Code, retained a continuing jurisdiction over the subject-matter thereof to the extent that it might modify or vacate at any time thereafter during the minority of such children such order or orders as it might have embodied in its said decrees for the custody, care, education, maintenance, and support of such minor children. The petitioner, however, insists that such jurisdiction, while it continues over the subject-matter provided for in said section 138 of the Civil Code, is not retained over the person of the defendant after the date of the making and entry of said final decree.

[1, 2] The language of section 138 of the Civil Code is read into every decree of divorce which purports to deal with the care, custody, and support of the minor children of the parties to the action, and, this being so, whatever orders or decrees the trial court may make or enter in the premises are not in the nature of final judgments which determine the relation of the parties to each other, or to the action or to the subject-matter over which the court has thus retained all of the jurisdiction which it had during every stage of the proceedings and pendency of such action. In the foregoing sense the trial court retained, under said section of the Civil Code, so read into its orders and decrees, the same jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter to which said section relates that it had and exercised prior to the making and entry of either its interlocutory or its final decree in said action. The petitioner herein has referred us to no authority which is opposed to this conclusion, and we are satisfied that no such authority exists.

[3, 4] It does not, however, follow that the trial court, which has acquired general jurisdiction over the parties to an action, may arbitrarily or ex parte make and enter either during the progress of the proceedings before it, or after its entry of a so-called final decree therein, orders and decrees adjudging the amount which defendant may be required to pay either in the way of alimony to his wife or in the way of the support of his minor children. Before such orders, which have the effect of money judgments, and which are under the law enforceable by several drastic methods, can be made in an action for divorce or maintenance, some such sufficient notice must be given to the defendant as will amount to what is known as due process of law. This requisite notice must be such as shall find its warrant in the statutory procedure provided for the conduct of civil actions in order to give the court of record in which such actions are pending jurisdiction to make its several orders, judgments, and decrees therein. Prior to the appearance of a defendant in an action, he is required to be served with the process known as a summons, or in some cases as a citation; and, in those actions wherein a judgment in personam is sought, the service of such process must be personal and must provide for such reasonable notice as will enable him to have his day in court. When, however, such defendant has been thus served with process or has appeared in such action, the statute provides other forms of notice in order to give the court jurisdiction to make and enforce its orders pendente lite; as, for example, when a defendant has appeared in an action and has come to be represented by an attorney of record therein, the statute (Code of Civil Procedure, § 1015) provides that the service of all papers, when required, must be upon the attorney instead of the party, with certain specified exceptions, such as service of writs, subpoenas, or other process. In universal practice, the service of notices of motions to be made during the process of an action is made upon the attorney of record in the action under the foregoing express provisions of the statute; and we can perceive no reason why the same provisions of the statute may not have application as well after as before the entry of a decree of divorce, which, in so far as it relates to the custody, care, and maintenance of the minor children of the parties thereto, is not a finality, but over whom, during their said minority, as well as over their parents, the trial court retains a continuing jurisdiction which is as complete as that possessed by it prior to the entry of said final decree. The reason why this should be so is well set forth by the Supreme Court of Washington in the case of Ruge v. Ruge, 97 Wash. 51, 55, 165 P. 1063, 1065 (L. R. A. 1917F, 721), wherein it is stated:

"As it seems to us, the true basis upon which the power to modify the decree in these cases rests is that out of the marital relation springs a new relationship, viz. that of parent and child. Palpably neither executive edict, enactment of Legislature, nor decree of court can change the relationship existing between parent and child. The courts may decree that the marital tie shall be absolutely severed and the parties be placed, so far as the law is concerned, in the same situation that they occupied prior to the solemnization of the marriage ceremony; but they cannot alter or modify the fact that a father is the parent of his offspring. This parental relationship, springing as it does from the relationship of marriage, is to this extent incident to the marital status. But the duty of the father, if he has means with which to do so, to support his infant children springs immediately from the parental relationship. As this relationship, incidental as it is to the marriage state, continues to exist after the status out of which it arose has been terminated, either naturally, as by death, or artificially, as by divorce, the duty incident to that continuing relationship still exists.

The right of the wife to alimony arises immediately out of the marriage contract, but the right of the child to support at the hands of its parents springs from the incidental relationship which had its origin in marriage, to wit, that of parent and child. The court therefore, acting upon this relationship as one of the things brought to it by the divorce action, has the power to modify or alter its decree so long as there are minor children under the protection of the court."

We are thus brought to the inquiry as to what notice is by law required to be given to a defendant of an application for an order modifying the provisions of a final decree in a divorce action relating to the custody, control, and support of the minor children of the parties thereto. We are of the opinion that those sections of the Code of Civil Procedure (part 2, tit. 14, chs. 4 and 5) which relate to the giving and service of notice of motions in civil actions would have application to such proceedings in said actions with relation to which the judgments and decrees of the trial court have not become a finality, but over which it retained by law or by the terms of such judgments and decrees a continuing jurisdiction. This would seem to be a rule of reason applicable to both of the parties to the action.

[5] Having thus concluded, the next question which arises is as to the person upon whom the service of such notice might be legally made. It would seem to be clear that if the party to the action, whether plaintiff or defendant, had ceased to be represented in the action by an attorney of record upon the entry of the judgment or final decree, the service of such notice would be required to be made upon the plaintiff or defendant, as the case might be, in person, in the manner and for the time provided in the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, to which reference has above been made, provided the party thus to be served was within the territorial jurisdiction of the court; but if, on the other hand, it should be made to appear that the person to be thus served with such notice was still represented in said action by an attorney of record therein, the foregoing sections of said Code would seem to have application to such a situation so as to permit and provide for the service of such notices or other moving papers upon such attorney of record. Illustrations might be multiplied to show the reasonableness of such a rule as applied to such a situation.

[6, 7] It is a matter of common knowledge that the parties to divorce actions frequently indulge in even more acute and acrimonious controversies after than before the entry of final decrees relating to the payment of alimony or to the care, custody and support of minor children, and that such controversies are in the main carried on through the procedure of motions for the enforcement or modification of previous orders and decrees, and that in such controversies the respective parties are represented by attorneys, upon whom, rather than upon the parties themselves, all such papers as notices of motions, affidavits, and counter affidavits, and other documents having relation to the controversy, are served. It would seem to be almost a rule of necessity that it should be so, since otherwise the very party who had initiated a proceeding for the modification of a divorce decree in respect to the matters over which the court has continuing jurisdiction might betake himself beyond the boundaries of the state of California, and while from this safe position, directing the attack through his attorney, be immune from a counter assault, because, forsooth, the moving papers of his adversary could not be served upon him. This court, in dealing with the aspects of such a precise situation, has recently decided that service upon a defendant's attorney of record in a proceeding pending before it for the enforcement of an order for maintenance would suffice to put him upon such notice of the making of such order as would put him in contempt for its disobedience. Shibley v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 332. Having thus determined that under such circumstances as those above instanced the service of papers in a pending and undetermined matter before the trial court might be made upon the attorney of record of a party over whom the court had originally acquired full jurisdiction, it would seem to logically follow that the question as to whether such a party was represented in such a proceeding by an attorney of record would be a question of fact to be determined by the trial court upon the hearing of the motion, notice of which was predicated upon such service thereof.

[8, 9] In the instant case, and upon such hearing, the trial court had presented to it conflicting evidence upon the question as to whether E. G. Ryker, the defendant's former attorney of record, still continued to be such up to and including the time of the service of said moving papers upon him. The fact that the defendant presented his objection to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain such motion by other counsel and through a so-called special appearance did not divest the trial court of power to decide the question; and, even if it committed an error therein, it would be an error in the exercise of its jurisdiction and not in excess of it. For such an error the only remedy of the defendant would be by way of an appeal, and, having such a remedy, a writ of review would not lie. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068.

The order is affirmed.

McKAY v. LAURISTON et al. (S. F. 12691.)★

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 10, 1928.

Rehearing Granted Feb. 9, 1928.

1. Husband and wife ⇨247—Amendment giving spouses power to make testamentary disposition of half community property held not to enlarge wife's interest in community property previously acquired (Civ. Code § 1401, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29, § 1).

Amendment in 1923 to Civ. Code, § 1401 (St. 1923, p. 29, § 1), providing that upon the death of husband or wife one-half the community property belongs to the surviving spouse and the other half is subject to testamentary disposition, held not to enlarge wife's interest in community property acquired before the amendment became effective.

2. Husband and wife ⇨265—Wife's interest in community property acquired in 1918 held contingent on her survival of husband (Civ. Code, §§ 172a, 1401; St. 1923, p. 29, § 1).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 172a, 1401, wife's interest in community property acquired in 1918 held contingent on her survival of her husband, since the 1923 amendment to section 1401 (St. 1923, p. 29, § 1) did not enlarge wife's interest in community property previously acquired.

3. Husband and wife ⇨273(1)—Wills ⇨6—Wife's attempt to devise community property held ineffectual, since such property on wife's death belonged to husband without administration, notwithstanding statutory amendment (Civ. Code, §§ 172a, 1401; St. 1923, p. 29, § 1).

Wife's attempt to devise community property acquired at a time when her right therein was contingent on surviving her husband held ineffectual, since under Civ. Code, § 172a, and § 1401 (prior to 1923 amendment [St. 1923, p. 29, § 1]), such property on wife's death belonged to husband without administration, and 1923 amendment could not enlarge wife's interest in community property acquired previously.

4. Wills ⇨3—Law at time community property was acquired, and not at wife's death, determines whether wife has devisable interest (Civ. Code, § 1401, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29, § 1).

Law at time community property was acquired, and not at the time of wife's death, determines whether she has a devisable interest, under Civ. Code, § 1401, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29, § 1.

5. Descent and distribution ⇨68—Right to inherit from ancestor is mere expectancy.

The right of an heir to inherit from his ancestor is a mere expectancy, and is not in any sense a vested interest prior to ancestor's death.

6. Constitutional law ⇨94—Statutes governing right of inheritance may be amended without infringing upon any vested right of heir.

Statutes governing rights of heirs to inheritance may be changed in any manner without infringing upon or violating any vested right of an heir, since the right of an heir to inherit from his ancestor is a mere expectancy.

7. Descent and distribution ⚭6—Statutes in force at time of death control disposition of intestate's property.

Statutes governing the right of inheritance in force at time of intestate's death control the disposition of his estate.

8. Husband and wife ⚭273(1)—Husband held not to take community property, on wife's death, by descent or succession, and hence statutory amendment giving wife power to devise community property was not controlling (Civ. Code, § 1401; St. 1923, p. 29, § 1).

Where community property was acquired prior to 1923 amendment of Civ. Code, § 1401, husband held not to take the community property, on the death of the wife, by descent or succession, and hence 1923 amendment (St. 1923, p. 29, § 1), providing that spouses might devise one-half of the community property, which amendment was in effect at the time of the wife's death, was not controlling.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Patrick J. McKay against Heneretta Lauriston and another, individually and as executrices of the last will and testament of Hattie A. McKay, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James J. Harrington, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Richard Fitzpatrick, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. It appears by written stipulation of the parties hereto, and admissions made by the pleadings herein, that certain real property, described in the complaint and situated in the city and county of San Francisco, was acquired as community property by the plaintiff on the 9th day of November, 1918, at which time plaintiff and Hattie A. McKay were husband and wife. No change in the ownership of said real property was made up to the 16th day of August, 1926, on which date the said Hattie A. McKay died, leaving a last will and testament by the terms of which she sought to devise an interest in said real property to her husband, the plaintiff herein, an undivided one-half, and to the defendants Heneretta Lauriston and Mary Frances De Mello the other undivided one-half thereof. Said defendants were named as executrices of said last will and testament, and in due time and after proceedings duly had in the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, said will was admitted to probate, and said Heneretta Lauriston and Mary Frances De Mello were appointed by said court executrices thereof. This action is brought by plaintiff to quiet his title to said real property, he claiming to be the sole owner of the whole thereof. The defendants, individually and as such executrices, assert that they are the owners by virtue of said last will and testament of an undivided one-half of the interest of the said Hattie A. McKay in said real property at the time of her death. The court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff, quieting his title to the whole of said real property against all claims of said defendants. From this judgment the defendants have appealed, and the same is before us upon the judgment roll in which is incorporated said stipulation of the parties above referred to. The only question involved in this proceeding is whether Hattie A. McKay at the time of her death was the owner of any interest in said real property which she could devise by will and testament. It is conceded that if the said Hattie A. McKay had any interest in said real property at the time of her death, which was subject to her testamentary disposition, she acquired said interest and continued to retain the same by virtue of the fact that said real property became upon its purchase in November, 1918, community property and remained such during her lifetime, and that at the date of said purchase and up to the time of her death she was the wife of Patrick J. McKay, the respondent. At the time said real property was acquired by Patrick J. McKay, section 1401 of the Civil Code read as follows:

"Upon the death of the wife the entire community property, without administration, belongs to the surviving husband, except such portion thereof as may have been set apart to her by judicial decree, for her support and maintenance, which portion is subject to her testamentary disposition, and in the absence of such disposition, goes to her descendants, or heirs, exclusive of her husband."

In 1923 said section 1401 was amended, and at the date of the death of said deceased read as follows:

"Upon the death of either husband or wife, one-half of the community property belongs to the surviving spouse; the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the decedent, and in the absence thereof goes to the surviving spouse, subject to the provisions of section one thousand four hundred two of this Code."

There is no claim that said real property or any part thereof had ever been set apart to Hattie A. McKay by judicial decree or otherwise, for her maintenance or support, or for any purpose whatsoever. It is also apparent that the provisions of section 1402 of the Civil Code have no direct bearing upon the question of the ownership of Hattie A. McKay of an interest in said real property.

At the time said real property was conveyed to plaintiff, section 172a of the Civil Code read as follows:

"The husband has the management and control of the community real property but the wife must join with him in executing any instrument by which such community real property or any interest therein is leased for a longer period than one year, or is sold, conveyed, or incumbered; provided, however, that the sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed of the husband, holding the record, title to community real property, to a lessee, purchaser or incumbrancer, in good faith without knowledge of the marriage relation shall be presumed to be valid; but no action to avoid such instrument shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the filing for record of such instrument in the recorder's office in the county in which the land is situate."

In the recent case of Stewart v. Stewart, 199 Cal. 318, 249 P. 197, this court after an exhaustive review of the decisions of this court, as well as those from other jurisdictions where the community property law prevails, considered and determined the right of the wife in community property acquired under the laws in force in this state immediately following the adoption of said section 172a and the amendment in the same year of section 172 of the Civil Code, relating, in its amended form, to community personal property. In that case we held that under the laws of this state as in force in the year 1918, relative to the rights of the wife in community property acquired while such laws were in effect, the wife had no present vested interest in the community property during the continuance of the marriage relation, except that she might by resort to appropriate judicial remedies protect and safeguard the community property against the inconsiderate and fraudulent acts of the husband. In the course of the opinion in that case this court gave utterance to the following language:

"It is most earnestly contended by and on behalf of the respondent herein that the changes in the laws relating to community property effectuated by these two latter amendments were such as to create in the wife, if such had not theretofore existed, a vested interest in an undivided one-half of the community property immediately upon the acquisition of such property by the spouses or either of them, and to continue thereafter during the existence of the marriage relation. We are unable for the following reasons to give our approval to that contention. The Legislature in framing these two amendments which, taken together, worked a revision of the former section 172 of the Civil Code did not state therein 'in plain language,' as it was pointed out in the second Spreckels Case it might easily have done, 'that the purpose of these amendments was to vest in the wife during the marriage a present interest or estate in the community property.' The Legislature did not even by said amendments to the Civil Code go so far as it had done in its revision of the inheritance tax law, coincidentally adopted, so as to state that the 'one-half of the community property which goes to the surviving wife on the death of the husband * * * shall not be deemed to pass to her as heir of her husband but shall * * * be deemed to go, pass or be transferred to her for valuable and adequate consideration.' Had the Legislature seen fit to so declare in the language employed by it in the coincident statute, no doubt could have existed as to its intent to work such a radical change in the former and long-established status as to render the interest of the wife in the community property thereafter to be acquired a present vested estate and interest therein from the date of its acquisition. The Legislature did not do this nor anything like it. All that the Legislature by these amendments did do or attempt to do was to cast about the interest of the wife in both the real and personal property of the community during the continued existence of the marriage relation added safeguards and protection against the fraudulent or inconsiderate acts of the husband in the exercise of his control and dominion over these properties of the nature of those already provided for in earlier statutes and especially in and by the 1891 amendment to section 172 of the Civil Code. It follows, to our minds, irresistibly that the same reasoning which was applied to the earlier amendment of section 172 of the Civil Code equally applies to those changes in and revision thereof accomplished by the Legislature in 1917. Additional force is, if needed, given to this conclusion when the particular provisions of section 172a as added to the Code in that year are subjected to careful consideration; for it is made to therein appear that the sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed of the husband holding the record title to community real property to a lessee, purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith, without knowledge of the marriage relation, shall be presumed to be valid and shall be so unless an action to avoid such instrument shall be commenced within one year from the recordation thereof. This provision renders the conveyance of the whole of the community real estate to a purchaser or incumbrancer thereof in good faith voidable but not void; a condition entirely inconsistent with the existence of a present and vested ownership in the wife of an undivided one-half of such property, and also with an intent on the part of the Legislature by said amendments to effectuate such a radical change in a long-established rule of property. We are, therefore, clearly of the opinion that the amendments to the Civil Code, adopted in 1917, did not operate to change such rule to the extent of creating in the wife a present vested interest in the property of the community during the continuance of the marriage relation."

The real property in controversy was acquired by the plaintiff under precisely the same legal conditions as was the real property involved in the case of Stewart v. Stewart. Accordingly, Mrs. McKay took no present interest therein which she could dispose of by last will and testament.

[1] It is claimed, however, by appellants that by the subsequent amendment of section 1401 of the Civil Code in 1923, which section was in force as thus amended at the date of the death of said Hattie A. McKay, she was given power to make testamentary disposition of one-half of the community property. There is no question but that by said section 1401 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1923, the wife at her death has been given the power to dispose by will of whatever interest in community property she may have at the time of her death. We have already seen, however, that at the time said real property was acquired the provisions of the Code then in force gave to the wife no right in the community property which she could dispose of by will. Could a subsequent statute or an amendment to the statute in force at the time the property was acquired invest the wife with a right which she did not possess prior to the enactment of said statute or amendment? This question has frequently been before the courts of this state, and particularly in proceedings where the nature and extent of the interest of the wife in the community property of herself and husband have been the subject of controversy. It has been consistently and repeatedly held by this court, beginning with the case of Spreckels v. Spreckels, reported in 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, down to cases of recent determination that amendments whereby it was sought to lessen, enlarge, or change in any manner the rights of the respective spouses in community property will not be given retroactive effect so as to affect the respective rights of the parties in community property acquired prior to the enactment of such amendments. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Estate of Frees, 187 Cal. 150, 201 P. 112; Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22; Schubert v. Lowe, 193 Cal. 291, 223 P. 550; Estate of Drishaus, 199 Cal. 369, 249 P. 515; Stewart v. Stewart, 199 Cal. 318, 249 P. 197.

The decisions of the District Court of Appeal upon this question have been to the same effect. Clavo v. Clavo, 10 Cal. App. 447, 102 P. 556; Jacobs v. All Persons, 12 Cal. App. 163, 106 P. 896; Scott v. Austin, 57 Cal. App. 553, 207 P. 710; Scott v. Austin, 58 Cal. App. 643, 209 P. 251; Copp v. Rives, 62 Cal. App. 776, 217 P. 813.

[2-4] At the time of the purchase of said real property the respondent took the absolute title thereto subject to whatever rights his wife had therein by virtue of the fact that the same was the community property of himself and his wife. This right of his wife was the right to receive upon the death of her husband, and subject to his debts, one-half of the community property. In other words, the wife was given a right in the community property contingent upon her surviving her husband, and upon the happening of this contingency such right would have ripened into a vested interest in her in and to the said community property. Her death, however, prior to that of her husband, made the happening of this contingency impossible and thereupon the entire estate belonged to the husband without administration. Civ. Code, § 1401, prior to its amendment in 1923. These rights of the respective spouses in the community property attached to the property and were acquired by the parties at the time of the conveyance of the property, and, as we have seen, said rights cannot be impaired or destroyed by subsequent legislation. The courts, as above noted, have uniformly held that any legislation affecting the rights of the parties in such cases will not be given a retroactive construction, but that the law in force at the date of the acquisition of the property is determinative of the rights of the parties therein. It is plain, therefore, that the right of Hattie A. McKay in said real property at the time of her death must be determined by the law in force at the time said property was acquired by the respondent and herself, and that as the law then in effect gave her no right to make any testamentary disposition of any of said community property or any part thereof, the provision in her last will and testament by which she sought to devise to appellants an interest in said real property is ineffectual to vest title in appellants to any part or portion of said real property.

[5-7] Appellants further contend that the statute under which the husband succeeds to the community property is a statute of succession and inheritance, and therefore the law in effect at the death of the wife governs the disposition of the property of her estate. There is no question but that the right of an heir to inherit from his ancestor is a mere expectancy and is not deemed in any sense to be a vested interest in any property of his ancestor prior to the death of the latter. Statutes governing this right may be amended in any manner the Legislature may see fit, without infringing upon or violating any vested right of the heir. It is equally well settled that the statutes governing the right of inheritance in force at the time of death control the disposition of property left by an intestate. Did the community property acquired by McKay in 1918, upon the death of Mrs. McKay, become the property of respondent by descent and inheritance, or was he the sole owner thereof at all times since its purchase, subject to a half interest therein in his wife, in case she survived him? If a wife had any interest in said real property which would, upon her death, descend to her husband as her heir, then the husband would take the same by descent and inheritance, and the law in force at the time of her death would govern. The decisions of this court, however, have been to the effect that the husband does not, upon the death of the wife, succeed to the community property by de-scient or succession. This was definitely decided in the early case of In re Rowland, 74 Cal. 523, 16 P. 315, 5 Am. St. Rep. 464, in which case this court employed the following significant language:

"The estate in expectancy of the wife in the community property is dependent upon her survivorship; and in the event of her death before her husband, it is deemed never to have existed. If we are correct in this, the husband does not, upon the death of his wife, as to the community property, take by descent or succession, but holds the community property as though acquired by himself, and as if his deceased wife had never existed."

While In re Rowland and many of the later cases enunciating this same doctrine were decided by this court in construing the sections of the Code prior to the amended form in which they were in force in 1918, at the time the McKay property was acquired, yet in more recent decisions, and particularly in Stewart v. Stewart, supra, the same doctrine has been adhered to as was enunciated in the earlier cases. We quote again from the Stewart Case:

"We are, therefore, clearly of the opinion that the amendments to the Civil Code, adopted in 1917, did not operate to change such rule to the extent of creating in the wife a present vested interest in the property of the community during the continuance of the marriage relation."

[8] Therefore, if, under the law of this state as it stood after the various amendments up to and including those enacted in 1917, the wife had no vested interest in the community property during the continuance of the marriage relation, and upon her death her mere expectancy or inchoate interest therein ceased and terminated, after her death there was no property, nor any interest in any property, to which either the husband or any other person could succeed to by descent or succession or by any other means or method. Accordingly it must be held that the respondent did not, upon the death of his wife, take interest in the community property by descent or succession. On the other hand, it is plain that whatever interest the wife had in said community property ceased and terminated at her death and thereupon the husband was the sole owner of said community property. The contention, therefore, of appellant, that the law in force at the death of Mrs. McKay controls the descent and disposition of said community property, cannot be sustained for the conclusive reason that the husband took no interest in said property by descent or succession. On the other hand, whatever interest the parties had in said property became fixed and determined by the law in force at the time said property was acquired by them; their rights therein thus acquired could not be diminished, enlarged, or in any way affected by subsequent legislation; and as said property at the time it was acquired by Mr. and Mrs. McKay became their community property, upon the death of Mrs. McKay said property in its entirety belonged to McKay without administration. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff was, at the commencement of this action, the sole owner of said real property, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

1. Husband and wife $\S$ 273(1)—Statute providing that on husband's death intestate, widow shall inherit community property is statute of descent and succession or rule of inheritance (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1401, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29).

Civ. Code, $\S$ 1401, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29, providing that upon death of husband or wife half the community property belongs to the survivor and the other half is subject to testamentary disposition of decedent, held a statute of descent and succession or rule of inheritance in so far as it provides that on husband's death intestate, widow shall inherit community property.

2. Descent and distribution $\S$ 6—Inheritance of property is determined by law in force at owner's death.

Inheritance law in force when property was acquired does not determine inheritance, but law in force at time of owner's death determines who shall inherit it.

3. Constitutional law $\S$ 190—Wills $\S$ 3—Portion of statute giving wife right to devise one-half community property held constitutional, though inapplicable to previously acquired community property (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1401, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29).

Portion of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1401, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29, giving wife the right to make testamentary disposition of one-half the community property, held not unconstitutional, although inapplicable to community property acquired before the statutory amendment became effective.

4. Statutes $\S$ 64(2)—Portion of statute concerning descent of husband's one-half of community property held not affected by validity or invalidity of portion giving wife right to devise one-half (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1401, 1402, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29).

Portion of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1401, 1402, as amended by St. 1923, p. 29, so that on husband's death intestate all community property goes to widow, held not affected by the validity or invalidity of portion giving wife right to devise one-half of the community property, since the two portions are entirely distinct and severable.

5. Statutes $\S$ 115(3)—Title of statutory amendment "relating to distribution of community property" held sufficient, although amendment gave wife power to devise one-half community property (St. 1923, p. 29, amending Civ. Code, $\S$ 1401, 1402; Const. art. 4, $\S$ 24).

Title of St. 1923, p. 29, being "An act to amend sections 1401 and 1402 of the Civil Code, relating to the distribution of community property on death of husband or wife," held sufficient, under Const. art. 4, $\S$ 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title, notwithstanding contention that amendment, in giving wife power to devise one-half community property, embraced more than mere distribution of such property.

6. Constitutional law $\S$ 70(3)—Policy or wisdom of legislation is exclusively for Legislature to determine.

The policy or wisdom of legislation is not a matter for judicial determination, but is exclusively a legislative question for the Legislature to determine.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Grattan D. Phillips. Petition by Grattan D. Phillips, Jr., against Margaret A. Phillips, individually and as administratrix of the estate of Grattan D. Phillips. Judgment for contestant, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco (R. P. Henshall, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

John L. McNab and Byron Coleman, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Eloise B. Cushing and Thomas A. Keogh, both of San Francisco, amici curiae.

CURTIS, J. This is an appeal from an order denying the petition of Grattan D. Phillips, Jr., for a partial distribution of the estate of Grattan D. Phillips, deceased. Grattan D. Phillips died intestate in the city and county of San Francisco on the 27th day of November, 1925, leaving an estate consisting of real and personal property. He also left as his sole heirs at law Margaret A. Phillips, his surviving wife, and two children, Virginia Grattan Phillips and Grattan D. Phillips, Jr., the appellant. The petition of appellant for a partial distribution of said estate, in addition to the foregoing facts, set forth the appointment of the said Margaret A. Phillips as administratrix of the estate of said deceased; that more than four months had elapsed since the issuance of letters of administration to the said administratrix, and that no distribution had been had; that the value of the estate left by said deceased was in excess of $450,000, and that said estate was but little indebted. Petitioner, the appellant herein, therefore asked for an order of court distributing to him as an heir at law of said deceased the sum of $50,000 from the property of said estate. Margaret A. Phillips, individually and as administratrix of said estate, filed an answer to said petition, and the matter was heard upon said petition and the said answer thereto. Among other things, the court found:

"Upon stipulation of the parties, said decedent and Margaret A. Phillips were married in the year 1893, and the bulk of the estate of said deceased is community property and was acquired prior to 1923 [and] that said estate left by the deceased consists of real and personal property and is of the approximate total value of $400,000."

It is further set forth in the findings that:

"It was stipulated by the parties in open court that the sole question to be determined on the hearing of said petition was the right of said Grattan D. Phillips, Jr., as surviving son of said deceased, to have distributed to him any portion of the estate of said deceased consisting of community property left by said deceased."

Upon the findings the court made the following conclusion of law and order:

"That said Grattan D. Phillips, Jr., is not entitled to have distributed to him any portion of the estate of said deceased, and that his petition for partial distribution be and the same is hereby denied."

Prior to the amendments to sections 1401 and 1402 of the Civil Code in 1923, the succession of community property upon the death of the husband was governed by section 1402 of said Code, which read as follows:

"Upon the death of the husband, one-half of the community property goes to the surviving wife, and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband, and in the absence of such disposition, goes to his descendants, equally, if such descendants are in the same degree of kindred to the decedent; otherwise, according to the right of representation; and in the absence of both such disposition and such descendants, is subject to distribution in the same manner as the separate property of the husband. In case of the dissolution of the community by the death of the husband, the entire community property is equally subject to his debts, the family allowance, and the charges and expenses of administration."

In 1923 said sections were amended (St. 1923, p. 29), and as amended section 1401 regulated, or attempted to regulate, the succession to community property upon the death of either the husband or wife. Upon this appeal we are not particularly concerned with section 1402 as amended in 1923. After its amendment in 1923, said section 1401 read as follows:

"Upon the death of either husband or wife, one half of the community property belongs to the surviving spouse; the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the decedent, and in the absence thereof goes to the surviving spouse, subject to the provisions of section one thousand four hundred two of this Code."

The trial court was evidently of the opinion that section 1401 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1923, and as in force at the death of said intestate, controlled the disposition and distribution of the community property, and held, according to the terms of said section, that upon the death of said Grattan D. Phillips without leaving any will the whole thereof descended to his surviving wife, the respondent herein—one half thereof by virtue of her interest in the community property and of her survival of her husband, and the remaining half thereof due to the fact that the said deceased made no testamentary disposition of said remaining half.

[1, 2] It is clear that said section 1401, as amended in 1923, in so far as it provides that the wife in case of the death of her husband intestate shall inherit the half of the community property which was subject to his testamentary disposition, is a statute of descent and succession, or a rule of inheritance. It is also equally clear that the law of inheritance in force and effect at the date of the acquisition of property does not determine the right to inherit it upon the death of the owner, but that the law in force at the date of the death of the owner of the property determines who shall inherit it upon his death. Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179; Johnston v. S. F. Savings Union, 75 Cal. 134, 16 P. 753, 7 Am. St. Rep. 129; Sharp v. Loupe, 120 Cal. 89, 52 P. 134, 586; Estate of Packer, 125 Cal. 396, 58 P. 59, 73 Am. St. Rep. 58; Estate of Porter, 129 Cal. 86, 61 P. 659, 79 Am. St. Rep. 78; Estate of Benvenuto, 183 Cal. 382, 191 P. 678.

In view of this well-established rule as applied to said section 1401 of the Civil Code in force and effect at the date of the death of Grattan D. Phillips, deceased, and the facts of this case, there can be no question but that the entire community property upon his death descended to his surviving wife, the respondent herein, to the exclusion of his children or other descendants.

Appellant, however, contends that section

1401, as amended in 1923, and no portion thereof, can be given any retroactive effect which would exclude the children from sharing in community property left by their father to the same extent that they would have shared therein under the law in force prior to the amendment of said section in 1923. Appellant bases this claim upon the assumption that that portion of section 1401, as amended in 1923, which purports to give to the wife the right to make testamentary disposition of one-half of the community property upon her death during the lifetime of her husband, is unconstitutional and void if construed to apply to community property acquired prior to the effective date of the amendment to said section 1401 in 1923, and that this provision of said section is so interwoven with the other parts thereof that the section as a whole is either unconstitutional or cannot be given any retroactive effect so as to affect any property acquired prior to the adoption of said amendment.

[3, 4] We have held in a recent decision (McKay v. Lauriston [S. F. 12691] 263 P. 1013, filed January 10, 1928) that the provision in said section 1401, as amended in 1923, giving the wife the right to make testamentary disposition of one-half of the community property upon her death during the lifetime of her husband, has no retroactive effect and has no application to community property acquired prior to the effective date of said amendment. In our opinion, however, this provision of the section is not unconstitutional. But whether unconstitutional or merely inapplicable to prior acquired community property, we are unable to agree with appellant that any defect or imperfection to which it may be subject in any way affects the validity or immediate effectiveness of the other provisions of said section which provide for the descent of the husband's one-half of the community property in the event of his failure to make a testamentary disposition thereof.

Under the law as it stood prior to the amendments of 1923, the community property upon the death of the wife belonged to the husband entirely; upon the death of the husband one half thereof went to the surviving wife, and in the absence of testamentary disposition by the husband the remaining half went to his descendants. As amended in 1923, one-half of the community property upon the death of the wife belongs to the husband and the remaining one-half, in the absence of testamentary disposition by the wife, goes to the husband, also; upon the death of the husband, one-half thereof belongs to the wife, and the remaining one-half, in the absence of testamentary disposition, goes to the wife also. It was evidently the purpose and intent of the amendment of 1923 to extend the interest of the wife in the community property beyond that possessed by her prior to said amendment. We have seen, however, that that portion of section 1401, as amended in 1923, which purports to give to the wife the right to make testamentary disposition of one-half of the community property during the lifetime of the husband, has no retroactive force or effect and cannot and does not apply to community property acquired by the spouses prior to the enactment of said amendment in 1923. This provision of the section, however, is entirely distinct and severable from that portion of the section which deals with the husband's interest in the community property. The amendment in 1923, in so far as it deals with his interest, simply and solely provides that upon his death the remaining one-half of the community property, after the wife had taken the half thereof to which she was entitled both before and after said amendment, should, in the absence of a will by the husband which he was authorized to make by the law as it stood both before and after said amendment, go to the surviving wife instead of to his descendants as provided by section 1402 prior to its amendment in 1923. Let us assume that the attempt of the Legislature to give to the wife the right to make testamentary disposition of one-half of the community property had failed entirely. Is that any reason to hold or believe that the Legislature, had it known of such invalidity, would not have enacted that provision or the amended section by which the wife would become the owner of the whole of the community property upon the husband dying intestate? Surely not. The fact that the legislative intent in the enactment of each of the two provisions was to enlarge the interest of the wife in the community property is a strong, if not a conclusive, indication that it would have enacted the provision giving to the wife the entire community property upon the husband dying intestate, even had it known that the provision giving to the wife upon her death during the lifetime of her husband the right to make testamentary disposition of one-half of the community property was invalid.

In fact, the invalidity of that portion of this amended section (assuming for the sake of argument that any portion is invalid) which sought to give the wife testamentary disposition over one-half of the community property instead of furnishing a reason why the Legislature would not have enacted the other portion of said section giving to the wife all the community property upon the death of her husband intestate would, in our opinion, have had a favorable rather than an adverse effect upon such contemplated legislation. The intent of the Legislature having been to extend the interest of the wife over the community property by the adoption of an amendment to the existing law whereby two new rights were sought to be conferred upon her, the invalidity of such enactment providing for one of said rights, if known to the Legislature, would have served as an additional incentive and reason why the other should be enacted into law for the wife's benefit and protection. While it is true that these two enactments are set forth in the same section of the Code and are interwoven with each other in the phraseology thereof, yet the purpose of each is plain and clear, and the one is as distinct and severable from the other as if they had been set forth in two separate sections of the Code. To hold otherwise would be to give effect to form rather than substance, and would be to construe the section according to its letter rather than its just and plain intent and purpose. "A law which is unconstitutional in part only is not to be held wholly void, unless the invalid portion is so important to the general plan and operation of the law in its entirety as to reasonably lead to the conclusion that the law would not have been adopted if the Legislature had perceived the invalidity of the part so held to be unconstitutional. If the law is separable, so that the general object can be attained without aid from the part that is void, the other parts of the law will be upheld. Ex parte Frazer, 54 Cal. 94; People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 105 [21 P. 423]; People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 496 [22 P. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 66]. 'If an independent provision, not in its nature and connections essential to the law, be unconstitutional, it may be treated as a nullity, leaving the rest of the enactment to stand as valid.' McGowan v. McDonald, 111 Cal. 65 [43 P. 418, 52 Am. St. Rep. 149]. Such invalid provisions 'will not vitiate the whole act, unless they enter so entirely into the scope and design of the law that it would be impossible to maintain it without such obnoxious provisions.' People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 103; People v. Burbank, 12 Cal. 393; Mills v. Sargent, 36 Cal. 382." Ex parte Gerino, 143 Cal. 412, 420, 77 P. 166, 169 (66 L. R. A. 249).

We do not wish to be understood by anything that we have said in this opinion as questioning the constitutionality of that portion of said section 1401, as amended in 1923, which gives to the wife the right to dispose of by will one-half the community property. As already stated, in our opinion, that portion of said section has not, nor was it intended to have, any retroactive force or effect. As applying to community property acquired after the adoption of said amendment it is, in our opinion, a valid and binding legislative enactment. But the mere fact that it does not apply to community property acquired prior to its enactment is no legal or valid ground for holding that the remaining provision of the section dealing with the descent of the husband's half of the community property, is inapplicable to all community property of which a husband may die seized after the effective date of said amendment, irrespective of whether the property in question was acquired before or after said date.

[5] A further attack upon the constitutionality of said section 1401, as amended in 1923, is made by appellant based upon the claim that the title to the act amending sections 1401 and 1402 of the Civil Code in 1923 is defective and does not meet the requirements of the Constitution providing that "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title." Article 4, § 24, of the state Constitution. The title of the act reads as follows:

"An act to amend sections one thousand four hundred one and one thousand four hundred two of the Civil Code, relating to the distribution of community property on death of husband or wife."

Appellant concedes that if the title had read "An act to amend sections one thousand four hundred one and one thousand four hundred two of the Civil Code," it would have been a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Constitution, but that by the inclusion of the additional words found therein the title was made obnoxious to the mandate of the Constitution. Appellant's particular criticism of the title of the act is directed to the use of the words "relating to the distribution" therein, the claim being made that the subject of the act embraces much more than the mere distribution of community property in that it empowers the wife to dispose by will of her half of the community property and makes a radical change in the succession to community property left by the husband dying intestate. The original sections of the Code which the act sought to amend, among other things, provided for the descent of the community property of the husband upon his death without leaving a will. The title of the act refers to and identifies these two sections of the Code and discloses that the purpose of the act is to amend these sections. This, in itself, would be sufficient to inform any one reading the title that it was proposed in the body of the act to change or amend one or all the provisions of these sections. The fact that the words "relating to the distribution of community property on death of husband or wife" were also contained in the title, and might also be read, would not deceive any one into the belief that it might not be the intent of the amendment to change the order of descent of the community property of a husband dying intestate. In fact, it appears to us that upon reading said title one of the first things that would suggest itself to the reader would be the possibility that a change in the order of descent of community property of the husband might be contemplated by the passage of the act. The title therefore, in our opinion, was sufficient, as it disclosed the general nature or character of the legislation proposed to be enacted. Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 229, 24 P. 383. Speaking of what was necessary to be expressed in the title of an act in order to comply with the constitutional requirements, this court in a recent decision said:

"All that is required to be contained therein in order to meet the constitutional requirements is a reasonably intelligent reference to the subject to which the legislation is to be addressed." O. T. Johnson Corp. v. City of Los Angeles, 198 Cal. 308, 323, 245 P. 164, 171.

[6] Appellant's counsel, in his closing brief, refers to the fact that the amendments to sections 1401 and 1402, enacted in 1923, were similar to if not identical with those adopted by the Legislature of 1919 and later defeated by a vote of the people upon a submission to them under the terms of a referendum election. He further characterizes these amendments as "a mess of legislation" designed to deprive children of their just inheritance, "and a scheme of distribution and procedure is provided that we need not further criticize." He closes his appeal to this court expressing confidence and "hope that sections 1401 and 1402 will menace the people of this state no longer." In answer to these aspersions of counsel against the amendments to the community property law enacted in 1923, we have only to call attention to the fact that these sections of the Code have been given approval by the lawmaking power of this state, whose exclusive jurisdiction it is to determine the policy of laws which are to govern the people of the state subject only to those limitations contained in our Constitution. In so far as appellant's rights are involved we are of the opinion that all constitutional requirements have been met in the enactment of these sections of the Civil Code, and that they were not "foisted upon us by an invalid title."

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MARPLE et al. v. MANSPEAKER.
(Civ. 4875.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 27, 1928.

1. Negligence ☞136(22)—Evidence held insufficient for jury as not supporting allegations that patron's injuries were sustained through defect in stairway or defendant's negligence.

In action for injuries by fall down cafeteria stairway, plaintiffs' evidence held insufficient for jury as not supporting allegations of their pleadings that wet materials dropped to steps from balustrade, which defendant's servant was cleaning, or that injuries were sustained through defect in stairway or defendant's negligence.

2. Negligence ☞121(3)—Res ipsa loquitur maxim held inapplicable to patron's injuries by falling down stairway.

Maxim res ipsa loquitur held inapplicable in action for injuries to cafeteria patron falling down stairway leading to basement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Maud Marple and husband against C. O. Manspeaker. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joe Crider, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in favor of the defendant upon the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to produce sufficient evidence to sustain the allegations of their complaint.

The plaintiffs alleged, and it is admitted: That the defendant was the owner of and conducted a cafeteria on Third street, in the city of Los Angeles; that inside the restaurant, and to the right of the entrance, a stairway descended a few steps to a landing and turned, and that other steps led to the basement, where defendant maintained a restroom and lavatory; that the steps consisted of marble, and that a brass handrail, attached to the side wall of the stairway, was provided for patrons' guidance in descending and ascending the stairway; that the plaintiff Maud Marple, accompanied by her mother and daughter, entered the defendant's place of business, and was proceeding down said stairway, when she fell near the landing at the turn of the stairs and was injured, whereupon she instituted this action of damages. That the defendant by his servant or employee "was engaged in cleaning the brass balustrades above the west or left side of the second flight of stairs in said stairway and had negligently dropped certain wet cleaning materials used in cleaning the balustrades upon the said handrail attached * * * and upon the step directly below the same near the foot of said second flight of stairs, thereby causing the said step to become slippery. * * * That when the said plaintiff Maud Marple in so descending the said stairs as aforesaid discovered the said cleaning materials upon the said handrail she was thereby caused to and did let go of said handrail in order to avoid soiling her glove, * * * and stepped upon said slippery step, not knowing of the slippery condition thereof, and by reason thereof and of her having to let go of said handrail (her attention being diverted from the descent of said stairs by reason of the condition of the said handrail as above set forth), all so caused by the negligence and carelessness of the defendant as aforesaid, her foot slipped and she thereby lost her balance and her footing and fell down said stairway and sustained the injuries" described in the amended complaint.

[1] The only evidence adduced by the plaintiffs in their attempt to sustain the allegations of their pleadings indicates that Mrs. Marple had proceeded down certain marble stairs which she had frequently descended for a period of four years or more, until at a point near the second landing, at their turn, when her aunt, who preceded her, called attention to some foreign substance on the handrail by which they both were guiding themselves, whereupon Mrs. Marple relinquished her hold on the rail, looked upward, lost her footing, and fell. We quote the most important portions of the plaintiffs' evidence in this regard:

"We started down the stairway, and we got part of the way down, almost to the second landing, * * * to the platform where we made the turn to go downstairs, * * * I let go of the railing on what my aunt said. * * * I felt just as though I had slipped on a banana peeling, or something, and my feet went from under me; I fell on the landing. * * *

"Q. Did you observe anything on the handrail? A. No, sir; not until my aunt said. * * * I let go of the railing, and as I did so I observed this cleaning material on my gloves; a Jap was cleaning the railing up at the top; * * * did not observe anything on the steps, nor that the stairway was slippery. * * *

"Q. Now, I will ask you, how did you come to notice that the material was on it [the handrail]? A. Because my aunt spoke to me."

During cross-examination, Mrs. Marple further testified:

"Just before this accident happened, I naturally looked to see what was causing the dirt, and saw the Jap; the dirt was more like a paste, kind of gray; I don't know how much there was, my aunt had rubbed her hand over it before I got my hand on it; it had kind of stuck along the railing. * * * Just as quick as I could look at my hand and glance up and take a step, I fell; there was quite a lot of it on the rail. * * * When my aunt told me it was on the rail, I looked up to see where the dirt was coming from; I did not feel any of it coming down."

Mrs. Dilts, the aunt, in testifying for the plaintiffs, said:

"I turned around to her, and she just slipped and fell and went over on her side with her leg under her. * * *

"Q. You did not examine the floor there after the accident? A. No, sir; I did not.

"Q. And before you went away, there, you didn't examine it at all? A. No, sir; I did not."

[2] We cannot say as a matter of law that the trial court erred in concluding that the plaintiffs had failed to produce evidence to support the material allegations of their pleadings. After an exhaustive search of the entire record we are unable to discover any testimony tending to sustain the averments that wet materials dropped from the balustrade to the steps upon which Mrs. Marple fell, or that she received her injuries through any defect in the stairway, or as a result of carelessness or negligence upon the part of the defendant, his agent or servant. There is no showing that the steps were wet or unsafe in any other respect. The circumstances are not such as to warrant the application of the maxim res ipsa loquitur, and without it there is no basis for the belief that any negligence of the defendant contributed to the injury of the plaintiff Maud Marple. In this regard the instant case may be fairly classed with White v. Spreckels, 10 Cal. App. 287, 101 P. 920, and Johnson v. So. Cal. Edison Co., 27 Cal. App. 425, 150 P. 656. In the case of Sharpless v. Pantages, 178 Cal. 122, 124, 172 P. 384, relied upon by appellants, testimony was introduced which established that the plaintiff slipped because of the looseness of carpets maintained by the defendant, and this was said to be the cause of the plaintiff's fall and injury. In this there was evidence of negligence other than the mere fact of the fall, and hence the case differs from the one at bar.

The judgment is affirmed.

WINTERBURN v. SHERRIFF et al.★
(Civ. 4849.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 25, 1928.

1. Evidence ⚡462—Oral evidence held admissible to show stock certificates indorsed in blank were delivered contingently and belonged to plaintiff, indorser.

In an action to recover stock certificates which plaintiff had indorsed in blank and given to another, since deceased, oral evidence held admissible to show that the certificates were delivered to such person, since deceased, contingently, so that latter might use them in effecting a settlement with his wife, but that such settlement was not effected and such certificate still belonged to the plaintiff, indorser, though shortly before his death the deceased had had the blanks filled in, and had given the certificates to defendant.

2. Corporations ⚡138—In action to secure cancellation of stock certificates and issuance of new certificates plaintiff's failure to plead that prior blank transfer was for particular purpose held not to preclude his introducing oral evidence thereon.

In action to secure cancellation of, and issuance of new certificates for, certain stock certificates indorsed in blank and given to a person, since deceased, allegedly for a particular purpose, and not as an outright transfer of property therein, plaintiff's failure to plead that such assignment was a contingent one, for a particular purpose, and not an outright transfer, held not to preclude his introducing oral evidence thereon, there being no question of fraud involved and plaintiff not seeking to establish a trust.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Elmer E. Winterburn against Carrie V. Sherriff and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert M. Clarke and Henry L. Knoop, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This action was brought for the purpose of securing the cancellation of certain certificates of stock evidencing shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation, Penn Investment Company, and the issuance of a new certificate on the ground that the certificates were wrongfully withheld by the defendant and appellant Carrie V. Sherriff. For a more complete statement of the nature of the action, reference may be had to an opinion on a former appeal in this same cause in 61 Cal. App. 531, 215 P. 406. Subsequent to that decision the case was tried, resulting in a judgment that the 7 certificates of stock, representing 53 shares, and being all of the shares mentioned in the complaint, should be canceled, and directing the defendant corporation upon tender to it of its costs to issue a new certificate for 53 shares. The appeal is from the judgment.

[1] On January 4, 1921, W. J. Sherriff, who was the uncle of plaintiff and the brother-in-law of appellant, transferred to the plaintiff the shares of stock in question, apparently for a valuable consideration. In March of the same year, plaintiff redelivered the certificates, assigned by him in blank, to W. J. Sherriff, by whom they were retained until two days before his death in July, 1921, when, being advised of the seriousness of his illness, he delivered them to the appellant Carrie V. Sherriff. Before delivery the attending physician, at the direction of Mr. Sherriff, filled in the name of appellant in the blank assignment on all except one certificate for 10 shares, which by apparent oversight was left general. Over the consistent and strenuous objections of appellant's counsel, the plaintiff was permitted to introduce testimony to the effect that the delivery of the certificates to W. J. Sherriff by plaintiff was upon the oral understanding between the plaintiff and his counsel that they were to be used by the latter in effecting a settlement with his wife, and if not used for that purpose were to be returned. It was further testified that the certificates of stock were never used for that purpose. It is the reception of testimony covering the oral agreement under which the stock was delivered to W. J. Sherriff of which appellant complains and which she urges as a ground for a reversal of the judgment, contending in support thereof that appellant's chain of title was complete; that plaintiff could not introduce testimony to vary the terms of the assignments by him and the delivery to W. J. Sherriff, contracts complete in themselves; that the testimony should have been excluded because the plaintiff having failed to plead that he intended the assignments for a limited purpose is precluded from proving such purpose; and lastly, that plaintiff made a gift to W. J. Sherriff which was complete and irrevocable.

It will be observed at the outset of the discussion that appellant was not a purchaser for a valuable consideration, which circumstance, if it were present, might seriously alter the entire situation. Undoubtedly the delivery to appellant of the certificates clothed her with the external indicia of title as counsel asserts, and undoubtedly had she been an innocent third party parting with value she would have been protected under the authority of such cases as Fowles v. National Bank of California, 167 Cal. 653, 140 P. 271, but such rule is far different from saying that he who assigns a stock certificate in blank and delivers it to another shall not be permitted to show the real purpose of the delivery. In truth, the authorities relied upon by appellant (Fowles v. National Bank of California, supra, and Bumiller v. Bumiller, 179 Cal. 119, 175 P. 897) recognize the right of the true owner to establish by competent testimony other than the contents of the assignment and in explanation thereof, the fact of ownership. Even though the insertion of appellant's name in the general and blank assignment might under different circumstances alter the rule, it can make no difference in this action where the foundation of her claim is made to rest upon the title with which W. J. Sherriff was vested by the assignments in blank. Or, to phrase it in other words, the question here is concluded by the answer to the question, Could the plaintiff have maintained the action and introduced the testimony, so far at least as the first objection is concerned, against W. J. Sherriff? This answer must be in the affirmative. As a further indication of the soundness of this rule, see Barstow v. Savage M. Co., 64 Cal. 388, 1 P. 349, 49 Am. Rep. 705, Sayward v. Houghton, 119 Cal. 545, 51 P. 853, and Popp v. Exchange Bank, 189 Cal. 296, 208 P. 113.

The answer to this first objection constitutes also the answer to the second; namely, that the plaintiff could not introduce testimony to vary the terms of the general assignments followed by delivery of the certificates to W. J. Sherriff on the ground that such assignments, followed by such delivery, constitute contracts complete in themselves.

[2] We are next confronted by the question of whether the failure of the plaintiff to plead that he intended the assignments for a particular purpose should have precluded him from introducing the testimony. The ultimate fact in issue was the ownership of the certificates of stock and whether they were being wrongfully withheld. There was no question of fraud involved in the case. Neither did plaintiff seek to establish a trust. Ownership of the certificates was to vest in W. J. Sherriff upon the happening of a certain condition, to wit, the consummation of a settlement with his wife, and he was clothed with the external indicia of ownership to assist him in bringing about the condition. We see no real differences in this situation and one where the assignment might have been made for the purpose of giving to another collateral security for a debt. Could it be said in the latter event and after payment of the debt a pleading of the ultimate fact of ownership and wrongful withholding without setting up the fact of the pledge would have precluded the plaintiff from showing the pledge? We think not, for the reason that the complaint is founded upon the theory that title never passed. So here, the complaint is founded upon the theory that title never passed to W. J. Sherriff. To this effect we find the authority of Jose Realty Co. v. Pavlicevich, 164 Cal. 613, 130 P. 15, holding, under an allegation of ownership and right of possession to real property, that the plaintiff was entitled to prove, for the purpose of controverting the recitals in a trustee's deed made pursuant to the provisions of a deed to the trustee with a power of sale, that there was in fact no default, and the recitals if permitted to stand uncontroverted would constitute a fraud upon him. That case and the authorities there noted sufficiently dispose of the question.

Appellant's last contention assumes a situation which does not exist. She asserts that a completed gift is irrevocable, and it must be admitted that her statement of the law is unassailable. However, as we have already observed, there was no completed gift to W. J. Sherriff and was to be none except and upon the sole condition that he effected a settlement with his wife, which condition was never consummated. Hence the argument is unavailing.

Judgment affirmed.

HORN v. YELLOW CAB CO. (Civ. 6014.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 27, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1004(1)—Only method of determining whether personal injury damages are excessive is by comparing amount awarded with evidence.

There is no absolute rule applicable to all cases of determining whether damages in personal injury case are excessive, but only method of determining question is by comparing the amount of damages awarded with the evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1004(1)—Only where damages are excessive as matter of law, or so grossly disproportionate to injury as to indicate passion, prejudice, or corruption, may reviewing court interfere.

Remedy for safeguarding against danger of excessive verdicts is to great extent committed to trial judge, and it is only in cases where the excess appears as a matter of law, or where recovery is so grossly disproportionate to compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice or at first blush raises presumption that it is the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than honest and sober judgment, that a reviewing court is justified in interfering.

3. Appeal and error ⇨930(1)—On appeal, evidence on which verdict is based must be accepted as true.

On appeal, evidence on which verdict is based must be accepted as true.

4. Damages ⇨130(3) — $6,622.35 for slip of sacroiliac joint, requiring three weeks' use of cast and subsequent use of brace with severe pain and nervous shock, from which plaintiff had not recovered, held not excessive.

Award of $6,622.35 for disability, pain, suffering, and inconvenience resulting from injury to plaintiff's back diagnosed as a slip of the sacroiliac joint, necessitating five weeks' hospital treatment, use of cast for three weeks, strapping of her body with tape for a week thereafter, and use of brace which she was still wearing at time of trial nine months later, accompanied by severe pain and nervous shock from which she would probably not recover for some time after the trial, with a predisposition to recurrence, in addition to $887.65 conceded as special damages for doctor's bills, hospitalization, and loss of employment, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Betty Horn against the Yellow Cab Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Roy A. Bronson and E. D. Bronson, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. A verdict of $7,500 damages was awarded respondent on account of personal injuries sustained by her as a result of the alleged negligence of appellant's employee, and from the judgment entered on said verdict this appeal has been taken.

The action was tried with two companion cases, and the appeals were consolidated, but on stipulation the appeals in the other two actions have been dismissed. The sole ground urged for reversal of the judgment in the present case is that the amount of damages awarded is excessive.

The three actions grew out of a collision occurring on the morning of July 5, 1924, at the corner of Post and Laguna streets, San Francisco, between a taxicab operated by the appellant company in which the three plaintiffs were riding as passengers for hire, and an automobile. The taxi was being driven at a speed approximating 30 miles an hour while traversing the intersection of the streets mentioned, and struck the rear end of an automobile running at right angles with the taxi. Following the impact the taxi traveled a distance of 90 feet, ran up on the sidewalk, and crashed into a building on the wrong side of the street, overturning the taxi, injuring the occupants thereof, and damaging the building. At the trial appellant admitted liability for the accident, and the issue before the jury was therefore confined to the question of the extent of the injuries suffered by the occupants of the taxi and the damages proximately resulting therefrom. It is conceded on this appeal that respondent sustained special damages in the sum of $877.65 on account of doctor's bills, hospitalization, and loss of employment, which leaves an assessment of $6,622.35 as compensation for the disability and the attendant pain, suffering, and inconvenience.

It appears from the testimony that besides sustaining a severe nervous shock respondent was thrown violently to the floor of the taxi, injuring her back; also, that her head struck against some object driving her teeth through her lip. The injury to her back instantly caused total disability, which was accompanied by intense pain. She was removed first to the emergency hospital and then to the home of a friend. The physician who was called diagnosed the injury to her back as a slip of the sacroiliac joint, but on account of the agonizing pains accompanying the injury was unable to treat the same fully at the home, and in a couple of days ordered respondent sent to the hospital, where, after placing her under the influence of an anæsthetic, he manipulated the joint into place and put the patient in a plaster cast extending from the hips up to the region of the ribs, which she wore for a period of three weeks; and during that time she was compelled to lie on her back. Following the removal of the cast her body was strapped with adhesive tape for about a week, and thereafter placed in a flexible brace reinforced with steel, which she was still wearing at the time of trial, some nine months after the accident. She remained in the hospital for five weeks, and was wholly unable to perform any kind of work until the following September, when she obtained employment as a stenographer; but on account of exhaustion and constant pain caused by the injury she was unable to work to full capacity, and in January, 1925, was compelled to give up the position.

Instantly upon receiving the injury and for a considerable period of time thereafter she suffered excruciating pain, it being necessary immediately following the accident to muffle her screams by placing a handkerchief in her mouth and a pillow over her head; and she was still suffering from pain at the time of trial, although it was much less severe.

As shown by the medical testimony, the sacroiliac joint is the point of junction of the sacrum, which is a portion of the lower spine, with two of the bones of the pelvis. It is not a movable joint, but consists of flat surfaces held together by ligaments. A slip of the segments of the sacroiliac joint is caused by a wrench or twist severe enough to tear the ligaments, and when this occurs there is necessarily a painful injury to a cluster of nerves centering in the sacral plexus, two of them being the sciatic nerves extending down the back of the thigh and which are eventually distributed in the lower leg and the foot. The immediate effect of such an injury is to prevent the patient from stooping or turning, or from lifting any weight or performing any kind of work calling into play the muscles attending the spine. The evidence shows that in respondent's case the sacroiliac ligaments were stretched and torn to the extent of causing internal hemorrhage.

The evidence further shows that at the time of trial respondent was still under the care of her physician; that she was suffering from nervous shock and from pain which extended from the back down the legs into the feet; that she was not able to sit long in any position nor to walk any considerable distance; and that as a result of the stretching and tearing of the sacroiliac ligaments there was a predisposition to another slip of the joint which could be caused by a strain. Although there was no direct evidence establishing the period of time respondent would continue to suffer pain and partial disability, it appears from the testimony given by the medical expert produced by appellant that "the so-called sacroiliac slip is one of the most severe conditions in this region that can possibly arise"; and other medical testimony was given to the effect that for some time at least, subsequent to the trial, respondent would be unable to follow her employment as stenographer on account of the pain which would be caused by sitting on the sciatic nerve, by twisting her body, lifting her leg, or arising from a chair.

[1, 2] In support of its contention that the amount of damages awarded is excessive, appellant cites a number of cases from this jurisdiction and others wherein judgments have been reversed on that ground; but, as frequently stated, a classification based upon figures of a particular verdict is of little value because of the innumerable and often indeterminate factors entering in question. 8 Cal. Jur. 839. No two cases exactly alike are to be found, and consequently no absolute rule is applicable to all cases. Morgan v. Southern Pacific Co., 95 Cal. 501, 30 P. 601. Therefore, the only method of determining whether a verdict is excessive is by comparing the amount of damages awarded thereby with the evidence (Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513); and where the element of past and future pain is involved it is always difficult to fix the amount of damages which should be allowed therefor (Pedrow v. Federoff, 77 Cal. App. 164, 247 P. 212). The remedy for safeguarding against the danger of excessive verdicts is necessarily, to a great extent, committed to the judge who presides at the trial, because it is presumed that he will carefully weigh the evidence himself and not allow a verdict to stand if he believes that excessive damages have been awarded by the jury under the influence of passion or prejudice; and it is only in cases where the excess appears as a matter of law, or where the recovery is so grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice or at first blush raises a presumption that it is the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than honest and sober judgment, that a reviewing court is justified in interfering. Bond v. United Railways, 159 Cal. 270, 113 P. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Pedrow v. Federoff, supra; 8 Cal. Jur. 834.

[3, 4] In view of the facts hereinabove narrated, which on appeal must be accepted as true, showing, as they do, that the major injury received by respondent was of a particularly distressing, disabling, and serious character, from which she would probably not fully recover for some time subsequent to the trial, and that there was a predisposition to recurrence, we think that the case is not one which may be fairly said to fall within the foregoing rule warranting interference on appeal.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

BROEDLOW v. LE GROS. (Civ. 6029.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 27, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 705(2)—Motor vehicle driver must anticipate presence of others having equal rights in street (Vehicle Act § 113).

Aside from mandatory provisions of Vehicle Act, § 113 (St. 1923, p. 553), as to driving at reasonable speed with due regard to traffic, surface, and width of highway, driver of motor vehicle is bound to anticipate presence on street of other persons having equal rights there.

2. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(6)—Negligence in operating automobile striking pedestrian crossing street between intersections held question of fact.

Whether driver was operating automobile in negligent manner at time of striking pedestrian crossing street between intersections, held fact question for trial court, in view of misty evening, slippery pavement, place of accident, street, approach of interurban train about to stop at station within block, driver's wavering course, and his failure to observe pedestrian until within 6 feet of her, give warning of sudden change of course, and have automobile under such control as to allow him to stop within range of his vision.

3. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(5)—Evidence held to support finding of negligent operation of automobile striking pedestrian crossing street between intersections.

Evidence, in action for death of pedestrian struck by automobile while attempting to cross street between intersections, held sufficient to support trial court's finding of negligent operation of automobile by defendant.

4. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 705(10)—In absence of regulation, pedestrian may cross street anywhere within block.

In absence of prohibitory state or municipal law, pedestrian has right to cross street at any point within block.

5. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(3)—Pedestrian struck by automobile is presumed to have exercised requisite care.

Presumption is that pedestrian, struck by automobile while crossing street between intersections, was at all times exercising requisite degree and amount of care for her own safety.

6. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(7)—Negligence of pedestrian, struck by automobile while crossing street between intersections, held question of fact.

Whether pedestrian, struck by automobile, was negligent in attempting to cross street between intersections on misty evening while pavement was wet, held question of fact for trial court.

7. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(3)—Burden of showing pedestrian, killed by automobile, was negligent, was on defendant.

In action for death of pedestrian, struck by automobile, while crossing street between intersections, burden of showing that decedent was negligent was on defendant.

8. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(5)—Testimony that pedestrian, struck by automobile, was looking toward interurban train, held not to establish negligence.

In action for death of pedestrian struck by automobile, defendant driver's and one of his passenger's, testimony that decedent was looking toward approaching interurban train, held not to show that she was negligent, in absence of evidence that she did not exercise requisite care to look in both directions for approaching vehicles immediately before impact; presumption being that she did.

9. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(5)—Testimony that pedestrian stepped back into path of automobile held not to establish contributory negligence.

In action for death of pedestrian struck by automobile, testimony of defendant driver and one of his passengers that decedent stepped backward into path of car held not to establish contributory negligence, in view of evidence that she saw approaching automobile, and, believing it would continue on straight course in front of her, stepped back to get out of way, and that defendant without warning suddenly swerved and collided with her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Mary Mesmer Broedlow against Ernest Le Gros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, and Reece Clark, of Calistoga, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. While operating an automobile in the "jitney" service along Seventh street in Oakland, appellant collided with a pedestrian named Lydia Mesmer, inflicting upon her injuries from which she soon afterwards died. As a result of the accident, the decedent's mother, being dependent upon her daughter's support, commenced this action for damages, alleging that her daughter's death was proximately caused by the negligent operation of appellant's automobile, and upon trial before the court sitting without a jury was given judgment for the sum of $2,500, from which judgment this appeal has been taken. The points urged for reversal are that the court erred in not granting a nonsuit, and that the findings upon the contested issues of appellant's negligence and the decedent's contributory negligence are not supported by the evidence.

The accident happened on December 4, 1924, about the hour of 7:20 p. m., on Seventh street, between Myrtle and Market streets, at a point about 60 feet east of the intersection of Seventh with Myrtle, while the decedent was attempting to cross Seventh street. The latter street runs east and west, is about 74 feet in width, and crosses Myrtle street at right angles. Along the center thereof are laid the double tracks of the Southern Pacific Company's interurban railroad; there being a space of about 10 feet between the two sets of tracks, and the rails of each set being approximately $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet apart. The west-bound electric trains are operated over the northerly tracks, and the east-bound trains over the southerly tracks.

At the time of the accident, the weather was misty, and the street was wet and slippery; it having rained earlier in the evening. Appellant was driving a seven-passenger automobile east along the south side of Seventh street, carrying four passengers; the gross weight of the machine with the passengers being approximately three tons. Shortly prior to the accident the decedent left her apartment, located on the north side of Seventh street within the block mentioned, where she lived with her mother, to go across the street to purchase some foodstuffs at a bakery, after which she started to recross the street, but, upon observing a west-bound train approaching from her right, stopped just before attempting to cross the southerly or east-bound tracks, and it was at or near this point where she was struck by appellant's automobile, which came upon her from the left side. She was picked up about 2 or 3 feet south of the most southerly rail and about 60 feet east of said intersection.

The evidence as to the exact movements of appellant's automobile immediately preceding the accident are somewhat conflicting, but the essential facts adduced at the trial supporting the contested findings are substantially as follows: As appellant entered the intersection of Seventh and Myrtle streets, he observed two pedestrians crossing Seventh street in a southerly direction, and, instead of passing in front of them by keeping well to the right and traveling along the south curb of Seventh street as he could have done, he turned to the left and passed behind them, which caused him to drive his automobile over onto and along the southerly or east-bound railroad track. While following this course, the west-bound train, with its headlight burning, approached from the opposite direction on the northerly tracks, and was about to stop at the Market street station, which was located on the north side of Seventh street in the middle of the block between Myrtle and Market streets. When the train drew closer to him, appellant, without giving any warning of his intention so to do, suddenly swerved to the right from the southerly tracks upon which he had been traveling, and, not observing decedent until his machine was within 6 feet of her, nor having his machine under sufficient control to stop within that distance, struck the decedent, knocking her down, and fracturing her skull.

Appellant testified at the trial to the effect that, after passing the two pedestrians above mentioned and before leaving the intersection, he gradually diverted his course to the right from the railroad track and regained the traveled portion of the south side of Seventh street, and that he had proceeded straight ahead for a short distance when suddenly the decedent appeared within the glare of his headlights, not 6 feet away; that she was then looking in the direction of, and backing away from, the approaching electric train, and in doing so stepped backward into the pathway of his machine; that at no time was he traveling more than 15 miles an hour; and that he brought his automobile to a stop within 4 or 5 feet from the point of the impact. Appellant had given his version of the accident under oath on two previous occasions, however, first, before the coroner's jury, and later in the form of a deposition, and the record shows that some of the statements there made varied with those made at the trial. But, aside from the question of the conflicting statements, appellant admitted in his previous testimony that, as he approached the point of the accident, the headlight from the electric train more or less affected his vision, but that nevertheless he was able to see ahead for a distance of about 40 feet; also that, after decedent came within his view, and in an effort to avoid striking her, he turned quickly to the south toward the gutter, but a Ford truck was standing alongside the gutter, and he was unable to divert his course farther to the south, and that the application of his brakes caused his machine to skid, the front wheels turning toward the north and the rear wheels toward the curb.

[1] Section 113 of the state Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) requires that any person driving a vehicle on the public highways of this state shall drive the same at a careful and prudent speed not greater than is reasonable and proper and having due regard to the traffic, surface, and width of the highway, and no person shall drive any vehicle upon a public highway at such a speed as to endanger life, limb, or property of any person; and, aside from these mandatory provisions of the statute, the driver of a motor vehicle is bound to anticipate the presence on the street of other persons having equal rights there with himself. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 179 P. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401. In this connection, the case of Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066, declares:

"The right of drivers of automobiles to use public highways is not superior to that of the humblest pedestrian and in the exercise of a common right to the use of the public highways all persons using the same must exert constant care and caution for the conservation of their correlative rights commensurate with the special hazard which is peculiar to and nowadays ever present in the use of public highways. Accordingly the driver of an automobile 'has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances and at all times he must be vigilant and must anticipate the presence of others. * * * The fact that he did not know that any one was on the highway is no excuse for conduct which would have amounted to recklessness if he had known that another vehicle or person was on the highway.' Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 159 [201 P. 471]. Even though the operator of an automobile may be rigidly within the law, 'he still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street and he must, in order to avoid the charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution and if the situation requires, he must slow up and stop.' Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125, 127."

[2, 3] In view of the numerous and peculiar circumstances attending the accident here involved, including the condition of the weather and the pavement, the location of the accident, and the fact of the approaching train which was about to stop at a station within the block, the wavering course appellant was following, his failure to observe the decedent until he was within 6 feet of her, also his omission to give any warning of his sudden change of course just before striking the decedent, and the fact that he did not have his automobile under such control as to allow him to stop within the range of his vision, we are of the opinion that the question of whether appellant was operating his automobile in a negligent manner was one of pure fact for the trial court to determine, and, it having found in the affirmative upon that issue, that the evidence hereinabove set forth is sufficient to support its finding. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., supra; Gross v. Burnside, 186 Cal. 467, 199 P. 780; Burgesser v. Bullock's, 190 Cal. 673, 214 P. 649; Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 46 Cal. App. 148, 189 P. 462; Park v. Orbison, 43 Cal. App. 74, 184 P. 428; Courviosier v. Burger, 61 Cal. App. 470, 215 P. 93; Simmons v. Stephens, 48 Cal. App. 351, 191 P. 978.

[4-9] Nor do we find sufficient legal grounds to justify an interference with the trial court's negative finding upon the question of contributory negligence. In the absence of a prohibitory state or municipal law, the decedent had the right to cross Seventh street at any point within the block (Hatzakorjian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027; Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 192 Cal. 621, 221 P. 376), and the presumption is that while doing so she was at all times exercising the requisite degree and amount of care for her own safety (Hatzakorjian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., supra; Hollowell v. Cameron, 186 Cal. 530, 199 P. 803). The question, therefore, of whether or not she was negligent in attempting to cross the street at the particular place and under the circumstances above related was also one of fact to be determined by the trial court, and the burden of showing that the decedent was negligent rested on appellant. As proof of such asserted negligence, appellant relies mainly upon the testimony given by himself and one of his passengers, to the effect that the decedent was looking in the direction of the approaching train and stepped backward into the pathway of the automobile. It is evident from this testimony, however, that the conduct of the decedent was under their observation for only a fraction of a second before the impact, and in the absence of any evidence showing that immediately prior thereto she did not exercise the requisite amount of care to look in both directions for approaching vehicles, the presumption of law is that she did (Hollowell v. Cameron, supra; Hatzakorjian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., supra); and, with reference to the claim that the decedent stepped backward, it may be reasonably inferred from all of the circumstances attending the accident that the decedent saw the approach of appellant's automobile as it was headed down the east-bound tracks, and, believing that it would continue on a straight course and pass in front of her, she receded so as to get out of the line of its travel, and that just as she was in the act of doing so appellant, without giving any warning indicating he was about to change his course, suddenly swerved to the south and collided with her, in which case she would not be guilty of contributory negligence. In this respect the case is essentially the same in principle as Potter v. Back Country Transp. Co., 33 Cal. App. 24, 164 P. 342, Park v. Orbison, supra, and Haines v. Fewkes, 190 Cal. 477, 213 P. 490, and in our opinion must be governed by the law declared therein.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUNTOON v. POWELL. (Civ. 5078.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Frauds, statute of §129(1)—Son's oral promise to pay mother's doctor bill, previously incurred, held within statute, notwithstanding part payment by son (Civ. Code, §§ 206, 1624, subd. 2).

In action by a physician to recover from a son of his former patient for services rendered defendant's mother at her request, held that the son's oral promise, made after services had been rendered, to pay the bill, was not enforceable even though he had paid a portion of it, since, in absence of a showing that, under Civ. Code, § 206, relative to children's responsibility for poor parents, such debt was the son's debt, the promise was within the statute of frauds, section 1624, subd. 2.

2. Paupers §37(1)—Son held not liable for mother's doctor bill, in absence of evidence showing mother was poor person unable to maintain herself by work (Civ. Code, § 206).

In action by a physician against a son of a former patient to recover payment for medical services rendered such parent at her request, held that son was not liable for payment thereof, under Civ. Code, § 206, imposing certain liabilities upon the children of poor persons, even though he had orally promised, after such services had been rendered, to pay, in the absence of evidence showing that the mother was a poor person unable to maintain herself by work.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, a physician, commenced the action against E. A. Powell and Mrs. M. E. Powell to recover the sum of $342.50, alleged to be due for services rendered to Mrs. M. E. Powell between July 13, 1921, and March 16, 1923. The defendant Mrs. M. E. Powell died before the trial and the action was dismissed as to her. The trial court found that the services were rendered at the special instance and request of Mrs. Powell, who was the mother of defendant E. A. Powell; that the entire bill amounted to $442.50; and that E. A. Powell paid $100 on account on September 15, 1921. E. A. Powell by oral promise agreed on September 1, 1921, to pay plaintiff for said services, most of which had been rendered before that date. After the trial plaintiff was permitted to file an amendment to the complaint in which it is alleged "that the defendant Mrs. M. E. Powell was at all the times herein mentioned a poor person, and unable to maintain herself by work." The court found this allegation, which was denied by E. A. Powell, to be true.

[1] It is the contention of plaintiff that section 206 of the Civil Code justifies the court in rendering judgment upon the oral promise of defendant, since that section provides that the "promise of an adult child * * * is binding." Defendant contends that the proper interpretation to be given to section 206 is that it supplies the element of consideration where such a promise is otherwise valid by being in writing, citing subdivision 2 of section 1624, wherein it is provided that "a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another" must be in writing. This question has already been passed upon by our Supreme Court in Flournoy v. Van Campen, 71 Cal. 14, 12 P. 257, a case in which the facts were almost exactly the same as in the case before us, the only difference being that defendant Powell paid the sum of $100 after making the oral promise. In that case the court said:

"His recovery in the court below against the defendant included compensation for services rendered by him as well before as after the contract with defendant, and is not susceptible, as the record is presented, of severance. Certainly the services rendered prior to the contract with defendant were rendered at the instance of defendant's mother, and for them she was bound to pay. That debt was her debt, and for it defendant could under the statute only bind himself in writing."

Section 206 was enacted in 1872 and has not been amended. The case of Flournoy v. Van Campen was decided 14 years later. In accordance with that decision, the judgment in the instant case must be reversed.

[2] Defendant maintains that, regardless of his contention that the promise must be in writing, plaintiff has not proved sufficient facts to enable him to rely upon section 206. That section is as follows:

"It is the duty of the father, the mother, and the children of any poor person who is unable to maintain himself by work, to maintain such person to the extent of their ability. The promise of an adult child to pay for necessities previously furnished to such parent is binding."

There is no evidence in the record to sustain the finding that the mother of defendant was a poor person who was unable to maintain herself by work. Plaintiff contends that:

"The nonpayment of the bill for medical services by Mrs. Powell and the payment on account thereof by, and the promises of appellant to pay the bill, affords an inference that Mrs. Powell was unable to pay it, and being unable to pay it, the inference follows that she was without the means to do so."

By drawing the most liberal inference from these facts it cannot be said that plaintiff has established that Mrs. Powell was a poor person unable to maintain herself by work.

The judgment is reversed.

MILLER v. MURPHY. (Civ. 5860.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California, Jan. 25, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇐207, 719(1)—Error cannot be predicated on prejudicial misconduct of opposing counsel not brought to attention of trial court, nor assigned as error.

Reversible error could not be predicated on alleged misconduct of opposing counsel in his opening statement to the jury, where the court's attention was not called to the statement, it was not assigned as error, nor was any request made to instruct the jury to disregard it, even though the statement was prejudicial.

2. Trial ⇐133(6)—Opposing counsel's improper statement held not ground for reversal, where court's language, though not direct, effectively instructed jury to disregard it.

Where the argument of opposing counsel was improper, and was objected to, the court's instruction to the jury which, in effect, told the jury to disregard such argument, held to preclude reversal for argument, even though court's instruction to disregard was in indirect language.

3. Trial ⇐260(9)—Refusing requested instructions in contract action held not error, where instructions given conveyed same meaning.

Where, in an action on a contract, certain instructions requested were refused, refusal thereof held not error, where instructions given had the same meaning, though couched in different language.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1002—Jury's finding of fact on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

The jury's finding of facts on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

5. Interest ⇐66—$600 verdict in suit for $500 held excessive by $100, where $100 had been allowed for interest, which was neither pleaded nor proved.

In action on contract to pay $500, wherein the jury returned a verdict in sum of $600, and plaintiff claimed that the additional $100 was a proper part of the verdict as being allowed for interest, held that verdict was excessive by such $100 allowed for interest, since there was neither pleading nor proof relative thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Joseph Miller against John Murphy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against him only, the defendant named appeals. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Cyril Appel and Ivores R. Dains, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant, John Murphy, from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $600. The complaint sets out two causes of action; the first count alleges an express contract to pay the sum of $500, the second alleges the reasonable value of services rendered in the same amount. The cause was tried by a jury. Upon the conclusion of the testimony for plaintiff the court granted a nonsuit as to the defendant Nora Murphy upon both counts of the complaint, and also granted a nonsuit as to the defendant, John Murphy, upon the second count. The trial thereupon proceeded against the last-named defendant upon the first cause of action, and judgment thereon was rendered as above stated.

Appellant's first claim of prejudicial error is based upon alleged misconduct on the part of counsel for plaintiff. In his opening statement to the jury counsel used the following language:

" * * * And Mr. Murphy still withheld paying Mr. Miller, and we filed suit for it, and Mr. Murphy, through his attorney, demanded a jury trial, which we waived, and that is why we are here to-day."

[1] The attention of the trial court was not called to this statement, nor was it assigned as error, nor any request made to instruct the jury to disregard it. Therefore, even though prejudicial, reversible error cannot be predicated thereon. People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 537, 117 P. 549.

During his argument to the jury, counsel for respondent stated:

"You know, one thing that strikes me all through this case is all the pitiable bluster about a little $500 case anyway. They filed suit, and came in here and demanded jury trial, took up all the time of twelve people here—Mr. Appel: Just one second. I take exception to that remark and assign the making of it as misconduct, and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. Mr. Hallinan: I think—The Court: That is a constitutional right, that any litigant may have a jury in a case of this character, and I don't believe you can criticize it without criticizing the Constitution. Therefore the court will have to prohibit you from taking up that proposition."

[2] Again, conceding this statement constituted error, while the court did not in express language instruct the jury to disregard it, the jury could not have otherwise understood the language of the court. Matts et ux. v. Borba, 4 Cal. Unrep. 691, 37 P. 159.

At another point in his argument the following colloquy took place:

"Mr. Hallinan: There isn't any question at all Mr. Murphy got a building through Mr. Miller's estimate, that he paid $18,000 for, and sold for approximately $27,000? Mr. Appel: I make an assignment of misconduct in reference to that matter, and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. The Court: No evidence as to the amount. Mr. Hallinan: Let me say this: We asked Mr. Murphy if he got $27,500 for his building, and he said 'No,'—refused to answer what he did get. Mr. Appel: One second, if the court please— The Court: Just a minute. Under the circumstances, I will have to follow the suggestion of counsel. Ladies and gentlemen, you are instructed to disregard the last statement of counsel in determining any issue in this case. Go ahead."

Under the above direction of the court the jury were instructed to disregard the remark, and therefore whatever prejudice may have resulted was removed. Lanigan v. Neely, 4 Cal. App. 760, 89 P. 441; People v. Ho Kim You, 24 Cal. App. 454, 141 P. 950; Tingley v. Times-Mirror, 151 Cal. 1, 89 P. 1097.

In its charge to the jury the court instructed them to carefully distinguish between the facts testified to by the witnesses and the statements made by the attorneys in their arguments as to what facts had been proved, and, if there was a variance, to consider only those facts testified to by the witnesses, and to remember that statements of counsel in their arguments were not evidence. The court further instructed the jury that in arriving at a verdict they must not permit themselves to be influenced in the slightest degree by sympathy, prejudice, or any emotion in favor of or against either party, but they must proceed solely upon the evidence introduced and the instructions of the court. We are therefore of the opinion that whatever error was committed was cured by the instructions of the court. Tingley v. Times-Mirror, supra.

It is further contended that the trial court erred in refusing to give three instructions offered by the defendant. The first instruction was to the effect that, if the defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $60 per week for his services, and the plaintiff received said sum, and the jury found there was no other or further contract between the parties respecting compensation, under such circumstances the defendant was entitled to a verdict. The second instruction was to the effect that, if they found that plaintiff was an employee of defendant, and if from all the evidence in the case they found that plaintiff had been compensated and paid all sums to which he (the plaintiff) was entitled for his services, the defendant was entitled to a verdict. The third and last instruction is that, if plaintiff was compensated by the receipt of his weekly salary for whatever services he performed or rendered for the defendant in erecting the building, then and in that event the defendant was entitled to a verdict. These instructions are the same in substance, and either one or all three might have been given by the trial court, as they contained a correct statement of the law, but the court did instruct the jury that:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff claims to be entitled to a bonus for any services which he performed for Murphy, then I instruct he cannot recover, because the only claim is for services performed."

"If you find that said services were performed by said plaintiff at the special instance and request of said defendant, and that defendant promised and agreed to pay therefor the sum of $500, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

[3] While couched in different language from the foregoing offered instructions, the jury could not have understood these instructions to mean other than their plain import indicated; namely, that plaintiff could not recover judgment except upon proof of the express contract alleged in his complaint. In the case of Cowan v. Abbott, 92 Cal. 100, 28 P. 213, cited by appellant, the refusal of the court to give an instruction similar to the ones here offered and refused was held reversible error. It was there held the refused instruction was necessary to enable the jury to pass upon the affirmative defense alleged in the answer. In the instant case, the instructions given by the court cover the issues, and were sufficient to advise the jury that plaintiff could only recover upon proof of the express contract alleged in his complaint.

[4] It is next assigned as error that the evidence fails to establish an express contract to pay $500. The evidence upon this question is conflicting. The plaintiff and his witness testified directly that said defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $500 for superintending and managing the erection of the building, and the testimony shows that such services were in fact performed by plaintiff, in addition to his work as a foreman carpenter, and for which he was paid $60 per week. This contract is denied by the defendant Murphy. It also appears in the evidence that the plaintiff used the terms "commission" and "bonus" as interchangeable, but it is plain from the evidence that the jury concluded the agreed sum of $500 was a commission and not a bonus. It was within the province of the jury to determine this conflict in the evidence, and, having resolved it in plaintiff's favor, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appellant's motion to strike out all plaintiff's evidence was properly denied; it being relevant to the allegations of the express contract alleged in the first count of the complaint.

[5] Plaintiff alleged a contract to pay the sum of $500. The jury returned a verdict in the sum of $600. In justification of the verdict, counsel for the respondent states that he called to the attention of the jury that, in addition to the sum of $500 principal, he was entitled to interest thereon, and that the additional $100 was awarded by the jury as interest on the principal sum. He cites in support of this theory Cassacia v. Phoenix Insurance Co., 28 Cal. 628. In the last-cited case the action was upon an insurance policy for the value of goods destroyed by fire. The contract of insurance contained a clause that the loss was to be paid 60 days after due notice and proof of the same was made by the assured. The fire was alleged to have occurred, the proofs made, and notice given, more than 60 days prior to the commencement of the suit. These allegations were sustained by the evidence. The Supreme Court held that under such circumstances the trial court was authorized to allow interest on the amount found due. In the case at bar there is neither pleading nor proof to sustain the claim of interest, and the verdict of the jury is therefore excessive in the sum of $100.

The judgment is therefore modified by striking therefrom the sum of $600, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, John Murphy, in the sum of $500; as thus modified the judgment will stand affirmed. Appellant to recover his costs on appeal.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued to have certain deeds, absolute in form, declared to be mortgages, for an accounting by defendants, for a conveyance of certain real property to plaintiffs and the quieting of their title thereto. The cause was tried before the court and resulted in a judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiffs have appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

For some time prior to May 3, 1926, the plaintiffs were the owners of the property described in the complaint subject to an indebtedness of $22,000, secured by a trust deed. This property was the community property of the plaintiffs, although the deed thereto was made in the name of Laura E. Borton as sole grantee. Her husband, C. F. Borton, acting as her attorney in fact, represented to the defendants that it was her separate estate, and upon these representations he induced the Hammond Lumber Company on May 3, 1916, to accept a deed executed in her name alone conveying the property to the company as security for an indebtedness which was then due the company from the plaintiffs. Prior to April 10, 1917, the plaintiffs became indebted to certain claimants in the sum of $9,302.39 for work, labor, and materials in the construction of the Borton Apartments upon other property, the title to which also stood in the name of Laura E.

Borton. These creditors were all represented by defendant C. E. Joslin, an attorney at law, and were at the time threatening to file liens upon the property upon which the Borton Apartments were being constructed. For the purpose of satisfying these creditors and saving the Borton Apartments from the cloud of liens which were about to be filed, the plaintiffs and defendant C. E. Joslin agreed that the plaintiffs should convey the property described in the complaint to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, subject to the incumbrances, in full satisfaction of the indebtedness owing the lien claimants, and that the latter, in consideration thereof, would release their claims on the building.

In accordance with this agreement deeds were executed by Laura E. Borton and the Hammond Lumber Company to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, absolute in form, and purporting to convey to the grantee clear title to said property. At the same time plaintiff C. F. Borton, again acting as attorney in fact for his wife and representing her to be the sole owner of the property, gave directions in writing to the trust company by which it was authorized to sell the property for not less than $35,000 and from the proceeds of the sale to pay all fees, charges, expenses, and incumbrances against the property, and the surplus, if any, to C. E. Joslin, who was designated as sole beneficiary. At the time of the execution of these documents an option was given to Laura E. Borton running to September 30, 1917, to purchase the property subject to all incumbrances of record for the sum of $10,200, which sum was estimated to be the total amount of the demands of the lien claimants, plus attorney's fees to C. F. Joslin and interest accruing during the period of the option. As a part of this transaction the lien claimants waived in writing all claims of lien upon the Borton Apartments, accepting the equity in the property described in the complaint in full payment of their claims, and a receipt in full payment and discharge of all claims was given to the plaintiffs by C. E. Joslin, who acted throughout the transaction as attorney for the lien claimants only. Up to the time of the expiration of the option plaintiffs endeavored to find a purchaser for the property, but were unsuccessful in this and on October 5, 1917, the trust company notified them in writing that their option had expired and that all their rights thereunder had ceased. Beyond their efforts to secure a purchaser during this period the plaintiffs have made no claim to any right or interest in the property conveyed; made no effort to pay any taxes, street assessments or other charges against the property; made no demand for an accounting of the rents and profits thereof until about the time this action was commenced on April 3, 1924.

During this period of seven years the defendants treated the transaction as an absolute conveyance of the premises. The lien claimants accepted it as a complete satisfaction of their claims. The plaintiffs treated it as a full settlement and as an accord and satisfaction of all these claims, and the defendant C. E. Joslin, as sole beneficiary, entered into possession of the premises at the time of the settlement and held possession under the conveyance, paying all taxes and street assessments levied thereon and exercising sole and exclusive ownership for himself and said creditors excepting as to a portion of the premises thereafter conveyed by the trust company at his direction, and received the monthly rentals coming from the premises and paid all costs of repairs and upkeep. Inasmuch as these rentals were not sufficient to pay these charges the expenses for the maintenance and upkeep of the property were apportioned among the various creditors according to their respective claims, but these became dissatisfied with the arrangement and sold their interests to the defendant C. E. Joslin from time to time until January, 1923, when he became the sole owner of all the interest of these claimants. The trial court found that the value of the property at the time of the conveyance in April, 1917, was $44,000, but that it could not have been sold at that time for more than $35,000. Upon this issue witnesses testified that its value at that time was from $30,000 to $35,000, but that it could not be sold for the latter amount. Upon the facts herein stated the trial court found that the transaction was intended to be an absolute conveyance of the property in full satisfaction of the claims due to the creditors and that it was accepted by all parties as such. It also found upon the special issues that the plaintiffs were estopped by their actions from maintaining this suit; that they were barred by the statute of limitations and by their laches, and that they had not for more than five years before the commencement of the action been the owners of the property or of any interest therein.

[1-5] On this appeal the appellants argue that the transaction was a contract between the parties which the trial court should have construed as one for the securing of the indebtedness only. In support of the argument cases are cited to the point that the construction of contracts is a question of law reviewable on appeal. The cases support the point to which they are cited, but are not applicable here because this is a case where the conclusion of law depends upon the finding of facts, which, in turn, is based upon extrinsic and conflicting evidence. The transaction upon its face purports to provide an absolute conveyance, and, of course, the presumption is that the instrument is what it purports to be. To overcome this presumption the burden was upon the appellants to show that something different was accomplished by the parties, and this, of course, could be shown only by extrinsic evidence which in cases of this kind "must be clear, unequivocal and convincing." Ahern v. McCarthy, 107 Cal. 382, 383, 40 P. 482; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 193, 58 P. 543; 17 Cal. Jur. 756, § 58. When, therefore, the parties rely upon evidence to overcome this presumption and such evidence is presented to the trial court, the finding of the trial court is, of course, conclusive on appeal unless there is no evidence in the record to support it. Lockhart v. McDougall Co., 190 Cal. 308, 310, 212 P. 1. Appellants do not seriously contend that there is no evidence in the record to support the finding of the trial court that the deed in controversy "was intended by the plaintiffs to be a conveyance in full payment and satisfaction of the claims of said creditors and that the said deed was accepted by said creditors as and for a full and complete payment and satisfaction of all their said claims"; or that "said deed was not taken as security for the payment of said claims or any of them, or that the title to said property should be taken * * * in trust for plaintiffs or either of them, or by way of mortgage in any way or manner whatsoever." Sufficient evidence is referred to in our statement of facts to sustain this finding upon the essential issue of the intention of the parties, and this forces the conclusion of law that the appellants have failed to overcome by clear and satisfactory evidence the presumption which arises from the face of the deed. This being so, it becomes unnecessary to analyze or further consider the cases cited by either party which on the one hand hold that under a particular state of facts the paper should have been construed to be a mortgage and on the other hand hold that under a different state of facts the paper there in consideration should have been construed to be an absolute conveyance. A review of the evidence in the record clearly discloses that all the parties to the transaction contemplated and intended that the deed should be an absolute conveyance of appellants' entire equity in the premises subject to an option to repurchase within a stated time; that this course was pursued because the property was overburdened with incumbrances at a time when the value had greatly depreciated because of the World War, and that because of these conditions none of the creditors and none of the respondents would have consented to any further mortgage upon the property or to any other disposition than an outright conveyance.

[6] But the outstanding fact is that the creditors treated the transaction as a full and complete payment and satisfaction of all their claims and that the appellants, for a period of seven years at least, treated it in the same way and made no attempt to pay these claims in any other manner or to assert any claim of ownership to the property. Mr. Pomeroy has said that in cases of this character: "The sure test and the essential requisite are the continued existence of a debt." Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 1196. The purpose of a mortgage being to secure payment of a debt, the full release of the indebtedness upon the delivery of the deed is persuasive evidence that the transaction was intended to be a transfer and not a mortgage. See Ahern v. McCarthy, 107 Cal. 383, 386, 40 P. 482. We find ample evidence to support the trial court's finding of facts, and upon these facts the only proper conclusion of law to have been drawn was that the deed was an absolute transfer of title and not a mortgage.

[7-9] The trial court found that appellants' cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and to avoid this obstacle the appellants now argue that the transaction resulted in the creation of a voluntary constructive trust whereby the trustee became obligated to sell the property, pay off all the existing incumbrances against it as well as the claims of the lien claimants, and to pay the proceeds, if any, to the appellants. This position is, of course, wholly inconsistent with the theory that the deed, absolute in form, was intended to be a mortgage. There is an equal inconsistency in appellants' argument on this branch of the case. A voluntary trust is an obligation arising out of a confidential relation and voluntarily accepted (section 2216, Civ. Code), while a constructive trust arises, regardless of intention, "when-ever by fraud or in breach of a fiduciary duty one uses the property of another to make a purchase in his own name." Lezinsky v. Mason Malt W. D. Co., 185 Cal. 240, 252, 196 P. 884, 890. But there is no evidence of any confidential relation between the parties—the appellants were dealing with the attorney for adverse claimants who was pressing these claims for collection; there is no proof of fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, or of any other wrongful act on the part of respondents by which any of them became an involuntary trustee for the benefit of appellants under section 2224, Civil Code; there was no evidence of any facts which would justify a conclusion that a trust of any character to which the appellants were beneficiaries was created by either written instrument or operation of law—the two ways by which alone a trust in real property can be created. Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 192, 58 P. 543.

[10, 11] In support of the judgment respondents point out that the trial court found that appellants' cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations and by their laches—that, if the transaction should be treated as a mortgage, the statute of limitations would apply, and, if it should be treated as a trust in favor of appellants, they are barred by their laches. Our attention is also directed to the finding that appellants are estopped by their conduct from asserting that the property was community. Appellants attack all of these findings, but it is not necessary to consider the rules of law involved because, upon the merits, respondents were entitled to the judgment.

Criticism is made of a number of rulings adverse to appellants on the admission of evidence. Many of the assignments of error are not accompanied by argument or citation of authority and none of the 38 assignments is claimed to have been prejudicial to appellants. We have examined the record with care and find that in each instance where the correctness of the ruling of the trial court is at all doubtful the evidence received or rejected was merely cumulative and the rulings criticized were harmless.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Witnesses $\hookrightarrow$ 63—Judgment setting aside defendant's marriage to prosecutrix not being final, prosecutrix could not testify against defendant in rape prosecution (Pen. Code, § 1322).

Where judgment setting aside defendant's marriage to prosecutrix was not final, it should not have been admitted in evidence in rape prosecution, and hence prosecutrix should not have been allowed to testify against defendant without his consent, under Pen. Code, § 1322.

2. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 406(1)—Extrajudicial statements and admissions were admissible to connect defendant with commission of crime of rape.

Extrajudicial statements and admissions were properly admissible for purpose of connecting defendant with commission of crime of rape.

3. Rape $\hookrightarrow$ 51(1)—Evidence held to support conviction of rape.

Evidence properly admitted, without testimony of prosecutrix, improperly admitted, held sufficient to support conviction for rape.

4. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 1186(4)—Permitting prosecutrix, whom defendant married, to testify against defendant in rape prosecution, where judgment setting aside marriage was not final, held not reversible error (Pen. Code, § 1322; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where defendant, charged with rape, married prosecutrix, and judgment setting aside marriage was not final, permitting prosecutrix to testify against defendant without his consent, in violation of Pen. Code, § 1322, held not reversible error, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where evidence properly admitted established defendant's guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

William Livingston was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Dep. Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Appellant was accused by an indictment filed by the grand jury of the crime of rape committed upon Jessie Peters, a girl of the age of 12 years. The trial jury returned a verdict of guilty with the recommendation that the accused be punished by imprisonment in the state prison. Appellant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied. The date of the offense as charged in the indictment was on or about August 27, 1926. The indictment was returned on October 13, 1927, and the trial conducted on October 31, 1927. Appellant and Jessie Peters were married at Goldfield, Nev., on February 27, 1927, her father and mother being witnesses to the ceremony and her father giving his consent to the marriage. The district attorney offered in evidence a judgment of the superior court of Kern county in an action entitled "Elva Peters v. William Livingston and Jessie Livingston, formerly Jessie Peters," dated October 3, 1927, and entered October 5, 1927, in which it was adjudged that the said marriage "be set aside and annulled." To the offer of this evidence defendant objected on the ground that the judgment was void because Jessie Peters, a necessary party and a minor, was not served with process or represented by counsel or a guardian therein and because the judgment was not final, the time for appeal not having elapsed. The objection was overruled and the judgment admitted in evidence. Thereupon Jessie Peters was permitted, over objection, to testify concerning her relations with appellant.

[1] Appellant now seeks a reversal of the judgment on the ground that Jessie Peters was his wife and therefore could not testify against him without his consent, citing section 1322 of the Penal Code, and People v. Curiale, 137 Cal. 534, 70 P. 468, 59 L. R. A. 588. The Attorney General does not answer this contention of appellant or seek in any way to justify the ruling of the court in permitting Jessie Peters to testify. The judgment setting aside the marriage not being final, it should not have been admitted in evidence. Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 546, 32 P. 589; Di Nola v. Allison, 143 Cal. 106, 76 P. 976, 65 L. R. A. 419, 101 Am. St. Rep. 84; Cook v. Ceas, 143 Cal. 221, 77 P. 65. It follows that Jessie Peters should not have been allowed to testify.

The Attorney General maintains that, even should it be conceded that the testimony of Jessie Peters was erroneously admitted, the other evidence was such that a reversal would not be justified in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. This contention must be upheld. The age of the girl was shown by her parents to be 12 years at the time of the offense. Dr. H. R. McCallister testified that about March, 1927, he examined Jessie and found her hymen broken and that she was then pregnant. He stated that the approximate time of her conception was about September 1, 1926. The witness Emery O. Peters, father of the complaining witness, testified that after appellant had been arrested on a charge of having raped his daughter, and while released on bail, he came to the Peters' home for the purpose of trying to make an "outside settlement." The witness stated that he told appellant that he had no outside settlement to make, that he did not care to talk the proposition over with him at all, and that he intended to let the thing stand as it was. Several weeks later appellant proposed marriage in order that the girl might have his name. On the following day Jessie Peters, accompanied by her mother and father, went with appellant to Las Vegas, Nev., and there attempted to procure a marriage license, but were unable to do so because of the girl's age. Thereupon they went to Goldfield and secured a marriage license. The said license was secured upon the misrepresentation of appellant that Jessie Peters was then 17 years old. They then went to a church and Jessie Peters and appellant were duly married. The witness further testified that it was distinctly understood between himself and appellant that appellant should not live with his daughter at all. Appellant told Mr. Peters that he would foot all the expenses of the trip to Nevada. The mother of Jessie Peters, Mrs. Elva Peters, testified that the family had been on intimate relations with appellant for years; that he had boarded with them and had had free access to the home; that on August 27, 1926, she was in the city of Turlock; that in the latter part of September, 1926, her daughter became ill, and when she told appellant of her daughter's illness he offered to bring her to a doctor in Bakersfield and have her examined; and that about January 15, 1927, Jessie was examined by Dr. McCallister. Mrs. Peters also testified that she had a conversation with appellant shortly before they left for Nevada in which she asked him how he could do such a thing and why he did it, and that he replied he did not know—that he could not tell her. The witness further stated that appellant came to their home after he had been released on bail and asked to be forgiven for what he had done. The witness further testified that on June 6, 1927, her daughter gave birth to a child. During the course of the examination of the witness Jessie Peters the following took place:

"Q. Now, was there any other occasion either before or after that in which this defendant had sexual intercourse with you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When?"

"Mr. Livingston: I will take all blame; I don't want her humiliated any more—"

"The Court: Mr. Livingston, you've got to keep quiet in court. Mr. Livingston: I am going to plead guilty, sir."

[2-4] No evidence was offered by appellant other than the showing of the Nevada marriage. The testimony above set forth stands uncontradicted. The corpus delicti was established by the testimony of Dr. McCallister and that of the parents of the child. The guilt of the defendant was shown by his statements made to Mr. and Mrs. Peters. It is well settled that extrajudicial statements and admissions are properly admissible for the purpose of connecting the defendant with the commission of the crime. People v. Selby, 198 Cal. 426, 245 P. 426; People v. Stone, 199 Cal. 621, 250 P. 659. The evidence properly admitted overwhelmingly establishes the guilt of the accused. The statements made by the defendant in open court are in themselves sufficient to convince that no injustice has been done in these proceedings. We are satisfied that the error complained of has not resulted in any miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. WREN et al. (Civ. 6136.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 25, 1928.

1. Trial $\S$ 395(2)—Finding that "material" allegations of complaint are true and that defendants' answers are insufficient held insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 632, 633).

In proceeding to compel officers of corporation to permit inspection of corporate books, finding that all material allegations of complaint are true and that answers of defendants do not state facts sufficient to constitute defense thereto was not compliance with Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 632, 633; insertion of word "material" making finding uncertain and insufficient to sustain judgment.

2. Trial $\S$ 395(2)—Definite and certain findings of fact must be made for appellate courts where required and involved (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 632, 633).

Where findings are required and involved, appellate courts are entitled to definite and certain findings of facts of case, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 632, 633.

3. Trial $\S$ 388(1)—Findings, unless waived, are mandatory on trial of questions of fact (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 632).

In trial involving questions of fact, findings, unless waived, are mandatory on trial of questions, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 632.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by E. L. Williams against Charles F. Wren, President, and another. From an order granting writ of mandate to permit inspection of certain books and the making of copies and memoranda therefrom, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Warren E. Libby, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Culbert L. Olson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELCH, Justice pro tem. This proceeding was commenced by way of a petition to compel the defendant officers of the Pickwick Corporation to permit the respondent to inspect the stock ledgers and stock certificate books of the corporation and to take copies and memoranda thereof. Issue was joined by answer of the appellants denying specifically the allegations of the petition and setting forth separate and further defenses to the petition for the writ of mandate. This appeal is from the order granting the writ and is upon the judgment roll and the reporter's transcript of the testimony.

A decision in the usual form was not made or filed in the proceeding by the court, but the court, in its order herein appealed from, found:

"That all of the material allegations of the complaint are true and that the answers of the defendants do not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense thereto."

[1-3] Appellants make the point here that this finding is not a compliance with sections 632 and 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention must be sustained. Appellate courts are entitled to definite and certain findings of the facts of the case where findings are required and involved. Indeed, findings, unless waived, are mandatory upon the trial of questions of fact. Section 632, Code Civ. Proc. A trial of questions of fact was had in this proceeding requiring findings to be made and filed. Black v. Board of Police Commissioners, 17 Cal. App. 313, 119 P. 674. "The system of express findings (sections 632 and 633, Code Civ. Proc.) which prevails in this state, requires a finding when there is a material issue." Taylor v. Taylor, 192 Cal. 71, 218 P. 760 (51 A. L. R. 1074).

It has been held by both the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal that the insertion of the word "material" in a general finding, such as is here under consideration, makes the finding uncertain, and insufficient to sustain the judgment. Turner v. Turner, 187 Cal. 632, 203 P. 109; McKannay v. McKannay, 68 Cal. App. 709, 230 P. 218. "The general omnibus finding 'that * * * all the material averments of the amended complaint [herein] are true' is insufficient for any purpose." Holt Mfg. Co. v. Collins, 154 Cal. 276, 97 P. 520.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

RICHARDSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
(Civ. 6038.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 26, 1928.

1. Negligence $\Leftrightarrow$ 122(1)—Presumption that injured person exercised ordinary care, arising where there is no evidence, may be destroyed by plaintiff's or defendant's testimony.

Where there is no evidence adduced concerning conduct of person under given conditions, presumption that he exercised ordinary care will arise, presumption being disputable, and where plaintiff presents case overwhelmingly destroying presumption, effect thereof is same as though presumption had been destroyed by testimony of defendant.

2. Street railroads $\Leftrightarrow$ 98(6)—Nonsuit held justified where pedestrian deliberately continued in path of train after warning by motorman making every effort to avoid accident.

In action to recover damages for death of pedestrian struck by defendant's interurban train, evidence showing that train was proceeding along right of way unobstructed to vision of decedent at the lawful and ordinary rate of speed, giving warning of its approach, that there was nothing in conduct of decedent to denote that he was in danger or not in full possession of his faculties, and that motorman used all diligence to avoid accident as soon as there arose slightest doubt as to decedent's intentions or possibility of accident, and that decedent without exercising care or caution deliberately continued in path of train, justified judgment of nonsuit.

3. Trial $\Leftrightarrow$ 139(1)—Negative testimony of witness as to hearing no warnings, without showing witness' opportunity to hear, held insufficient to make question for jury.

In action to recover damages for death of pedestrian struck by interurban train, negative testimony of witness that he heard no unusual sounds or warning held mere conclusion with reference to what was usual and what unusual, and did not contradict evidence of motorman that he sounded bell, and was insufficient to make case for jury where there was nothing to show witness' opportunity to have heard warning if given.

4. Street railroads $\Leftrightarrow$ 103(2)—Doctrine of last clear chance held inapplicable where pedestrian was not in danger and motorman used every opportunity to stop.

In action to recover damages for death of pedestrian struck by defendant's interurban train, evidence showing that decedent was never in any place of danger until he stepped on track and that as soon as decedent's situation was known and observed, or could be observed, motorman employed every means possible to stop train and avoid accident, held not to warrant application of doctrine of last clear chance.

5. Street railroads $\Leftrightarrow$ 93(4)—Motorman need not stop when seeing pedestrian leave sidewalk and approach tracks.

In action to recover damages for death of pedestrian struck by interurban train, motorman held not required to stop each time he observed pedestrian leave sidewalk and approach track.

6. Negligence $\Leftrightarrow$ 67—Persons must exercise some care for own protection.

Law requires each person to exercise some degree of care for his own protection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Jennie A. Richardson against the Southern Pacific Company and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Philip M. Carey and Frank O. Nebeker, both of Oakland, and F. G. Ostrander, of Merced, for appellant.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to recover damages on account of the death of plaintiff's husband alleged to have resulted from injuries sustained through the negligence of defendant, Southern Pacific Company. The complaint included as parties defendant others than said corporation, but the said remaining defendants were not served with summons, and the cause was tried as against defendant, Southern Pacific Company, alone.

At the close of plaintiff's case the trial court, on motion of defendant, ordered a nonsuit, and from the judgment entered pursuant to said order the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The record discloses the grounds of nonsuit to be that the evidence introduced by plaintiff affirmatively shows as a matter of law that deceased was guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the injuries complained of. No question is presented other than the one of contributory negligence. There is sufficient evidence of plaintiff's right to maintain the action as surviving spouse, and as to her right to recover damages should the facts warrant.

The decedent, James Richardson, was a carpenter by trade, and for about two or three months prior to the date of the accident had been working at a place to reach which from his home it was necessary to cross Bond street, in East Oakland, upon which the tracks of the railway service operated by defendant were laid. It was his custom to walk to work each morning. On the morning of August 6, 1923, Richardson, as usual, departed for his work, and before reaching his destination was struck by a street car and sustained injuries from which he died within a few hours. The only eyewitness to the accident whose testimony was produced was one J. W. August, motorman on the train involved, and the facts as further narrated here are necessarily taken from the testimony of this witness.

The Southern Pacific Company's trains run along Bond street from Fiftieth avenue to Seminary avenue, a distance of about two miles. The line runs along and upon Seventh street before it turns into Bond street. From Seventh to Bond street it turns northeasterly for about three-quarters of a mile and runs across some private rights of way. It runs through the city of Oakland and through a thickly built-up section. The rails at Bond street are flush with the surface. The nature of the car or cars in question may be classed as a street railway, with the qualification, however, that the cars do not stop at street intersections or on signal, but as per schedule receive and discharge passengers at fixed stations en route. The train involved herein consisted of five passenger cars equipped with air brakes. On the morning of August 26, 1923, the train was running on usual schedule and would have made the next stop at a point called Seminary station. The rate of speed at which the train was traveling was about 20 miles per hour. The train was proceeding easterly on Bond street. Owing to certain construction work in progress at another portion of the route, the train was traveling eastward on the north track instead of being on the south track as is the general custom. The day in question was bright and clear, and with reference particularly to the operator of the train and the decedent there was nothing in the locality that could obstruct the sight or vision of either. The train was running along in its accustomed right of way, and the decedent, Richardson, was proceeding to his work, and everything was apparently normal to this point. The testimony of the motorman in his own language now follows:

"I first saw Mr. Richardson as he was leaving the curb on the north side of Bond street. When I first saw him I was 150 feet west of him and I was traveling about 20 miles per hour. I doubt if he was walking over 2 miles per hour. He had a grip in his hand and was looking down towards the ground. He was walking as a man ordinarily walks and carries his head as he is walking. I could not see anything unusual in the droop of his head. I saw him all of the time from the time he left the curb until the train struck him. When he left the curb at Bond street he started in a diagonal southeasterly direction as though he intended going toward the station, which was a short distance southerly and easterly. At that time I gave a whistle to call his attention to the train's approach. I whistled immediately on seeing him. He did not heed the whistle, but continued along. When he was still 8 or 9 feet from the northerly track I applied the emergency brake and attempted to stop the train. I continued to blow the whistle and had my foot on the bell from the time I applied the emergency brakes until the time he was struck. The track at the point where the accident occurred is straight for a distance of approximately 1,000 feet, and from that distance up to the point of the accident the train would be in full view of any person standing on the curb as Mr. Richardson was. The stop that I made was the quickest that could be made with that train and with that equipment, and at the time the brakes were applied the man was fully 8 or 10 feet away from the tracks. I knew there were no signs there to warn the public that the train was being operated on the north track instead of the usual routing on the south track, and I knew also that there was no flagman or watchman there."

There were two other witnesses called by the plaintiff. One witness, a passenger on the train, testified that there was nothing unusual about the speed of the train; that the day was bright, clear and sunshiny; that he did not notice any sudden application of the brakes; and that there was no gong or whistle that he noticed and no violent stopping of the train. However, this witness testifies that he did note "the whistling which they always do when near to a station," and also that on this occasion the train stopped before it got to the station and west of the point where it usually stops. From the testimony of this witness it is obvious that whatever whistling he heard could not have been for the station stop inasmuch as the train did not reach the station. But, irrespective of the reason for the whistling, the fact is that the whistle was sounded before the accident, thus to some extent corroborating the testimony of the motorman. The remaining witness, who conducted a tailoring establishment on Bond street almost directly opposite the place of the accident, testified that his attention was drawn to the accident by hearing some women scream. He was then in the rear part of his shop. His testimony was that he heard no unusual whistling at the time of the accident or before. The testimony of this witness is negative in character. The testimony of the conductor to the effect that he did sound the whistle and bell is not contradicted by this witness inasmuch as he mentions nothing concerning the sounding of the bell, and his testimony is likewise consistent with the testimony of the passenger, who did hear whistling but thought it the usual signal for the station stop. It was on this state of the record that the nonsuit was ordered.

It is the contention of the appellant that the trial court was in error in granting the nonsuit, and the argument advanced is threefold.

Appellant urges that the evidence discloses negligence on the part of defendant, and that there is no sufficient showing of contributory negligence on the part of decedent to bar the action. Lastly, appellant urges that if it is determined that decedent was clearly guilty of contributory negligence, nevertheless, under the facts as shown, it is a case for the application of the doctrine of "last clear chance," and that upon the application of that rule the right of recovery is apparent. The argument of appellant goes only to the extent required on this appeal; that is to say, his argument is that if the evidence, viewed in its most favorable light, leaves the slightest uncertainty, then the question should have been submitted to the jury. Conceding this for the present, we do not go to the extent of holding that a reviewing court must go the length of distorting testimony from its natural meaning, or snatching at chance phrases appearing at intervals in the testimony. It is not the function of this court to make uncertainty from a record in itself clear and intelligible. Nor do we intend so to do.

[1] Appellant contends that the law of "stop, look, and listen" does not apply in this case for the reason that the "train in question here does not come within the class to which such law applies. However, it is conceded by appellant that decedent was still held to the exercise of ordinary care. Then, going further, he contends that the presumption of law to the effect that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns in and of itself is sufficient in the case to present such a conflict of fact as to demand the submission of the case to a jury. In support of this claim the following cases are cited: Fleenor v. Oregon S. L. R. R., 16 Idaho, 781, 102 P. 897; Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 P. 714; Drouillard v. Southern Pac. Co., 36 Cal. App. 447, 172 P. 405; Ross v. S. F. O. T. Railways, 47 Cal. App. 753, 191 P. 703; Walker v. Southern Pacific, 38 Cal. App. 379, 176 P. 175. A careful reading of these cases will disclose that this theory of appellant finds little support therein. True, detached portions of the opinions would seem to uphold in part the contention made, but in each case the language of the court seems to guard expressly against such an unqualified rule as is here contended for. The full effect of the rule announced in the cases cited is no more than to establish the doctrine that where there is no evidence adduced concerning the conduct of a person under given conditions the presumption that he exercised ordinary care will arise. At best the presumption is a disputable one; and where the plaintiff, as here, presents a case overwhelmingly destroying the presumption, the effect thereof is as controlling as it would be in a case where the presumption had been destroyed by testimony offered by the defendant. To adopt as a rule of practice that the presumption that the exercise of ordinary care always stands with the strength of independent evidence as against the proven facts, and thus produce in all cases a substantial conflict demanding the verdict of a jury would mean that in no case would the trial court be permitted to entertain a motion for a nonsuit. We are not prepared to announce such a rule.

[2, 3] From the facts of the case there can be but one conclusion. The train in question was proceeding in plain sight along a right of way unobstructed to the vision of decedent. It was proceeding at a lawful and ordinary rate of speed and giving warning of its approach. There was nothing in the position of decedent nor in his action to denote that he was in danger or that he was not in full possession of all of the ordinary faculties of sight and hearing. As soon as there arose the slightest doubt as to the intentions of the pedestrian or concerning the possibility of an accident the motorman used all diligence and care possible to avoid the same. Notwithstanding this the decedent, without the exercise of any care or caution, deliberately continued in his perilous course with the regrettable result noted. The testimony of the witness to the effect that he heard no unusual sounds of warning means nothing. While it is true that negative testimony of this character oftentimes is regarded as sufficiently positive to create a question for the jury, the rule requires that it go further than is presented here. There is not one word concerning the opportunity of this witness to have heard a warning, if given; nothing to show the state of his attention or the work, if any, in which he was engaged. It could hardly be argued that the declaration of a witness ten miles off to the effect that he heard no bell would be considered any evidence at all on the subject, though it would meet the demands of appellant here as to being sufficiently negative. Further, the testimony of the witness here that he heard no unusual whistling is inherently weak in two particulars. First, standing alone, it is a mere conclusion with reference to what was usual and what unusual; and, secondly, it does not in any sense contradict the evidence of the motorman as to the sounding of the bell or gong.

[4] There is nothing in the facts of the case to warrant any application of the last clear chance rule. The decedent was never in any place of danger until he stepped upon the track. Conceding, however, that he was approaching such a place and was unaware thereof, yet the facts show beyond controversy that as soon as such situation was known and as soon as such a situation was observed or could be observed, the motorman employed every means possible to stop the train and avoid the accident (Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 218 P. 36).

[5, 6] We have gone carefully over the entire record presented, and if the contention of appellant could be sustained it would result in but one thing, namely, a return to the horse-drawn street car. If it were incumbent upon the motorman of an interurban train to stop each time he saw a pedestrian leave the sidewalk and approach the tracks, then necessarily such trains as we are dealing with here would have to be abandoned. The courts have never been backward in holding railroads, street railways, or even automobile drivers, to a rigid rule of care. Always have the courts manifested a solicitude for the general safety and protection of the foot-passenger and others enjoying the right of travel along roads or highways used by trains and street railways. But the law likewise requires on the part of each person the exercise of some degree of care for his own protection.

In Klusman v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 190 Cal. 441, 213 P. 38, it is said:

"If the plaintiff knew that cars were operated on the middle track in both directions, she was bound in the exercise of ordinary care to look in both directions before stepping upon the track. If she did not know that cars were operated in both directions upon the middle track, she was negligent in assuming that cars were only operated in one direction, without taking the precaution to look in the other direction as well. From either point of view the conclusion of the trial court that she was guilty of negligence as a matter of law was correct."

In Schooley v. Fresno Traction Co., 56 Cal. App. 705, 206 P. 481, the court says:

"Surely, under the language of the cases * * * cited and under any rational system of law, defendant could not be charged with a duty to anticipate that anyone would suddenly step from a place of safety onto the car tracks in the middle of a block, directly in front of an approaching street car. We think such gross negligence on the part of a pedestrian will bar all right of recovery for any injuries which he may sustain."

In the case cited the court quotes from Driscoll v. Market St. Cable Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 553, 32 P. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203, as follows:

"While, therefore, the owners of these railroads are to be held to due care in the management of their lines, they, when exercising such care, are not responsible in damages to a person who, in a careless or reckless, or absent-minded way, walks suddenly in front of a moving car, and is injured before there is time to stop it. The person in charge of a car, with a clear track before him has a right to assume that people will not suddenly undertake to cross in front of it; otherwise he could not make any headway, and no street-car line could be successfully operated, either for the profit of the owner or the convenience of the public. And the general rule is, that where the negligence of the injured party is a contributing proximate cause of the accident, he cannot recover damages."

It is said in Ruling Case Law, vol. 25, p. 1285:

"However, where a foot passenger walks or steps directly in front of an approaching car and is struck the instant he sets his foot between the rails there is but one inference that can reasonably be drawn from that fact, that is the inference of negligence."

In Green v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 P. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, we find this language:

"We are unable to find in the record any excuse for the intestate's disregard of his obvious duty to himself, to use his eye-sight at the time when he could easily have discovered the danger of collision, which was up to the very moment he stepped upon the main track. Until then he had full control of his movements. He could by the slightest movement of his head towards the east have discovered his hazard, and by the slightest check of his movements have avoided the same."

See, also, Green v. Southern Cal. Ry., 138 Cal. 1, 70 P. 926; Bailey v. Market St. Ry., 110 Cal. 320, 42 P. 914; Jones v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 34 Cal. App. 629, 168 P. 586.

Giving to appellant every favorable inference that might be drawn from the record, and construing every ambiguous piece of testimony in his behalf, we still can find nothing sufficient to overthrow the court's order of nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.
